PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE SIXTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, July 24, 1917.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we thank Thee for the fact so often expressed by our statesmen and so fervently believed in by every pious soul that there is a God of justice who rules over the fate of nations. We bless Thee for the assurance from all history that Thou dost guide and that the final decision of conflict must be the decision of justice and right. We thank Thee for that which opens to us in the vision of the coming days the establishment of a higher civilization, of a sweeter brotherhood, of the diviner life. We pray that we may be kept true to the star that guides on to the accomplishment of the divine purpose and will. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. JAMES and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 1811) providing for the counting of service in the Army or Navy of the United States as equivalent to residence and cultivation upon homestead entries, and in the event of the soldier's death in such service providing for the issuance of patent for such land to his widow or minor children, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to the title of the bill, and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the House insert the following:

"That any settler upon the public lands of the United States; or any entryman whose application has been allowed; or any person who has made application for public lands which thereafter may be allowed under the homestead laws, who, after such settlement, entry, or application, enlists or is actually engaged in the military or naval service of the United States as a private soldier, officer, seaman, marine, National Guardsman, or member of any other organization for offense or defense authorized by Congress during any war in which the United States may be engaged, shall, in the administration of the homestead laws, have his services therein construed to be equivalent to all intents and purposes to residence and cultivation for the same length of time upon the tract entered or settled upon; and hereafter no contest shall be initiated on the ground of abandonment, nor allegation of abandonment sustained against any such settler, entryman, or person unless it shall be alleged in the preliminary affidavit or affidavits of contest and proved at the hearing in cases hereinafter initiated that the alleged absence from the land was not due to his employment in such military or naval service; that if he shall be discharged on account of wounds received or disability incurred in the line of duty, then the term of his enlistment shall be deducted from the required length of residence, without reference to the time of actual service: Provided, That no patent shall issue to any homestead settler who has not resided upon, improved, and cultivated his homestead for a period of at least one year.

istration of the homestead laws, be construed to be equivalent to a performance of all requirements as to residence and cultivation upon such homestead."

PETITIONS.

Mr. SHEPPARD presented a petition of the Woman's Methodist Missionary Society of Mount Vernon, Tex., praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WILLIAMS presented a petition of the Brooksville Auxiliary of the Woman's Missionary Council of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, of Mississippi, praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. FLETCHER. I present a telegram from the Lee County Farmer and Truckers' Association, of Florida, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD. It bears on the high price of fertilizer.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FORT MYERS, FLA., July 23, 1917.

Senator DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Price of fertilizer recently advanced again. If Government does not take prompt action to relieve the situation, food crops down here must be reduced in acreage, and what is planted will develop poor yield. As an association of farmers and truckers, we wish to protest against the almost prohibitive cost of fertilizers and petition the Government to secure fair treatment for those of whom they are asking more crops.

LEE COUNTY FARMER AND TRUCKERS' ASSOCIATION,
By W. C. WEST, President.

Mr. JAMES. I present resolutions adopted by the Common Council of the City of Owensboro, Ky., petitioning Congress to deal with the coal situation and to fix the price thereof. I ask that the resolutions be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OWENSBORO, KY., July 16, 1917.

Whereas the prices now being charged for coal will, unless reduced, very materially increase the cost of operation of the city's water and light plants and of the other departments of the city, including the city hospital and cost of coal for paupers, to meet which will necessitate an increase in rates and a curtailment of the operation of the other departments and entail great hardship and suffering upon the people of the city during the coming fall and winter; and

Whereas, to meet the increased cost of labor and materials and supplies, the city has this year had to raise the tax rate to the constitutional limit, and the increased cost of coal can not be met by taxation: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Common Council of the City of Owensboro, That the Congress of the United States be petitioned to deal with the coal situation in an energetic and effective way and provide for price fixing, so that coal may be had by the cities and the people generally at reasonable prices.

That copies of this resolution be mailed by the city clerk to United States Senators JAMES and BECKHAM, of Kentucky, and POMERENE, of Ohio, and to Representative KINCHELOE, of the second district of Kentucky.

A copy, attest:

W. T. PHIPPS, City Clerk.

Mr. LEWIS. I present resolutions adopted by the citizens' committee under the auspices of the Negro Fellowship League and the Bethel African Methodist Episcopal Church, of Chicago, Ill., which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CITIZENS' COMMITTEE REPORT.

CHICAGO, July 17, 1917.

We, the undersigned citizens' committee chosen at the mass meeting held under the auspices of the Negro Fellowship League and Bethel African Methodist Episcopal Church, and directed to confer with Gov. Lowden over the situation caused by the riot at East St. Louis and to continue the investigation previously begun, beg leave to make the following report:

Your committee arrived in Springfield July 10, the morning following the mass meeting at Bethel Church, and by appointment met Gov. Lowden in the Capitol Building, where our conference was held at 11 o'clock. There were present also Adjt. Gen. Dickson, who participated in the conference, also Col. John R. Marshall, who had spent some time in East St. Louis soon after the riot.

The express purpose of the committee was—

First. To call the attention of the governor to the fact that thousands of citizens of East St. Louis were exiled from their homes and were the beneficiaries of charity in St. Louis, Mo., and to request that some provision be made by the Illinois authorities for their protection and maintenance. Gov. Lowden took prompt action upon this matter. In our presence he called up the Red Cross officials at East St. Louis and directed that immediate attention be given to this situation, and then assured the committee that the city of St. Louis would not be required further to take care of citizens of Illinois.

Second. To call to the attention of the governor the manifest inefficiency and indifference of the Illinois Militia during the time of the mob, the possible connivance of members of the militia with the mob, and to request that investigation be made of the work done by the militia to the end that a court-martial be ordered if justified by the facts.

Upon these serious charges which the committee, supported by newspaper reports and experiences related to members of the committee by victims of the mob, the conference was frank and earnest, both sides desiring to determine upon the best way to fix responsibility upon all who aided and abetted the mob. So far as the militia was concerned the governor gave his assurance that the charges would be fully investigated, and if proper a court-martial would be ordered. Since the conference a court-martial has been ordered, although we regret that no member of the Eighth Regiment was named thereon.

Third. To demand for the victims of East St. Louis, many of them refugees from home and work, the full protection of the law in the enjoyment of their lives, the protection of their property, and the right to earn their living by honest toil. To the justice of this demand Gov. Lowden gave his hearty assent and declared that all citizens of Illinois should have the fullest protection of the law if it required the exercise of all the power of the State. But your committee, from its investigation, believes that the same bitter vindictive spirit which manifested itself in the awful deeds of July 3 still exists in a dangerous degree in East St. Louis to-day, and that no earnest and effective measures will be taken by public officials to curb that spirit or prosecute known murderers who took part in the mob. Our belief is that security for life and property will come only through action of Federal authority by congressional investigation and a Federal grand jury at East St. Louis. Believing this your committee has prepared a memorial which we respectfully submit for your consideration.

W. D. Cook, D. D., chairman, pastor Bethel African Methodist Episcopal Church; John W. Robinson, pastor St. Marks Methodist Episcopal Church; H. A. Watkins, real estate dealer; A. H. Roberts, lawyer; B. W. Fitts, proprietor Crystal Printing Shop; Mrs. William Farrow, visiting nurse; Ida B. Wells-Barnett, president Negro Fellowship League; F. L. Barnett, lawyer, secretary of the committee.

Adopted at Quinn Chapel, African Methodist Episcopal Church, Chicago, Ill., July 17, 1917, and ordered sent to Senators LAWRENCE Y. SHERMAN and JAS. HAMILTON LEWIS and Congressman MARTIN B. MADDEN.

To the Congress of the United States, Washington, D. C.:

The undersigned, a citizens' committee, chosen at three mass meetings held by Chicago colored citizens interested in the protection of life and property of colored citizens of the State of Illinois, beg leave to submit this memorial praying for action on the part of the Federal Government in our behalf.

We plead for thousands of colored citizens of East St. Louis who for more than six weeks prior to July 3 last not only lived in immediate danger of mob violence, destruction of property, and lynching, but later many of them became the victims of the most deliberate, wanton, and barbarous massacre that has blotted the pages of American history. It was a very orgy of inhuman butchery during which more than 50 colored men, women, and children were beaten with bludgeons, stoned, shot, drowned, hanged, or burned to death, all without any effective interference on the part of the police, sheriff, or military authorities.

The riot was no sudden outburst of passion. It was a combination of a publicly declared determination on the part of white laborers to drive colored laborers from work or kill them. There was no provocation by acts of lawless blacks, no drunkenness on the part of the whites; nothing but the deadly vindictiveness of labor trouble accentuated by hatred toward the negro.

The dangerous situation was well known to the mayor and chief of police of East St. Louis; to the sheriff of St. Claire County; and on two separate occasions the impending danger was called to the attention of the governor of the State. A brief outburst of fury on the 28th day of May was quelled, but the fires of race hatred smoldered and grew in intensity until July 3, when mob frenzy sated itself by the burning of hundreds of humble homes and the unspeakable butchery of scores of victims whose only offense was their effort to earn their bread by honest toil. White men, white women, and white children made the mob—laughing, jesting, and gloating as they beat, tortured, and burned their pleading victims to death.

An eyewitness, Mr. Carlos F. Hurd, of St. Louis, Mo., wrote and published a part of what he saw in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, an excerpt from which account is appended hereto:

"The victims of the mob in whose behalf Chicago colored citizens plead, and for whom all humane people must plead, were citizens of the United States. Because Germany put to death American citizens upon the high seas—fewer in number than the mob killed in East St. Louis—the Nation entered into a world war that will cost billions of treasure and perhaps a million lives. Shall not the Stars and Stripes protect American citizens at home as well as upon the high seas?"

We appeal through Congress to the Nation. The indifference and inefficiency of city, county, and military authorities, and their apparent connivance with the mob which made this awful tragedy possible, forbid our reliance upon our local authorities for security of life and property. One hundred and twenty-seven members of the mob arrested while rioting, when brought into court, were discharged, the State's attorney publicly declaring there could be no successful prosecution. Justice can be meted out to the guilty and protection for the innocent can come only through a Federal grand jury impaneled by a judge who knows his duty and dares to do it.

As American citizens, our lives are subject to the Nation's call, and at no call have we faltered or failed. As American citizens, we call to the Nation to save our lives; to that call will the Nation falter or fail?

In memory of the slaughtered dead and their bereaved ones, in behalf of the thousands made homeless and penniless by fire, and for the security of life and property—to exiled thousands of East St. Louis citizens—we plead for congressional investigation and appropriate action on the part of the Federal Government, and we bespeak for this memorial the earnest consideration of the Congress of the United States.

MILITARY SERVICE COMPARISON.

Mr. LODGE. I ask leave to have printed in the RECORD certain brief analyses of the quotas and the method of determining them by population which have been sent me, one by the president of the Stevens Institute of Technology of New Jersey, another from the Haverhill Chamber of Commerce of Massachusetts, and another from the Committee on Public Safety of New Hampshire. They are very interesting and valuable analyses of the result of the quota.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Hon. HENRY CABOT LODGE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR LODGE: I inclose herewith a memorandum prepared by a friend of mine, who is particularly interested in the scheme for conscription. By a coincidence, he was studying this matter before the questions had been raised in the Congress.

I have not been over the figures myself, but I have reason to place great confidence in any work done by this friend of mine. He is in such a position that he can not allow his name to be brought into any discussion, but I thought possibly that this memorandum might be of some value to you, though the chances are that you have all this information in your hands.

Yours, very truly, ALEX. C. HUMPHREYS.

HAVERHILL CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
Haverhill, Mass., July 16, 1917.

Mr. GEORGE A FIEL,
Secretary State Board of Trade,
10 High Street, Boston, Mass.

DEAR MR. FIEL: The recent erroneous estimates of population credited to the Massachusetts cities by the Federal Bureau of Census for use in the draft purposes should be refuted, I believe, by the Massachusetts State Board of Trade. I have not gone through the entire list, but a glance at a few of the cities will show the abnormal gain which would have had to be made to reach anywhere near the figures which the Census Bureau arrived at. Haverhill's population in 1910 was 44,115; in 1915 it was 49,450; a gain of 5,335 in 5 years. In the last 10 years we have gained an average of a thousand a year in population, and the 5 years ending 1915 were about the most successful Haverhill has ever known. In that time we gained 5,000 in population, erected 2,000 tenements, built 5 monster factories, and added 52 industrial establishments. And now the Bureau of Census credits us with gaining nearly 9,000 people in a year and a half.

A glance at some of the other cities showing the 1915 State census and present estimate is proof of the false policy of the Bureau of Census:

City	1915	Estimated 1917
Lawrence	90,259	104,689
Salem	37,200	41,545
Fitchburg	39,656	43,423
Lowell	107,978	117,264
Taunton	26,161	35,912
Everett	37,718	49,957

By use of these figures a false premise is established and each city will have to furnish more than its quota of men. Furthermore, when the Federal Government census is taken in 1920 the actual population will be found to be far below the figures given in 1917, which, I think you will agree, will be mighty poor advertising for Massachusetts municipalities.

Do you not think that the State Board of Trade should file a protest with the Bureau of Census?

Very truly, yours, DANIEL N. CASEY,
Secretary.

STATE OF NEW HAMPSHIRE,
COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC SAFETY,
Statehouse, Concord, N. H., July 19, 1917.

Hon. HENRY CABOT LODGE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR LODGE: In the New York Times, on July 13, a table was printed showing the quota of troops expected from each State in the Union and the number already supplied, together with a column giving the number remaining to be taken by draft.

Our office has rearranged the figures appearing in that table in order to indicate the relative rank of each State with reference to what it has already done at the call of the Government. For example, our table shows that Massachusetts has supplied 52 per cent of those asked by the Government, New Hampshire 68.5 per cent, etc. The table also shows that the New England States stand very high in the list.

We have also made a second table in which the States are grouped, and it appears that New England stands very high in the group.

It occurred to me that these two tables might be of interest in showing that New England has come forward in this matter beyond the States from which criticisms of New England have emanated.

The table may also be of interest in connection with the question of sending the National Guard to the South.

Respectfully, yours, R. W. HUSBAND,
Office Manager.

PROTECTION OF MIGRATORY BIRDS.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, I have here a law enacted by the Canadian Parliament for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of the existing treaty between the United States and Great Britain for the protection of migratory birds. I will state that this act was passed under the assumption that the Senate of the United States would keep its faith and report and pass at an early date a law carrying into effect the provisions of the treaty. That bill is now pending in the Senate, and I am hoping that the Senate will insist that a vote be taken upon the same without any further delay.

I ask unanimous consent that the Canadian act be printed in the RECORD. It shows that the Canadian Government has acted in perfect good faith in carrying out its obligations under the treaty.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The act referred to is as follows:

[7th session 12th Parliament, 7–8 George V, 1917.]

THE HOUSE OF COMMONS OF CANADA.

An act respecting a certain convention between His Majesty and the United States of America for the protection of migratory birds in Canada and the United States.

Whereas on the 16th day of August, 1916, a convention was signed at Washington respecting the protection of certain migratory birds in Canada and the United States, and ratifications were exchanged at Washington on the 7th day of December, 1916; and whereas it is expedient that the said convention should receive the sanction of the Parliament of Canada and that legislation be passed for insuring the execution of the said convention: Therefore His Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:

1. This act may be cited as "The migratory birds convention act."

2. The said convention of the 16th day of August, 1916, which is set forth in the schedule to this act, is hereby sanctioned, ratified, and confirmed.

3. In this act and in any regulation made thereunder, unless the context otherwise requires—

(a) "Close season" means the period during which any species of migratory game, migratory insectivorous, or migratory nongame bird is protected by this act or any regulation made under this act.

(b) "Migratory game birds" means—

Anatidæ or waterfowl, including brant, wild ducks, geese, and swans.

Gruidæ or cranes, including little brown, sandhill, and whooping cranes.

Rallidæ or rails, including coots, gallinules, and sora and other rails.

Limicolæ or shore birds, including avocets, curlew, dowitchers, godwits, knots, oyster catchers, phalaropes, plovers, sandpipers, snipe, stilts, surf birds, turnstones, willet, woodcock, and yellowlegs.

Columbidæ or pigeons, including doves and wild pigeons.

(c) "Migratory insectivorous birds" means—

All guns, ammunition, boats, skiffs, canoes, punts, and vessels of every description, teams, wagons, and other outfits, decoys, and appliances of every kind used in violation of or for the purpose of violating this act or any regulation, and any bird, nest, or egg taken, caught, killed, or had in possession in violation of this act or any regulation may be seized and confiscated upon view by any game officer appointed under this act, or taken and removed by any person for delivery to any game officer or justice of the peace.

11. Any game officer or peace officer may enter any place or premises in which he has reason to believe there exist migratory game, or migratory insectivorous, or migratory nongame birds, nests, or eggs, or any parts thereof, in respect of which a breach of this act or of the regulations may have been committed, and may open and examine any trunk, box, bag, parcel, or receptacle which he has reason to suspect and does suspect contains any such bird, nest, or egg, or any part thereof.

SCHEDULE.

CONVENTION.

Whereas many species of birds in the course of their annual migrations traverse certain parts of the Dominion of Canada and the United States; and

Whereas many of these species are of great value as a source of food or in destroying insects which are injurious to forests and forage plants on the public domain, as well as to agricultural crops, in both Canada and the United States, but are nevertheless in danger of extermination through lack of adequate protection during the nesting season or while on their way to and from their breeding grounds;

His Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and of the British dominions beyond the seas, Emperor of India, and the United States of America, being desirous of saving from indiscriminate slaughter and of insuring the preservation of such migratory birds as are either useful to man or are harmless, have resolved to adopt some uniform system of protection which shall effectively accomplish such objects, and to the end of concluding a convention for this purpose have appointed as their respective plenipotentiaries:

His Britannic Majesty, the Right Honorable Sir Cecil Arthur Spring-Rice, G. C. V. O., K. C. M. G., etc., His Majesty's ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary at Washington; and

The President of the United States of America, Robert Lansing, Secretary of State of the United States;

Who, after having communicated to each other their respective full powers which were found to be in due and proper form, have agreed to and adopted the following articles:

ARTICLE I.

The high contracting powers declare that the migratory birds included in the terms of this convention shall be as follows:

1. Migratory game birds.

(a) Anatidæ or waterfowl, including brant, wild ducks, geese, and swans.

(b) Gruidæ or cranes, including little brown, sandhill, and whooping cranes.

(c) Rallidæ or rails, including coots, gallinules, and sora and other rails.

(d) Limicolæ or shorebirds, including avocets, curlew, dowitchers, godwits, knots, oyster catchers, phalaropes, plovers, sandpipers, snipe, stilts, surf birds, turnstones, willet, woodcock, and yellowlegs.

(e) Columbidæ or pigeons, including doves and wild pigeons.

2. Migratory insectivorous birds: Bobolinks, catbirds, chickadees, cuckoos, flickers, flycatchers, grosbeaks, humming birds, kinglets, martins, meadowlarks, nighthawks or bull bats, nut-hatches, orioles, robins, shrikes, swallows, swifts, tanagers, titmice, thrushes, vireos, warblers, wax-wings, whippoorwills, woodpeckers, and wrens, and all other perching birds which feed entirely or chiefly on insects.

3. Other migratory nongame birds: Auks, auklets, bitterns, fulmars, gannets, grebes, guillemots, gulls, herons, jaegers, loons, murres, petrels, puffins, shearwaters, and terns.

ARTICLE II.

The high contracting powers agree that, as an effective means of preserving migratory birds there shall be established the following close seasons during which no hunting shall be done except for scientific or propagating purposes under permits issued by proper authorities:

1. The close season on migratory game birds shall be between 10th March and 1st September, except that the close of the season on the limicolæ or shorebirds in the maritime Provinces of Canada and in those States of the United States bordering on the Atlantic Ocean which are situated wholly or in part north of Chesapeake Bay shall be between 1st February and 15th August, and that Indians may take at any time scoters for food but not for sale. The season for hunting shall be further restricted to such period not exceeding three and one-half months as the high contracting powers may severally deem appropriate and define by law or regulation.

2. The close season on migratory insectivorous birds shall continue throughout the year.

3. The close season on other migratory nongame birds shall continue throughout the year, except that Eskimos and Indians may take at any season auks, auklets, guillemots, murres, and puffins, and their eggs for food and their skins for clothing, but the birds and eggs so taken shall not be sold or offered for sale.

ARTICLE III.

The high contracting powers agree that during the period of 10 years next following the going into effect of this convention there shall be a continuous close season on the following migratory game birds, to wit:

Band-tailed pigeons, little brown, sandhill, and whooping cranes, swans, curlew, and all shore birds (except the black-breasted and golden plover, Wilson or jack snipe, woodcock, and the greater and lesser yellowlegs): Provided, That during such 10 years the close season on cranes, swans, and curlew in the Province of British Columbia shall be made by the proper authorities of that Province within the general dates and limitations elsewhere prescribed in this convention for the respective groups to which these birds belong.

ARTICLE IV.

The high contracting powers agree that special protection shall be given the wood duck and the eider duck, either (1) by a close season extending over a period of at least five years, or (2) by the establishment of refuges, or (3) by such other regulations as may be deemed appropriate.

ARTICLE V.

The taking of nests or eggs of migratory game or insectivorous or nongame birds shall be prohibited, except for scientific or propagating purposes under such laws or regulations as the high contracting powers may severally deem appropriate.

ARTICLE VI.

The high contracting powers agree that the shipment or export of migratory birds or their eggs from any State or Province during the continuance of the close season in such State or Province, shall be prohibited except for scientific or propagating purposes, and the international traffic in any birds or eggs at such time captured, killed, taken, or shipped at any time contrary to the laws of the State or Province in which the same were captured, killed, taken, or shipped shall be likewise prohibited. Every package containing migratory birds or any parts thereof or any eggs of migratory birds transported or offered for transportation from the Dominion of Canada into the United States or from the United States into the Dominion of Canada, shall have the name and address of the shipper and an accurate statement of the contents clearly marked on the outside of such package.

ARTICLE VII.

Permits to kill any of the above-named birds which, under extraordinary conditions, may become seriously injurious to the agricultural or other interests in any particular community, may be issued by the proper authorities of the high contracting powers under suitable regulations prescribed therefor by them, respectively, but such permits shall lapse or may be canceled at any time when, in the opinion of said authorities, the particular exigency has passed; and no birds killed under this article shall be shipped, sold, or offered for sale.

ARTICLE VIII.

The high contracting powers agree themselves to take, or propose to their respective appropriate lawmaking bodies, the necessary measures for insuring the execution of the present convention.

ARTICLE IX.

The present convention shall be ratified by His Britannic Majesty and by the President of the United States of America, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof. The ratifications shall be exchanged at Washington as soon as possible, and the convention shall take effect on the date of the exchange of the ratifications. It shall remain in force for 15 years, and in the event of neither of the high contracting powers having given notification 12 months before the expiration of said period of 15 years of its intention of terminating its operation, the convention shall continue to remain in force for one year and so on from year to year.

In faith whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed the present convention in duplicate and have hereunto affixed their seals.

Done at Washington this 16th day of August, 1916.

AMENDMENTS TO PENDING BILL.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to offer an amendment to the river and harbor bill, and ask that it be read.

The SECRETARY. Insert a new section as follows:

SEC. 16. That each of the appropriations herein made shall become available only in the event States, counties, cities, corporations, copartnerships, associations, or individuals shall pay into the Treasury as part of the same one-third of the amount thereof: Provided, however, That the provisions of this section shall not apply to those items requiring contributions from other sources.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. KENYON. I offer two amendments to the river and harbor bill, to be known as new sections, and I ask that they be read.

The SECRETARY. Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

There is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the United States Treasury, for the maintenance and improvement of rivers and harbors $10,000,000, to be expended by the Secretary of War in such way as he may deem best upon such projects as have been approved by Congress or as may be deemed necessary by him for war purposes.

Add a new section at the end of the bill, as follows:

SEC. —. That no appropriation contained in this bill shall be available if the President of the United States, on or before September 1, 1917, shall file a statement with the Secretary of War that such particular project for which said appropriation is made is not one of a public necessity.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments will lie on the table and be printed.

ACTIVITIES OF COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC INFORMATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no concurrent or other resolutions, that order is closed.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I call up Senate resolution 101, which was submitted by me several days ago, and which is now on the table. I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate resolution 101, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy is directed to send to the Senate copies of official dispatches, including the report of Admiral Gleaves, relating to the alleged encounter of the American fleet with submarines, as described in a statement issued under the authority of Mr. George Creel, chairman of the Committee on Public Information; and he is further directed to furnish the Senate with the names of all persons employed by such Committee on Public Information, and the salaries received by them, and the character of the duties performed by each, together with a full statement of the rules regulating press censorship and the reasons for the frequent changes in the same, especially concerning cable messages.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, this resolution speaks for itself, and I do not know that any extended comment by me is necessary. Widespread dissatisfaction all over the country among newspaper correspondents and newspaper publishers with the management of the so-called Bureau of Public Information exists. Instead of a person having been appointed to that important place, the head of the commission, one representative of the best elements in journalism, a person has been called to fill the post who, to say the least, does not command the confidence of the public or of the newspaper profession. His publication, the Official Bulletin, I am informed by newspaper people, is not thought worthy of being utilized in the public press throughout the country. It is not considered a work of any particular value.

However, that the head of the Bureau of Public Information takes a great deal of responsibility on himself, and seems to have the care of the Nation on his shoulders, is illustrated by his publication of the address of President Wilson to the mine operators and the manufacturers of the United States when they came down here to Washington and endeavored, in interviews with Mr. Lane, the Secretary of the Interior, to adjust prices on a basis satisfactory to the Government. I referred to these transactions the other day when I said a few words in the Senate in connection with the food-control bill so far as related to coal.

These operators came to Washington; they met Mr. Lane; they agreed on a price for coal; they agreed to methods by which the coal could be shipped to the Northwest and to the seaboard; and they received as great a commendation and eulogy from the Secretary of the Interior as was possible for an official of the Government to give to any body of citizens in any country. I recited in my remarks, to which I have referred, the letter which Mr. Lane wrote and the speech which he made to the operators, in which he called them patriots, and said that no body of men could have acted in a more disinterested or honorable spirit; that they deserved the commendation of their fellow citizens; and that the price was fair and beyond any criticism.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. PENROSE. Yes.

Mr. POMERENE. Will the Senator from Pennsylvania express it as his opinion that the prices fixed for coal in western Pennsylvania, in Ohio, in West Virginia, and in Kentucky were fair prices?

Mr. PENROSE. I will, Mr. President. I made in my speech, to which I have referred, a few remarks giving the schedule of prices. I consider them under the present circumstances as eminently fair.

Mr. POMERENE. I can say to the Senator from Pennsylvania the prices fixed, so far as Ohio is concerned, would give the operators more than 100 per cent profit. The cost of coal in Ohio, according to the statement made by the secretary of the chamber of commerce of the State—and they went into a very careful investigation of the matter—was to the effect that the cost of coal at the mouth of the mine was $1.27 a ton, while the price fixed for coal there by those operators at that particular day was from $3 to $3.50 per ton. That is only one of many instances to which I can refer.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio when this investigation by the State officials of Ohio was made?

Mr. POMERENE. It has been going on during the entire spring.

Mr. PENROSE. Well, when did they make this statement concerning the cost of coal?

Mr. POMERENE. I have the letter in my possession.

Mr. PENROSE. Well, what is the date of the letter?

Mr. POMERENE. It is dated some time in the early part of this month.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I am not familiar with the conditions in Ohio. It may be that some coal operators there are making 100 per cent, but there are business men in the United States to a very great number who are making 100 per cent, and some of them are making 200 per cent and 300 per cent, and they will continue to do so during at least the war period.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to me for a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. PENROSE. Yes.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Is the Senator from Pennsylvania aware that according to the Geological Survey, coal in Pennsylvania sold for $1.01 per ton at the mouth of the mine; in Illinois for $1.11; in Indiana, $1.08; in Ohio, $1.03; and in West Virginia at 90 cents per ton?

Mr. PENROSE. What is the date of that investigation?

Mr. SHAFROTH. That was several years ago—in 1912, I think.

Mr. PENROSE. The statement is unworthy of the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania think that an increase of 200 per cent ought to be made in the price of coal?

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I decline to be interrupted by such a frivolous interruption as that—the bringing up in a serious discussion an investigation of the price of coal several years ago.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, if the Senator considers that a frivolous interruption, he is entitled to his opinion.

Mr. PENROSE. I do consider it frivolous.

Now, Mr. President, I know, and every Senator familiar with the coal business knows, that the cost of mining coal varies greatly; that the quality of coal varies exceedingly; and that it is extremely difficult to ascertain the average cost of coal mining in the 31 States where bituminous coal is produced. In addition to that, all previous statistics are without value, because labor has gone up enormously; many million dollars have been added to the wage fund in Pennsylvania and disbursed to the coal miners, not only in the anthracite region but in the bituminous region. The car shortage has led to a situation which is responsible, more than any other one cause, for the high price of this commodity.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. PENROSE. Yes.

Mr. JAMES. If I understood the resolution the Senator introduced and which he has called up this morning, its purpose originally was to inquire as to the facts in regard to whether or not the transports conveying our soldiers across to France were attacked. It seems now that the Senator has shifted that to an attack upon Mr. Creel because he said something about the coal operators.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, the resolution is broader than that. It not only asks for information regarding this alleged combat in mid-ocean but also asks for information concerning the Committee on Public Information, the persons employed by such committee, the salaries received by them, and the duties performed by them.

Mr. JAMES. But, Mr. President, the Senator predicated his resolution primarily upon an editorial which appeared in the New York Times, in which it was stated——

Mr. PENROSE. I will construe the meaning of my own resolution without any help from the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. JAMES. If the Senator will pardon me—in which it was stated that a correspondent slept during the time the encounter was supposed to have taken place, and when he arrived in France reported that no attack was made. That was the resolution, as I understood it.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, speaking in reference to my own resolution, which seeks information not only concerning this account of an alleged battle in mid-ocean but also as to the nature of this Committee on Public Information, I had only intended to refer, before being interrupted, to the fact that the head of the bureau seems to have varied activities. In editing the President's address to the mine operators and manufacturers of the United States, which address, in my opinion, was entirely unwarranted under the circumstances and indicated no business knowledge whatever of the coal situation, Mr. Creel, in his Official Bulletin, undertakes to edit the message by putting headlines in it, using italics, and ornamenting it in other respects as he adorned the account of the alleged naval battle in mid-ocean.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire will state it.

Mr. HOLLIS. I should like to inquire if there is anything before the Senate?

Mr. PENROSE. My resolution is before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution submitted by the Senator from Pennsylvania, which came over from yesterday, has been called up by the Senator.

Mr. HOLLIS. It was introduced yesterday?

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I referred the other day to the fact that the representative of the Associated Press was with the squadron, and that he never reported any battle in mid-ocean with a flotilla of submarines, but, on the contrary, sent a dispatch to this country that the seas had been peaceful and the voyage uneventful; and yet we have this 4th of July proclamation, in which a wonderful description has been given of the fleet being twice attacked by German submarines on the way across. I quote from Mr. Creel:

> Our high-seas convoys circling with their search lights answered with heavy gunfire, and its accuracy stands proved by the fact that the torpedo discharge became increasingly scattered and inaccurate. One torpedo boat—> was certainly sunk, and there is reason to believe that the accurate fire of our gunners sent others to the bottom.

To quote again:

> Five torpedoes were counted as they sped by bow and stern.

Then he goes on to describe a second attack, where he repeats:

> One submarine at least was sunk.

Now, Mr. President, it seems to me that this is trifling very seriously with the information which the American people are entitled to receive about these events, and any person who is responsible for this kind of publicity should well be investigated by the Senate or by some committee of the Senate.

The Associated Press of July 5 said that there was no submarine attack whatever; no torpedoes were seen, and there was no gun firing at submarines from our destroyers. This is a committee, Mr. President, on misinformation, not on information. It seems that there was no flotilla of German submarines engaged either in the first or in the second attack.

Mr. President, the defense of Mr. Daniels, the Secretary of the Navy—and he seems to be the only person in Government circles who assumes any responsibility for Mr. Creel—makes the matter worse than before, because the only explanation Mr. Daniels can give for the elaboration and misstatements of the original Creel report is that the troops had got over safely; that it was an occasion of great rejoicing; and that it was owing to the way in which he was rejoicing that this exuberance of language occurred. He describes how he received a telegram—this is from his letter to the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs—containing—> the welcome news that the last ship of the convoys and transports carrying the first American soldiers and marines to fight in France had reached its destination in safety, without accident or injury to men or ships. The Navy Department had known for four or five days prior to their arrival that two attacks by submarines had been made, and you can well understand the painful anxiety lest torpedoes should have caused loss of some of the brave men who were carrying out their hazardous enterprise.

Mr. Daniels is not candid in that statement. He does not say, when he refers to two attacks by submarines, that our squadron had been attacked by submarines. On the contrary, he says that the voyage was peaceful and uneventful. There is a lack of candor and square dealing in this letter of the Secretary of the Navy. He goes on, however, to say:

> You may imagine, therefore, the unspeakable relief to me which the news announcing the arrival of the last ship brought. This relief was, of course, shared by all others in the department.

There is no marked originality in this statement that there was rejoicing in the department that the fleet got over safely, and it does not meet the issue here involved, in my opinion.

> As soon as the news was communicated by an officer of the department, I hastened to the Secretary of War to apprise the Secretary of War of the fact, for I knew he had felt the deepest solicitude, as he, too, was informed of the attacks.

What attack, Mr. President, in a voyage which the Secretary says was peaceful and uneventful?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Is the Senator quoting from the Secretary of the Navy at that point?

Mr. PENROSE. Yes; I am quoting from the letter addressed by him to the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate [Mr. TILLMAN].

Mr. BRADY. To whom was the letter addressed?

Mr. PENROSE. To the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. BRADY. Of the House or Senate?

Mr. PENROSE. Of the Senate.

To quote Mr. Daniels again:

> At once a statement was prepared and given out that evening which I knew would intensely gratify all Americans. The message of Rear Admiral Gleaves announcing the attacks, of course, had not been given to the public, and consequently it had been spared anxiety. The statement which I gave to the public conveyed the feeling of all who had been waiting and hoping for the reassuring telegrams.

Mr. President, that does not furnish any intellectual provender to me, when a high official of the Government says that he gave out a statement which conveyed the feeling of all persons associated with the Government. This is a new basis for conducting a public information bureau, to have it measured by a state of feeling.

Mr. Daniels goes on to say:

> The facts were stated not in the very words of the Gleaves cablegram—

Of course, that statement is self-evident—

> for it is the immemorial policy of the department in time of war not to employ the language of a message coming in code; otherwise it would be easy for the enemy to learn the cipher.

How ridiculous, Mr. President! No one expects a message to be printed in code, but it should be translated accurately and without embellishment. It would be unintelligible to the American people without the key. It seems to me this whole business displays a lack of candor and of direct dealing, which only makes the original Creel offense worse.

The Secretary adds:

> Moreover, the message of the rear admiral contained the names of the ships, which for military reasons are never given out during a war.

I can not see what great amount of mystery or secrecy is necessary to surround the names of the ships. They left the shores of the United States with several hundred thousand people witnessing the spectacle from the shores, and their bands playing, and their safe arrival on the other side was heralded to the American public two or three days before the news was released by the Navy Department censorship.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. PENROSE. Yes.

Mr. JAMES. The Senator states that no one expects the Secretary to furnish to the Senate copies of the dispatches. I ask the Senator if in his own resolution he does not use this language:

> That the Secretary of the Navy is directed to send to the Senate copies of official dispatches, including the report of Admiral Gleaves.

Mr. PENROSE. I am not talking about what I want in this resolution. I am referring to the fact that the Secretary of the Navy stated that it was not customary to print official dispatches in cipher; and I say of course it is not customary to print them in cipher, because they would be unintelligible to the reading public.

Mr. JAMES. I know; but the Senator called for copies of the official dispatches.

Mr. PENROSE. For the Senate; yes.

Mr. JAMES. And if copies of the official dispatches were furnished him, I suppose those who had any knowledge of the code then could compare the code with the official dispatches.

Mr. PENROSE. Well, Mr. President, I do not think there is anything in what the Senator says.

Mr. JAMES. Probably not, but the Senate will.

Mr. PENROSE. Therefore it seems to be the height of military strategy to conceal the names of ships that left our harbor in New York, the bands playing, within the sight of people on the shores to the number of several hundred thousand in two contiguous States.

To quote again from this remarkable letter to the chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee:

> The important part of the statement given to the public was that all our soldiers and marines and ships had been convoyed to France in safety.

And there the Secretary is literally correct. In other words, Mr. President, after all this talk about sinking submarines and a terrible battle in mid-ocean, the Secretary admits that the troops got over there safely. He says:

> If the terms "battle" and "attacked in force" are open to criticism, the fact still remains that the rejoicing was warranted.

And therefore, Mr. President, as one of the symptoms of that rejoicing, the American public is regaled on the Fourth of July with a bombastic account of a battle which never occurred and relating to a squadron which crossed the ocean in placid seas and arrived on the other side without an important event.

The resolution also asks information concerning the rules and methods of censorship adopted by this remarkable bureau. The newspapers of the country, I am informed, have been frequently at a loss to know what news to publish and what news to suppress. I will cite only one case. This bureau only a short time ago made public a piece of news relative to the agreement entered into between coal producers, rail carriers, dockers, and ocean carriers which gave sailing dates and other data regarding prospective coal shipments from the ports of Newport News, Boston, Philadelphia, and New York, in flagrant contravention of their own rules regarding the mention of shipping matters. The manager of the Central News (Ltd.), of London and New York, started the story on the trans-Atlantic cables on a certain night. The censor in the cable office in New York strongly objected, and demanded information as to how the Central News (Ltd.) got the story. He was shocked and surprised when he heard that it was the emanation of the Creel bureau. Verification of this statement can be had from the gentleman in charge of the Central News Bureau in New York City. In other words, after formulating a rule of censorship on the press news concerning the sailing of certain vessels carrying coal, this bureau authorizes such information, to the complete demoralization of the censorship which has been established by the shipping people in this connection.

Mr. SWANSON obtained the floor.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, before the Senator sits down I should like to ask him a question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SWANSON. I yield.

Mr. STONE. I am puzzled to comprehend the motive or to understand the object the Senator expects to accomplish by this resolution. Suppose it should be ascertained by the reply to the resolution, or by a congressional investigation if the Senator should think it necessary to go that far, that there was no battle between our armed convoys and German submarines, what then? It might be a subject of some criticism of Mr. Creel, but Mr. Creel has as much right as any other writer for newspapers to bombard and sink submarines. What will be accomplished by the resolution? Accepting the Senator's view, what valuable or substantial result would be accomplished by its passage?

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, the Government is paying Mr. Creel. He is not an ordinary newspaper writer in the sense of working for private parties. He is an official of the Government and should be held to account, and if he has perpetrated a colossal fraud in the way of deception on the American people he should be called to account for it, in order that such an offense shall not be perpetrated again.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I have listened very carefully to the Senator from Pennsylvania. It seems to me that the main gravamen of his complaint, the purpose that animated this resolution, is that Mr. Creel published the speech of the President, which was a patriotic appeal to coal operators to furnish coal to the Government and the consumers of this country at a reasonable price. It was an official address by the President of the United States, and was properly entitled to be included in an official publication.

Now, I am not going to argue with the Senator in regard to the price of coal. The conclusion of his remarks shows the price of coal is the gravamen of his complaint. The real purpose that seems to animate him is that coal should not have been a subject of discussion in the official journal.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

Mr. SWANSON. I will yield to the Senator directly. I did not interrupt him. I will leave it with the Senator himself to discuss with the people of Pennsylvania as to whether the operators of Pennsylvania charge exorbitant rates for coal to the consumers, and I do not wish to intrude myself in that discussion as to the price of coal between the operators and the consumers in Pennsylvania. The Senator is permitted to pursue that field unrestricted and without any criticism on my part. But I do wish to address myself to his resolution.

Of all the misinformation, of all the misstatements I have heard since I have been a Member of the Senate, the misstatements made by the Senator from Pennsylvania regarding the conflict and battle in connection with the transporting of our troops takes precedence of all that I have ever heard; and the Senator himself is responsible for the misinformation possessed by him. I had seen in the papers a notice, almost in flaming letters, that the Senator from Pennsylvania would introduce this resolution, and that he would demand an investigation. In other words, information was given to the papers that the Senator from Pennsylvania would be on a rampage on a certain date, and I thought it would be wise to nail down the desks of Senators on account of what it had been prophesied in these papers he would do in the demands for that investigation. As soon as I saw it, I went to the Senator from Pennsylvania and suggested to him that before he introduced his resolution it would be well and proper for him to read these cablegrams in connection with this affair. He could have gotten all the information that I possess and all the information in connection with this matter, and he would not have had the misinformation that he has sought to deal out to the Senate to-day, if he had gone and read the cablegrams from Admiral Gleaves which, I assured him, the Secretary of the Navy would be glad to have him read.

I have read those cablegrams. Any member of the Naval Affairs Committee and any other Senator is perfectly privileged to read them at any time he desires. I wish to say, in this connection, that the substance contained in the interview given out by Secretary Daniels is true.

What are the facts? They can be easily understood by the Senate and the country. Our transports consisted of four units. They were divided into four parts containing troops for Europe. The first unit was attacked by a submarine on the 26th of June, and the report of Admiral Gleaves sustains that. On the 27th of June the second unit was attacked by a submarine, and all indications are the submarine was sunk. The other two units, the third and fourth, arrived in France on the 3d of July after an uneventful voyage, there having been no attack by any submarine. The cablegram that the Senator read, of the Associated Press, was dated the 5th of July, announcing the uneventful arrival of the third and fourth units of those troops. The first and second had been attacked outside of the war zone. The cablegram of Admiral Gleaves, announcing it, came on the 28th of June. The information was not given out until the evening of July 3, announcing what? That there had been two attacks of submarines, not giving the dates and not giving the places. If you had given the places, the enemy might have had an opportunity to know where American ships and transports rendezvoused before they had these destroyers to escort them safely through the danger zone. The dispatch was not given out because it gave the names of the ships, because it gave the names of the destroyers, and the enemy would be glad to know the size, the speed, and the capacity of all the armed ships, and also what the transports were, their speed, and the number of men they carried. In addition, the cablegrams were not given out because they gave the place of our base of supplies and where our transports landed in France. The enemy would be glad to have that information, so that they could regulate where their submarines should go.

When you know the place from which transports start, the speed of the ships, and where they are going, it is very easy to compute, if you want to make an attack, where the ships will be at a certain date.

Now, there was an attack on the 26th; there was an attack on the 27th. On the 27th, from the reports, there is no doubt but that a submarine was sunk. The two other units, the third and fourth, passed across uneventfully.

I asked the Senator to read the cablegrams before he introduced the resolution. There is not a Senator here, I am assured and believe, but that can read these cablegrams and see that the substance contained in that interview is correct and substantially true.

What is the substance of that interview given out by Secretary Daniels to all the papers? First, that there were two attacks. There is no doubt about it, if you believe the reports of Admiral Gleaves, and if you believe other reports which I will later have read. Second, that one submarine was sunk. There is no doubt about that, if the report can be believed, and all the evidence showed the destruction of a submarine. Third, that the ships had landed without the loss of a life of a soldier, a sailor, or a horse, and that for 3,000 miles across the ocean our soldiers had been transported safely.

Instead of being here criticizing the Navy, instead of indulging in heckling criticism of a partisan character, the Senate should be congratulating the Navy and passing resolutions of thanks that it has accomplished this work so well and so successfully.

Now, I am not extravagant in praise. I have always been conservative. I have never indulged in anything that was extravagant, as I thought, in expression or in action. Yet it seems to me that to transport for 3,000 miles four units of transports to France successfully is something to be most highly commended and not to be ridiculed. This was a proper subject for rejoicing on the Fourth of July. If a transport had been sunk and if any soldiers had been lost, those who now ridicule would have been criticizing and condemning.

I should like to know, in the beginning of this war, if every time the Navy does a gallant act, every time the Army does a gallant act, it is to be the subject of petty, partisan ridicule, which will please Germany and commend itself to the consideration of the Kaiser, or will we rejoice with our gallant Army and Navy at their accomplishments and endeavor to stimulate them to great achievement, to greater bravery, and to greater efficiency.

Mr. President, the Senator from Pennsylvania in starting this resolution invoked an editorial from that great paper, the New York Times. It is a great paper. It is a conservative paper. I have no doubt that that and other papers when they received the Associated Press dispatch of the 5th of July announcing the arrival of troops in France had an idea that a fabrication had been made. The two last units did have an uneventful trip as the cablegram at the time indicated. The first and second had been attacked, as stated in the interview of Secretary Daniels. The New York Times has a correspondent in Paris. It is the same correspondent the Public Ledger has, a great conservative and reputable paper published in Philadelphia.

I ask to have read the cablegram sent from Paris by the correspondent of these two great papers, reputable conservative papers, as to what transpired regarding the first and second units of these transports.

I am satisfied that a great journal like the Public Ledger and like the New York Times would not send as its correspondent to Europe nor select as its correspondent there to transmit news and information regarding the transaction of the American Army and Navy anyone except the most reputable, reliable, worthy, conservative men. I ask the Secretary of the Senate to read for the information of the Senate the cablegram published in the New York Times of July 7, 1917, reproduced in the Public Ledger of Philadelphia at the same time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

[From the New York Times, July 7, 1917. Copyright, 1917, by the New York Times Co. Special cable to the New York Times.]

PARIS, July 6.

There are two great lessons for the American people to learn from the voyage of the expeditionary force across the Atlantic. The first is that the submarine menace is as deadly as ever, not only by the insidious delivery of its metnod of attack, but even more by the accuracy of its information, and the second is that the American Navy by its skill at straight shooting can beat it on equal terms.

Anyone who has traveled by night through the sea "war zone" knows that unpleasant feeling of doubt as he disrobes for the night and creeps into his bunk. The lifebelts may be ready to hand, one's confidence in the vigilance of the watchers may be unlimited, but even the bravest can not repress a quiver of apprehension, born not only of his knowledge of the disasters that have already happened, but also of the inquietude regarding nocturnal terrors that is man's heritage from unnumbered ages.

"Three o'clock in the morning courage" has always been prized as the summit of human daring, and it is especially on this account that we Americans should be proud that our soldiers and sailors were not found wanting when they met for the first time this cruelest of war's alarms.

As a high French officer remarked when he heard the full story of this eventful voyage:

"If your boys can come through such an experience without losing their heads, we can be sure there will be no panics in the American Army. This war is terrible for new troops, and I know it, but I would sooner pass through a Verdun battle a second time than be waked from sleep by a submarine alarm on the Atlantic."

SUDDEN SIGN OF THE FOE.

In point of fact, the first attack of the undersea pirates came so swiftly that everything was over before anyone, save the crews of the warships and the officers on the bridges of transports, were aware of the peril.

It was just past midnight. The flotilla was sweeping through a calm sea, miles from the point of debarkation, and tense nerves were beginning to relax.

The sky was cloudy and the moon obscured, but the phosphorescence of water common in those latitudes at this season marked the prow and wake of the advancing ships with lines of smoky flame. It was this, perhaps, that saved us from disaster—this and the keenness of American eyes and the straightness of American shooting.

From the high-flung superstructure of a big ship one of the eager lookouts (the watch had just been changed and the newcomers were on the qui vive for danger) noted an unwonted line of shining foam on the port bow. In a second he realized that here at last was the reality of peril. It could be nothing else than the periscope of a submarine.

The Germans were not less swift in action. Almost at the moment that the alarm was given a gleaming line of bubbles, scarce 20 feet from the bow of one of the transports, wherein thousands were sleeping unconscious, announced the torpedo with its fatal burden of explosive.

WARSHIP FIRES ALL AVAILABLE GUNS.

Then, as my informant said: "Hell broke loose. Our (the big ship's) helm was jammed over. Firing every gun available, we swung in a wide circle out of line to the left. A smaller ship slipped into our place and from what the lookout told me, I think one of her shells must have landed almost right above the submarine. But they are almost impossible to hit when submerged, and the periscope is no target, anyway.

"They fired three, if not four, torpedoes. It was God's mercy that they all went astray among so many of our ships. One passed just astern. As you see, our helm jamming was absolutely providential.

"Naturally the old ——— acted quite differently from what the Boches expected; otherwise they might have got us. It was simply extraordinary. We drove right at them (really, I suppose, the safest thing to do, as the bow gives the smallest mark to shoot at) and it seems to have rattled Brother Boche considerably. After all, we draw enough water to smash a submarine at a level of the periscope awash, and no doubt he did not care to wait for us. Or perhaps a lucky shot disposed of him. We can't be certain either way. Anyhow, he disappeared, and we saw no more of him.

ALL OVER IN MINUTE AND A HALF.

"The whole business lasted only about a minute and a half. I know, because one of those easterners from somewhere in Maine (the speaker boasted California origin) coolly timed up the mix up with a stop watch. But, believe me, it added more than that to my life.

"While the thing was happening I had no time for anything but to attend to my job. Afterwards I found myself sweating and my breast heaving as if I had run five miles. The other boys told me the same thing, but we got a compliment on the rapidity with which the guns were served, so I guess it didn't interfere any with our action."

The second attack occurred the next morning. Every living soul on the transports had been thrilled by the news of the night's events, and from early hours the decks were lined with crowds of amateur lookouts.

The morning was fine, and a light breeze rippled up wavelets that twinkled in the sunlight. Suddenly, about 10.30 o'clock, there came a wild yell from one of the leading transports. Though the "jackies" affect to dispute it, I was assured that it was a far-sighted youngster from Arizona (a "blessed new-joined rookie," as a comrade here who told me termed him) who first descried and thus announced the deadly line of bubbles.

AGAIN DANGER IS CLOSE.

No periscope was visible this time, and for the first moments those on the bridges of the attendant destroyers were incredulous. Then the unmistakable bubble line, clean across the bows, put the certainty of danger beyond question.

Once again fortune favored us. The submarine was in front instead of in the deadliest position on the flank toward the rear. Perhaps the U-boat commander was rattled by the magnitude of his opportunity. Perhaps one of his excited pirates let fly too soon. Anyway, it is agreed by experts that he would have been far more dangerous had he waited unseen until part, at least, of the flotilla had passed beyond him.

Dearly did the Germans pay for their error. Like a striking rattlesnake one of our destroyers darted between a couple of the transports. Her nose was so deep in the sea as to be almost buried, while a great wave at the stern threw a shower of spray on soldiers massed at the transport's bow. One of them told me he thought the commander was crazy.

"Why," said he, "he ran her right along the line of bubbles like a hound following a trail. I said, 'God help 'em! The next one will get 'em for sure!'"

UPHEAVAL THAT ENDED U BOAT.

But that young naval officer knew what he was about. As he flashed at nearly 40 miles an hour across the spot where the commander judged the submarine was hidden he gave orders, and this one certainly fulfilled expectations. A column of smoke and foam rose a hundred feet in the air, and in the waterspout that followed it the soldiers on the nearest transport (she had swung in a headlong curve to the left) distinguished clearly pieces of wood and steel, and some dark-blue fragments that a moment before had been living men.

Any uncertainty was impossible. Transport after transport passed through floating oil, streaked with slimy red and patched with wreckage. This submarine, at least, had timed his hour too well. He had met the American flotilla as he was ordered, but never would he report his achievement.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, that is the report which came from the correspondent of these two reputable journals in Paris. I do not think there is an American who is not proud of that achievement. I do not think there is an American who is not proud when the wake of this torpedo of destruction was seen that our destroyer, with its brave officers and men, were bold enough and efficient enough to trace it at once, as Admiral Gleaves said, and destroy it, as the wreckage and oil which came from the submarine clearly indicate. It was an heroic and splendid act.

Instead of making it a subject of ridicule, as is sought in this resolution and by others in this country, the officers and crew are deserving of commendation, deserving of being noted and mentioned as most brave and efficient and capable officers. I desire at the beginning of this war to express my condemnation and my disapproval of the effort to ridicule the achievements in efficiency of the American Navy, and every time anything is accomplished to try to make it the subject of ridicule. I ask now the Senator, if he is not satisfied about this matter, to read the reports and cablegrams of Admiral Gleaves, in which he can get full information in regard to it.

Mr. President, in connection with that phase of it, what does this resolution seek to obtain? The official cablegram, word for word, translated from the cipher. What would that furnish the enemy? A keen, alert man, who was acquainted with ciphers, could possibly get this cipher. We do not know who would get it. Spies with a copy of the cipher and a copy of the cablegram translated would be furnished a great deal of information, and it might enable Germany and our enemies to obtain a cipher to our code regarding cablegrams sent to the Secretary of the Navy. From time immemorial it has been a rule of the Navy, even in giving out interviews, never to give the words used in the cablegram, because it gives an indication by which some person might get the cipher.

Now, there is no occasion for that portion of the resolution. The only benefit that could come from the passage of the resolution would be to furnish information to spies and Germany to unravel, if they can, our code. It does more than that. It would give our base of supply—when they landed, where they landed. I do not believe there is a Senator here, not even the Senator from Pennsylvania, who would desire that information to be furnished the enemy.

Now, take the second part of the resolution, in connection with the Public Bureau of Information. The resolution directs Secretary Daniels to furnish the name of every person employed in the Bureau of Information, the salary, their duties, and all rules and regulations. Why is it not addressed to the President of the United States? The President of the United States issued the Executive order creating the Bureau of Information. It is paid for and the work is done under the appropriation of $100,000,000 given the President by Congress to use in his discretion. Secretary Daniels has nothing to do with naming these parties or paying their salaries. There is no occasion to ask a subordinate to furnish information in regard to the President, under whose authority and by whose Executive order and by the discretion given him by Congress this bureau has been created.

Mr. President, even if the name of the President was in the resolution I am not in favor of it. We are confronted with a great war. People may come here and talk and make suggestions for peace, but there will be no peace that is honorable to America, none that we can submit to, until we have wrested from Germany a promise on her part that she will no longer invade our rights and assail our honor. We are in a great war, and the energies of the Senate should be directed to preparing for that war, organizing our forces. The President of the United States has heavy and great burdens upon him. Not since this Government was organized have such burdens and such troubles and such perplexing questions come to the Executive. Lincoln had great burdens, but his were mostly domestic. In addition to the domestic troubles, we are found in a world war with our allies in intricate and delicate situations. The honor and best interests of this country are involved. It is no time at the very beginning of this war to come here and try by all kinds of resolutions to destroy the confidence of the country in the integrity, the capacity, and the ability of the President of the United States. Whether some men like him or not, the country has elected him Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, and Congress has decreed war. The Constitution directs him as President to wage the war. At the beginning of the war this resolution implies, when you ask for this information, that you can not trust to his discretion, his judgment, or fairness even in employing a bureau of censorship.

Has anything been done to justify any lack of confidence in the President? He has borne himself superbly, magnificently, and splendidly under trying circumstances. The world is ablaze with his splendid messages and state papers, and when we are gone those state papers will be noted for their wisdom, their justice, their fairness in laying down broadly, strongly, and patriotically the rights of mankind. Men may sneer at them. They sneered the same way at the splendid papers, the splendid policy, and the splendid fight made by Abraham Lincoln; but I am here to tell you that the American people will not tolerate in the Senate or elsewhere continued irritation of the President of the United States, who every hour and minute is occupied in a patriotic effort to win this war for America.

It is no time to indulge in frivolous, petty inquiries and minor investigations, the only object and the only purpose of which can be to bring discredit on and lack of confidence in those who must and will wage this war. The Constitution gives the President the authority to wage war; and I am glad to say the Republicans have voted for measures to enable him to wage the war. I hope they will go further, and at the beginning of this war, except on strong, material, and important matters, do nothing to irritate and nothing to exhibit partisanship, nothing except what may contribute to the organization and efficiency of the great forces of America to win this war.

I do not oppose investigations when they are needed and when they are necessary. The Senator from New Jersey introduced a resolution here for a naval investigation. There had been a premature explosion of shells on some of our ships and there was a question in the mind of the public, in my mind, and in the minds of many Senators, as to whether or not our arms and ammunition were up to date and such as ought to be used or whether we should promptly obtain other ammunition. I invited a most thorough investigation. It was held; it was thorough and complete; and not the slightest criticism has been made of that investigation. The report of the committee was unanimous; good was accomplished; the trouble was ascertained and eliminated.

But, Mr. President, I concede nothing of that sort in this resolution, nothing that can bring any good, nothing that can accomplish any result, but it will simply add to the irritation.

Go further, as to the second part of the resolution, and let me ask, Do you want to have the name and the duties of every man who is gathering, disseminating, and publishing information for the Government in other countries, in places where it is important; do you want the names of the people who are trying to locate the wireless stations from which information is conveyed to the enemy, disclosed to the public? I repeat, there is nothing in this resolution that can bring good; nothing that is demanded; nothing that is needed. I hope the Senate will not pass the resolution.

Mr. President, we had as well realize that we are in a great war; we might as well realize that this war must be conducted by the President and by his administration. Everything that can add to the success of the war, independent of politics or party lines, should be done. I do not think this is any time to be talking about peace. Are we to discuss and talk peace when Germany still glories in her submarine warfare and denies three-fourths of all our commerce the privilege of entering the seas, which are free to all, with no apology for attacking our flag, sinking our ships, or killing our citizens? Are we to talk of peace before we have even organized our Army? To my mind the address of the German chancellor is more a gauge of battle than an overture of peace. Peace is only to be found now in a vigorous prosecution of this war. Our energies should all be directed to this purpose and our time and energies not consumed in small, trivial, irritating matters. Large, important matters are now crowding for solution, and these should occupy our time.

Mr. President, I hope this resolution will not pass. I repeat, no good can come from it; it can do nothing but furnish information to the enemy.

Mr. LODGE obtained the floor.

Mr. TILLMAN. Does the Senator from Massachusetts desire to make a speech?

Mr. LODGE. I desire to address the Senate. I believe I have the floor.

Mr. TILLMAN. I want to move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. LODGE. I have the floor, and I am not going to yield for that purpose.

Mr. SWANSON. I desire to have printed in the RECORD a letter of Secretary Daniels.

Mr. LODGE. I yield for the Senator to have that done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY,
Washington, July 21, 1917.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Referring to your inquiry with reference to the safe arrival of all the troops in the first transports which the Navy convoyed to France, and the telegrams from Admiral Gleaves stating that they were attacked by submarines, I have the honor to make the following reply:

Late in the afternoon of July 3, the welcome news came that the last ship of the convoys and transports carrying the first American soldiers and marines to fight in France had reached its destination in safety, without accident or injury to men or ships. The Navy Department had known for five days prior to their arrival that two attacks by submarines had been made, and you can well understand the painful anxiety lest torpedoes should have caused the loss of some of the brave men who were carrying out this hazardous enterprise. You may imagine, therefore, the unspeakable relief to me which the news announcing the arrival of the last ship brought. This relief was, of course, shared by all others in the department who had been apprehensive every minute since June 28, when Admiral Gleaves, in a brief cable, had reported that submarines had made attacks upon two divisions of the transports.

As soon as the news was communicated by an officer of the department, I hastened to the War Department to apprise the Secretary of War of the fact, for I knew he had felt the deepest solicitude, as he, too, was informed of the attacks. It was in no formal manner, I assure you, that the good news was given to Secretary Baker, and we shook hands in exultation over the safety of our sailors and soldiers and the accomplishment of the first stage of giving present military aid to the allies.

In expression of his feelings, Secretary Baker sent the following letter:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, July 3, 1917.

Hon. JOSEPHUS DANIELS,
Secretary of the Navy.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Word has just come to the War Department that the last ships convoying Gen. Pershing's expeditionary force to France arrived safe to-day. As you know, the Navy assumed the responsibility for the safety of these ships on the sea and through the danger zone. The ships themselves and their convoys were in the hands of the Navy, and now that they have arrived, and carried, without the loss of a man, our soldiers who are the first to represent America in the battle for democracy, I beg leave to tender to you, to the admiral, and to the Navy, the hearty thanks of the War Department and of the Army. This splendid achievement is an auspicious beginning, and it has been characterized throughout by the most cordial and effective cooperation between the two military services.

Cordially, yours,

NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

I immediately sent the following reply:

THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY,
Washington, July 4, 1917.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: The Navy accepts the thanks and gratitude of the Army as an expression of fraternal esteem rather than as an acknowledgment of sole achievement. The movement of the expeditionary forces, carried out with such complete success, was planned in joint conferences and goes to the people as a proof of the effectiveness that lies in intimate cooperation between the two great military branches of the Government.

This generous concentration of activities is as thrilling a thing to me as the safe passage of our transports through the ocean lanes. With Army and Navy thinking as one, planning as one, fighting as one, the great purpose of America is expressed in terms of invincibility.

In behalf of the men whose courage gave safe conduct to courage, I send to you the greeting of the Navy, awaiting in full confidence for the day when the valor of your soldiers will write new and splendid chapters in the heroic history of our liberty-loving land. You, who have shared with me the anxiety of these days of intolerable suspense, will know the full and happy heart out of which I write.

Sincerely, yours,

JOSEPHUS DANIELS.

Hon. NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

At once a statement was prepared and given out that evening, which I knew would intensely gratify all Americans. The message of Rear Admiral Gleaves announcing the attacks, of course, had not been given to the public, and consequently it had been spared the anxiety, when the foreboding ended their rejoicing would have exceeded anything I can express.

The statement which I gave to the public conveyed the feeling of all who had been waiting and hoping for the reassuring telegram. It began with these words: "It is with the joy of a great relief that I announce to the people of the United States the safe arrival in France of every fighting man and every fighting ship." And then followed the account of the dangers which had been encountered.

These facts were stated not in the very words of the Gleaves cablegram, for it is the immemorial policy of the department in time of war not to employ the language of a message coming in code. Otherwise it would be easy for the enemy to learn the cipher. Moreover, the message of the rear admiral contained the names of the ships, which for military reasons are never given out during a war. The language used, as reference to the cablegrams will show, therefore, was not the identical language of the cablegram, but contained the material facts of the safe arrival of the transports and convoys, the deliverance from submarine attacks, and the successful conclusion of that part of the enterprise.

The important part of the statement given to the public was that all our soldiers and marines and ships had been convoyed to France in safety. Two of the groups arrived without being attacked and two were unsuccessfully attacked. The rejoicing over their arrival was heightened by the fact that far outside the so-called danger zone they had been twice unsuccessfully attacked. If the terms "battle" and "attacked in force" are open to criticism, the fact still remains that the rejoicing was warranted. If the torpedoes in either of the attacks had sunk American ships the criticism made would not have concerned itself with the difference between what might have been called a "battle" or an "encounter" or a "brush."

The cablegrams from the rear admiral, which have not been given to the public for reasons stated above, are, of course, subject to the inspection of the Naval Affairs Committee.

Sincerely, yours,

JOSEPHUS DANIELS.

Hon. B. R. TILLMAN,
Chairman Committee on Naval Affairs, United States Senate.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, there are very few Members of the Senate with whom I agree more cordially about this war than I do with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]. As he well knows, I agree most absolutely with him in what he has said about peace in his closing remarks. The peace which the German chancellor talks about is the peace that would be an absolute defeat for us. If we should accept such a peace as that, it would be nothing short of murder to send our soldiers to the front, and robbery to take the money of our people and then leave the world in the statu quo ante bellum. If we are not in this war to secure our safety in the future and also make secure the liberty and democracy of the world by guaranties which are unmistakable, then we ought to have never entered into the war at all.

The Senator from Virginia has stated my feeling about this German peace talk fully and explicitly, and I am absolutely with him in the position he is taking about the war and about the chatter of peace at this time.

Mr. President, the Senator from Virginia also knows that there is no better friend of the Navy in either branch of Congress than am I. I was on the committee that authorized the construction of the first three battleships in 1890 in the House of Representatives. I have supported the Navy in every possible way from that day to this. The Senator from Virginia knows I think better than anybody else, that I have labored in the last three years with him, and he deserves the greatest possible credit for his labors in that direction, to do all that was possible to be done to support and to upbuild the American Navy.

The American Navy, Mr. President, has never failed in all our history not only to do its duty but to succeed. We have had misfortunes with the Army; we have had failures; but if you will examine the history of the United States from the day when Truxtun defeated the French frigate L'Insurgente down to the voyage of our troops to France, you will find that the American Navy has never failed. No one has attacked the American Navy. No one ever will attack it in my presence without reply from me. Nobody is more dexterous than my good friend from Virginia in occasionally substituting an unreal issue for a real issue. The issue here is not the American Navy. No one has ridiculed it; no one has criticized it. The criticism has been directed to Mr. Creel, and Mr. Creel, thank God, is not the American Navy.

They are two wholly different things. Give the American Navy and the American naval officers their opportunity and they will never fail. Nobody has criticized them. There has been criticism of Mr. Creel, and the reason the inquiry is made of the Secretary of the Navy is that he is one of the board which controls the public information. He is, in part at least, responsible for Mr. Creel. Mr. Creel is one of his subordinates. The Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of State are the three members of the Public Information Board.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. LODGE. I do.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator is mistaken. The President appointed Mr. Creel a member of the board outside of official life, and made him chairman of that board. He is not the subordinate of the other officials.

Mr. LODGE. Very well. The three officers I have named are members of the board. The Secretary of State controls his own information; the Secretary of War, after a recent lesson, will control his, I hope and trust; and the result is that it leaves the Secretary of the Navy and Mr. Creel.

Our ships went over. The voyage fortunately was entirely successful; our troops were landed in safety. Two of the four units were attacked by submarines. There is no doubt of that fact. It is believed that one of the submarines was sunk. I hope so; and I think there is good evidence to show that it was.

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] is being blamed here for his resolution on account of the fact, as alleged, that it will disclose information to the enemy. Those ships were attacked outside of the war zone. They took, if I am not misinformed, a somewhat unusual course. Somebody knew where they would be at a certain hour in the ocean outside the war zone; some German knew that fact. That is why the submarine was there; that is why it was there the second time. Somebody knew it. Did that information come from a resolution of inquiry in the Senate? Did it come because code letters had been published? No; it was obtained before that. It became known because there are spies in this country, spies in this city, spies in the departments. I do not imagine the Senator from Pennsylvania has the faintest idea of doing anything or bringing out anything which shall reveal our naval code. Of course, that ought not to be done.

The objection made is that on those simple facts, greatly to the credit of the American Navy, we were treated by Mr. Creel with a large and bombastic account. Dispatches came to this country showing that a part of our troops had arrived. That information ought not to have been published until they all had arrived. The news bureaus had that information, but did not publish it. It got out through the permission of Mr. Creel, or through some misunderstanding with his office, and it disturbed the Secretary of War, very justly, when the news got out.

We are not investigating the American Navy; we are trying to investigate Mr. Creel and his bureau. It is absurd to undertake to say that because we do not like what Mr. Creel is doing we are attacking the American Navy. The American Navy has nothing to do with Mr. Creel. Congress refused to give him the powers that were asked, and rightly refused. Both Houses refused; but he goes on—one of these irresponsible personal agents without definite office. He employs men, he spends large amounts of the public money, and it is considered an impertinence if we ask where the public money is spent. That is not a criticism of the American Navy; that has nothing to do with the American Navy. If it is necessary to eulogize the American Navy I think I can undertake to do that almost as well as the Senator from Virginia. I have defended it many times, and I could do so again; but I do not think it is necessary to defend the American Navy because Mr. Creel is attacked. They are not responsible for him. The officers and men who man our ships did not create Mr. Creel.

Now, Mr. President, we must keep many things secret. I know the State Department is doing it; I am sure the War Department is doing it; and when the Navy Department abandons Mr. Creel the Secretary will do the same.

The Senator says it is not desirable to have it known where our ships landed in France. I know where they landed, and I did not get the information from the Navy Department or in confidence. It is known to the press, and the press, which has shown throughout this country a most amazing and fine spirit in holding back any information that could possibly do harm to the American cause, is meddled with and interfered with by Mr. Creel. The things that have come out, like Mr. Root's party being in Chicago and the landing of the first troops, have come out through misunderstandings with Mr. Creel's office.

It has never been the fault of the press. They have, as I have said, amazed and rejoiced me by the tact, sense, and patriotism they have displayed in regard to keeping secret information which could be of any use to the enemy. If you will find out who told the German submarines where our units were to be on a certain day in the open ocean, you will then do some great good in protecting our troops. Stopping a Senate resolution will not protect them. That tells nothing whatever. We are not going to reveal our code; we are not going to disclose the names of the ships. It is necessary that those be kept secret, and secrecy will be preserved; but it is not through Senate resolutions that these things get out. They got out before any Senate resolution was ever dreamed of.

But it is the fashion to saddle everything on to Congress. One can not speak or criticize anybody, no matter who he is, some unknown genius perhaps, plucked out of the bushes day before yesterday, without being told he is attacking the Government and attacking the President. Now, the country is one thing and the Government is another; and the Government is one thing but the individuals who compose it are another, and they are all human and not infallible. We are a part of the Government. That seems an amazing statement to make, but we are part of the Government under the Constitution, and I believe we have a right to know how the public money is spent. I say to you, the money that is being wasted in Creel's bureau is perhaps a little thing, but nothing could be done more helpful to the President and the administration than a strict watch of the expenditures by Congress. If these vast sums of money, vast beyond anything that was ever dreamed of before, are to be poured out by agents, many of whom are utterly unknown except perhaps for personal admiration wisely bestowed, or for petty political services, agents with no public responsibility, you are laying up a day of reckoning which we shall all deplore. Everyone who is an American——

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. HARDWICK. I notice the criticism has been made in certain places that Mr. Lincoln's committee on the conduct of the war was a source of infinite irritation and trouble to the country. Was it because the committee interfered with the conduct of campaigns, and the selection, promotion, and demotion of generals, or because it checked up expenditures and contracts? Can the Senator tell me as to that?

Mr. LODGE. In the Civil War?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes, sir.

Mr. LODGE. It is not apparent, so far as I have examined history—and I have looked with some care through the great life of Lincoln by Nicolay and Hay—that they ever harassed the President in the conduct of the war. That committee was not only a partisan committee in the sense that its members were all Republicans, as I remember, but they were all Republicans of a violent faction of the Republican Party; and yet Hay and Nicolay say in their history—and they are, I think, fairly sensitive about Mr. Lincoln's reputation and interests—that the committee, despite all those drawbacks—and it did some very unwise things, some unjust things, in my judgment—despite that, it deserved praise rather than blame.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for one other suggestion?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. HARDWICK. I can see why it might be a very unwise thing to have a committee of Congress constantly endeavoring to meddle with the conduct of military or naval campaigns or operations, or constantly endeavoring to select generals, or admirals, or such things as that, or to change the plan of military operations.

Mr. LODGE. Nothing could be worse—nothing.

Mr. HARDWICK. I quite agree to that idea; but it is inconceivable to my mind, at least, how it could be embarrassing to the country or to any government to have a congressional checking-up of the money that we appropriate out of the Public Treasury.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, it would be deplorable to have Congress try to carry out any of the purely executive functions. I have said it over and over again. Nothing could be more deplorable than for Congress to meddle in the conduct of the Navy and the Army. That would be worst of all. But still, under the Constitution, so far as it remains, we still must vote the money; and if we vote the money—not our money, but the money of the people, to be represented in great loans and tremendous taxes—I think we have a right to know how the money is spent.

Mr. SWANSON and Mr. WEEKS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, if that is true the Senate has already organized committees to investigate and report upon the expenditures in every department of this Government—the Treasury Department, the War Department, the Navy Department, and so on. If they do not meet, if they do not exercise their functions, it is the fault of the committees and not that there is not sufficient organization in the Senate to accomplish that purpose. That is the only purpose of the organization of these committees.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, that is another example of the readiness and ingenuity of my friend from Virginia in raising a wholly unreal issue. We know what those committees on expenditures are. They amount to nothing. They never have amounted to anything, and they never will. They never were intended to amount to anything. Besides, there is not a single one of all of the committees which is formed to consider the conduct of the expenditures of the war—not one.

I now yield to my colleague.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, the question asked by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] voices what seems to be a rather general opinion and feeling on the part of men even in very high places. I have had a careful investigation made, so far as it could be done, of everything that Mr. Lincoln has said, and there is not a single word in anything that he ever said critical of the action in the appointment of the committee on the conduct of the war.

Mr. LODGE. That, I am sure, is true, from the collection of his speeches and letters made by Nicolay and Hay, which I have examined myself. The only allusion there to the committee on the conduct of the war is an order which Lincoln signed, directing Gen. Butler to obey the summons of the committee.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me, what good would this committee do? The Appropriations Committees do their duty when they report to the Senate, and the House and Congress make appropriations for a certain purpose. Now, the executive departments expend this money. If they make bad contracts, if they are extravagant, the responsibility is on them. What has Congress to do with it? Could we set aside a contract?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I do not take that view. I think if there is corruption or extravagance or bad contracts made this is the great jury where it should come. We raise the money. We can not escape our responsibility by shifting it on to somebody else. We are responsible for that expenditure. We have a right to know how it is made. We have a right to have some account of what is being done. It is for us to defend the public money. It is our undoubted right to appropriate it.

Mr. OVERMAN. Have we any right to expend this money?

Mr. LODGE. No; we have not; but we have a right to know how it is expended.

Mr. OVERMAN. We might want a committee to investigate some particular transaction; but when we appoint a committee to go and look after the money that the Executive has a right to expend, then we can do nothing but smell around. That is what it is for; nothing else.

Mr. LODGE. Well, when the Senator had his lobby committee he did not seem to mind "smelling around" particularly.

Mr. OVERMAN. The smelling around did some good in that case.

Mr. LODGE. Very little good.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not think the country will agree with the Senator.

Mr. LODGE. Well, I think so. I have not seen any good it has done. I believe it is to be revived. But, of course, we have always had committee investigations. That is our duty. That is one thing we are here for, and the time to get at it is now—not when the men have escaped with their plunder; not when the extravagances have all been committed and closed; not when we have failed in important military and naval operations because the money was improperly spent. We have some rights here, and one of them is the control of money, and that can not be taken from us.

I did not get up, however, to argue the question of the committee on the conduct of expenditures. That is a question which will be very fully discussed before the food bill goes out of the Senate. The views of the President expressed this morning, with all submission, I venture to say are open to some discussion. But I did not mean to discuss them now. I was bringing the discussion back solely to this question of Mr. Creel, a man to whom Congress refused to give power. The office he holds is created under the $100,000,000 fund given to the President for the general defense of the country. Mr. Creel, apparently, is part of the general defense of the country; and the little Government publication which he is publishing, and the scores of people whom I am told he has employed to do what might be done by a stenographer and a couple of clerks, are being paid for out of that fund.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question there?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. JAMES. Is it the position of the Senator, therefore, that Congress has the right to and ought to inquire into how the President is expending this $100,000,000?

Mr. LODGE. Why, certainly, Mr. President. We have not any "divine rights" in this country yet. They may come, but they are not here now.

Mr. JAMES. And that that should be done during the war?

Mr. LODGE. At any time.

Mr. JAMES. At this time?

Mr. LODGE. Everybody is responsible. Even the President of the United States is responsible to the people and for the people's money.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to his colleague?

Mr. LODGE. I do.

Mr. WEEKS. Before my colleague gets away from the question that was raised by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] I wish to read an extract from the life of Abraham Lincoln, written by Mr. W. O. Stoddard, who was one of the secretaries at the White House during Mr. Lincoln's incumbency. He says:

> It was not long before the "legislative branch" of the Government began to interfere with the "executive branch" in military matters. It was little more patriotic than constitutional, but Mr. Lincoln had no manner of objection. When, in December, 1861, Congress appointed a strong and capable "Committee on the Conduct of the War," its members were at once taken into hearty and intimate consultation. What would surely have been a peril or a hindrance to a weak or selfish ruler was transformed at once into an additional and powerful guaranty of congressional cooperation. It was not so much thenceforward that Congress had assumed a part of the executive province, but that the Executive had deftly provided himself with personal and official representatives upon the floor of Senate and House.
> This committee, constantly advised with, cordially invited to investigate, to consider, to come and to go, and to know everything before it happened, became a priceless safety valve for the growing discontent over inexplicable delays. Without it there can now be little question that Mr. Lincoln would have been more seriously misunderstood and even antagonized by the body of men nominally represented by the committee.
> The President of the United States is constitutionally the Commander in Chief, and Abraham Lincoln was also actually dictator; but he was entirely at ease as to all his rights and dignities when a joint committee of Senators and Representatives freely summoned before them his military officers by the dozen, and called for their views of things in general and their professional opinions of battles and campaigns. He knew beforehand that the sure result would be the strong and unanimous sympathy of that "jury" of clear-headed men, with him personally, and their approval of the general outlines of his policy, however much they might disagree among themselves or with him as to details of specific operations.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, there is no doubt that that is all historically true. Mr. Lincoln was really a very great man, but I did not mean to discuss the question of the committee on the conduct of expenditures during the war. That is another question, and it will come up on another field. I wish to bring the debate back to the real question, which has nothing to do with the American Navy. The American Navy did their full duty. They did it with immense success. They carried our troops over in safety. They will carry a great many more in safety, I believe. England has carried 400,000 men from Canada to the French front in safety, and I believe that our Navy will do it just as well, if not better. Our torpedo-boat destroyers have done, and are doing, great work on the other side of the water. It is not for me to tell just what they have done, but they are doing, and they have done, great work. Has anybody moved to give them thanks? Not yet. We have put on merchant ships naval crews, and those lonely merchant vessels, without convoys, have met and fought submarines, sometimes successfully, sometimes not; but those naval gunners on every ship on which they have been placed by the care and forethought of the Navy Department have done splendid work and are deserving of all praise, just as the men who convoyed our troops are deserving of all praise. But because a bombastic dispatch sent out here by a man in an arm chair in Washington leads to widespread criticism all over the country, and an inquiry is made as to why he is doing this, and what money he is spending, then the answer is, "You must not attack the American Navy."

That is all I got up to say—that I resent having Mr. Creel treated as the American Navy. We should fare badly without the American Navy, but I think the Government would totter on without the Bureau of Public Information or even without Mr. Creel.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] undertakes to shift the issue. I think the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] is probably as able to state his own position and the intent and purpose of his own resolution as the Senator from Massachusetts is to interpret it for him. The Senator from Massachusetts tells us that it is not an attack upon the American Navy or any officer of the American Navy. Let the Senator from Pennsylvania speak for himself. He spoke in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD upon this question, and after predicating his resolution upon an editorial that appeared in the New York Times which he incorporates as a part of his speech, which paper two days after that carried a very thrilling account of this attack upon our transports at sea, the Senator from Pennsylvania uses this language:

> I am curious to know how the American correspondent lost his inborn enterprise and failed to report this battle, or whether the battle was an hallucination of the Secretary of the Navy and the chairman of the Committee on Public Information.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, when did the Secretary of the Navy become an officer of the Navy?

Mr. JAMES. Well, that is the point I wanted to make to the Senator.

Mr. LODGE. I should like to hear it explained.

Mr. JAMES. Then the Senator from Massachusetts does not deny that the purpose of this is an attack upon the Secretary of the Navy?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I did not say so. I asked when the Secretary of the Navy became an officer of the Navy?

Mr. JAMES. But I am asking the Senator now to say whether it was or not?

Mr. LODGE. I think it undoubtedly reflects on the Secretary of the Navy, and if he is responsible for Mr. Creel, he deserves to be reflected upon. Mr. Creel has nothing to do with the Navy.

Mr. JAMES. That is the point I desire to make, and I do not wish any shifting of the issue.

Mr. LODGE. Well, the Senator need not fear that I will shift the issue.

Mr. JAMES. The purpose of this resolution was an attack upon the Secretary of the Navy, and there is no use in trying to conceal it.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. JAMES. I do.

Mr. PENROSE. Does the Senator mean to state that I, as a Member of this body and a Senator from Pennsylvania, have no right to criticize the Secretary of the Navy or any other governmental official that I choose to criticize?

Mr. JAMES. The Senator has a perfect right to attack him, but when he does it he must do it in the open.

Mr. PENROSE. Am I not doing it in the open?

Mr. JAMES. Certainly. I am not disputing the fact that the Senator is attacking the Secretary of the Navy; I am not disputing the fact that he is doing it courageously; but I am saying that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] sought to make this an attack upon Mr. Creel, when I knew that it was an attack upon the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, it does not require any courage to attack the Secretary of the Navy, and I am not attacking him. I am seeking an inquiry, and it is evidently the purpose of the majority to suppress inquiry and investigation from this time on.

Mr. JAMES. No, Mr. President; the majority has no desire to suppress anything. If the Senator will read closely his remarks uttered this morning in the Senate—and the public will read them—perhaps they will see that his reason for this resolution was amply disclosed by his remarks this morning; that it is an attack upon Mr. Creel because he published a speech of the President of the United States seeking to get cheaper coal for the American people.

Mr. PENROSE. Oh, Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, the copy of the Official Bulletin referring to the President's address—I will not qualify it with an adjective—to the coal operators was handed to me this morning as I entered the Senate Chamber by a gentleman who called my attention to the overzealous officiousness of Mr. Creel in editing the President's speech and putting a lot of it in italics. This was several weeks after I prepared this resolution and introduced it.

Mr. JAMES. I have no doubt that a man is "overzealous" in the eyes of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] when he undertakes to edit any sort of an utterance that seeks to get cheaper coal for the people of the United States. But now let us come down to this resolution introduced by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

He introduced it because there was an editorial in the New York Times that said it ought to be investigated; that there was a correspondent for the Associated Press on board of one of these transports, and he sent back a cablegram saying that they had an uneventful journey, and that these reports coming here from the admiral of the Navy, given out by the Secretary of the Navy, must be at once impeached, because an Associated Press correspondent, not an official of the United States Government, failed to be upon one of the four different and distinct units of transports that were sent abroad. I hope the Senate has not arrived at the time in this war when it is willing to impeach the official dispatches of an admiral of the Navy simply because some correspondent failed to be on board of one of the transports that was fired upon.

When this war was declared and before it was declared, we were told by those who were speaking for the Imperial German Government we could not send any soldiers across the sea, that that would be impossible, that the ships would be sunk. Now, after the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of War had routed the ships that made their successful journey to France carrying thousands upon thousands of American soldiers, bearing the love and hope and prayers of the American people, and they had gone successfully through the death zone swarming with submarines, they are to be sneered at upon the floor of the Senate and an investigation is to be had here because two attacks by two submarines is not a battle; it is not an attacking force. However, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] tells us that these ships went an unusual route.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 4283) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. SMOOT rose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky has the floor.

Mr. JAMES. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] told us these ships went an unusual route. I suppose if they had been attacked and several hundred or several thousand of our American soldiers had been sent to the bottom of the sea this spirit of hypercritical criticism would have been manifested upon the floor of the Senate here by a resolution to investigate the Secretary of the Navy because of his inefficiency in sending our soldiers abroad; but when they make safely the journey, a matter of thanksgiving upon the part of all real patriotic Americans, resolutions are brought in here that we must investigate whether there was one submarine or whether there were two submarines or whether there were any submarines that attacked these ships, because a correspondent of a New York newspaper has said there was no attack, and this is to be taken as a basis for an investigation and an impeachment of the official dispatches of the admiral in charge of these ships.

The Senator from Massachusetts states that we have a perfect right to investigate the $100,000,000 fund being used by the President of the United States. Of course Congress has that right, but I do not believe that the country shares with the Senator from Massachusetts or any other Senator upon this floor in a spirit of a lack of confidence in the President of the United States. I do not believe this early in the war this spirit of copperheadism, this spirit of attack upon men who are bearing the multiplicity of duties and mountains of burdens, must be had in order to make their duties much more onerous.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. JAMES. I yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Did the Senator use the term "copperheadism" advisedly on the floor of the Senate?

Mr. JAMES. I used the word "copperheadism" as I understand it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. "The Senator from New York" is very glad to know in what respect and in what definition.

Mr. JAMES. I may not use the word "copperheadism" according to the refined distinctions the Senator from New York probably would use it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. There is but one understanding of what the word "copperhead" means in American history.

Mr. JAMES. I probably understand as well as the Senator from New York what the word "copperhead" means; but I say if this spirit that seems to be manifested here upon this floor is to be followed up, then America is to be crippled at home in this war, and right here in this Chamber.

Simply because a New York newspaper publishes an editorial saying that a correspondent had stated there was no attack, immediately a resolution must be brought into the Senate here and the officials appointed by the President under the $100,000,000 fund must be investigated, their names must be given out, the official message must be printed, the salaries paid to them must be given to the public, and their duties must be made known to the public, which information would be very valuable to Germany.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. JAMES. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I think I remember, being a Delegate in the lower House, that in the start of the Spanish-American War $50,000,000 was voted to President McKinley, and, if my memory is right, no one ever thought or asked anything about any investigation throughout the Spanish-American War as to that fund.

Mr. LODGE. That fund was all accounted for.

Mr. JAMES. And this fund will be accounted for.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. This fund will be accounted for.

Mr. JAMES. Does the Senator from Massachusetts mean to intimate that the President of the United States is not handling this fund of $100,000,000 to the best advantage of the American people?

Mr. LODGE. I never suggested anything of the kind.

Mr. JAMES. I am glad the Senator does not.

Mr. LODGE. Neither am I suggesting that it is sacred and that we have not a right to know how the public money is being spent and I advise the Senator from Kentucky that calling names here and talking about copperheads will not prevent inquiry.

Mr. JAMES. I will call the Senator's attention to the further fact that this character of attack upon Government officials who are doing their whole duty to the best of their ability will not find favor with the American people.

But let us go a little further into this resolution. The New York Times of the 7th day of July, two days after the editorial upon which the Senator based his resolution, published an account of the attack of the submarines upon our transports. Oh, it is very easy to sit securely in the Senate or in the palatial quarters of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] and flout and belittle those far out upon the distant sea for assuming that two submarines firing upon them "is a battle" or an "attack in force." But I imagine that if the precious freight of the Senator himself had been upon one of those transports, he would have thought it was an attack in force and a very considerable battle.

Mr. PENROSE. Will the Senator permit an interruption? For the last time I want to deny that I am attacking the American Navy or anybody else. I am introducing a resolution of inquiry.

Mr. JAMES. You just admitted that you were attacking the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. PENROSE. No; I said I have a right to attack him if I choose. I want to state here to the Senator and to the country that, in my opinion, the administration of the Navy Department and the War Department is marked by an indecision and inefficiency which will rapidly become a national scandal and which I intend to have investigated in some way at an early opportunity.

Mr. JAMES. Probably you have no more basis for that unwarranted attack than you have for this resolution, and that was the flimsy editorial of a New York newspaper based on the cablegram of a correspondent who was not on board the transport. That is the spirit that I am inveighing against here now. That is the very spirit that I am attacking, that a Senator from a sovereign State will rise here and without any basis in fact or truth attack the War Department and the Navy Department.

Mr. PENROSE. If the Senator will permit me, every newspaper correspondent in Washington or who visits Washington, and every business man who comes here to deal with these departments, and every citizen who is familiar in any way with the working of them will agree with me.

Mr. JAMES. I do not believe that there is any truth in that statement, Mr. President, but I hope the Senator from Pennsylvania, in his official capacity, is not willing to come and make an attack upon the Government of his country, that which is operating its Navy and its Army, merely upon the idle rumor of newspaper correspondents that has not been given to the public. Mr. President, what would you call that? Is that copperheadism? Is that sniping? No, Mr. President, it rises to the dignity or danger of neither. It is merely "Penrosing."

Mr. President, the American people are back of this war. They are back of the President. Certain attempts to play peanut politics, as is here attempted upon the part of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], will not reward you in the slightest degree. The Republican Party, whose proudest boast is of Lincoln, and that it saved the Union, I can not believe has descended to the low level where it undertakes to become a sniper in the days of the greatest peril to the American Government.

Mr. President, so far as I am concerned, I am going to undertake to hold up the hands of the established Government of our country. We are fighting for the peace, liberty, and safety not only of our own beloved land but for the peace, liberty, and safety of the world. If your party were in control, if your President sat in the White House in this hour of peril, I would not play politics. I would put patriotism above politics. I would put my country above partisanship. And I want to say here and now that if this character of attack is to be continued the American people themselves will settle it very satisfactorily at the very first opportunity they have at the polls.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I do not desire to enter into the discussion of coal troubles or extra charges for coal, nor do I care to take part in the discussion of the propriety of investigating the plan under which Mr. Creel is given some official position. I do wish to express my regret that the Senator from Pennsylvania introduced a resolution without a knowledge of all the facts, which has in part taken from the minds of the American people that just appreciation of the splendid conduct of our officers and men who were upon the vessels recently carrying our troops to France. The Senator from Pennsylvania was misled by an editorial in a New York paper. He was misled by a telegram from the Associated Press. He evidently did not understand that the vessels went across the ocean in four units.

Mr. PENROSE. Will the Senator permit me? I was not misled in any way, neither did I rely upon the clipping from the New York paper. A dozen people connected with the Navy Department, and some Senators have told me that they were fully aware of the bombastic exaggeration of the Gleaves telegram.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, if the Senator was not misled, still the inferences drawn from the resolution which he introduced mislead the public. They create the impression that in point of fact no attack was made upon our vessels. They create the impression that no submarine was sunk, that no torpedo was fired by a submarine at our vessels. The Senator from Pennsylvania read the Associated Press dispatch in vindication of his view that no attack was made. The dispatch had reference to the last unit of the transport. The Senator failed to mention that there were four units, and the Associated Press representative could have been upon but one of them and was really upon the last of the four.

In point of fact, Mr. President, the first two units were attacked. Upon those units there were more than one close and dear to me, and they have returned to the United States since the close of their successful voyage. I can not consent silently to hear anything said to detract from their service or allow an impression to go abroad which will take from the gallant officers connected with the first and second units credit for the service they rendered to their country.

Mr. President, when the facts are fully laid before the people, the commander of the destroyer which sunk the submarine will have to his credit one of the most gallant and successful records in the history of our Navy. As described even by Mr. Creel it lacked the features of heroism by which it will be described by eye witnesses.

I have no doubt that both the first and second units were attacked. I have no doubt that at least one and probably two submarines were destroyed. I have no doubt that the troops upon those vessels were saved by the splendid conduct of the officers upon them, and their conduct and management won a victory over German submarines.

I only desired, Mr. President, to make this statement to join in the effort to check the misapprehension which has gone abroad growing out of this resolution, and growing out of the criticism of Mr. Creel.

It is to me a great pleasure to state that I am sure our officers now in the United States could give evidence in support of more than has been claimed for our Navy in the recent transportation of troops to France.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] in declining to further yield to me for a question characterized my questions as frivolous.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. KENYON. Is the river and harbor bill not before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair laid before the Senate the unfinished business at the hour of 1 o'clock.

Mr. KENYON. I make the point of order that a great war measure should not be delayed by this frivolous discussion.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I shall take but a minute of time.

Mr. PENROSE. We are fighting a naval battle in connection with a great war measure.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas has risen to a parliamentary inquiry. He will state it.

Mr. THOMPSON. I understand the resolution of the Senator from Pennsylvania goes to the calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the rule. It is not before the Senate. The Senator from Colorado will proceed.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The Senator from Pennsylvania was discussing the price of coal and maintaining that $3 was a reasonable rate; he was criticizing the Secretary of the Navy for having endeavored to save money for the people of the United States by getting a lower price for coal; and then he was criticizing Mr. George Creel for having written articles to show that the price of coal at $3 a ton was outrageous. I asked the Senator from Pennsylvania if he did not know that the price of coal was very small compared to this $3 rate which he was defending. I read a statement from the Geological Survey as to the price of coal in the eastern part of the United States, which was exceedingly small compared to the $3 rate. If that is not pertinent, if that is not relevant to the very thing which he was discussing, it is impossible for me to conceive what a relevant question is.

Mr. President, the Senator asked me at what time those quotations were made. I told him I thought about 1912. I knew the price of coal from 1912 or 1911 up to 1915 had varied very little, and the Senator from Pennsylvania ought to have known it, too; but it seems that he did not.

Now, I want to call attention to the coal statistics of the World Almanac for 1917, which gives the value at the mouth of the mine of bituminous coal in various portions of the United States. I call attention to the fact that in the year 1915 the average of the entire year of the price of coal in Pennsylvania was $1.06 a ton. The coal operators wanted to sell it at $3 a ton, and the Senator was criticizing Secretary Daniels for having insisted that the Navy ought to be furnished coal at a less price, and he was criticizing George Creel because he was upholding the Secretary of the Navy in his effort to get a lower price for coal. Then the Senator called my interruption a frivolous one, when it was directly pertinent to the matter before the Senate.

Mr. President, it is not only in Pennsylvania that coal was selling in 1915 at a low price, but we find that in Ohio it was $1.08 a ton at the mouth of the mine. We find further that in the State of Virginia at the mouth of the mine it was selling at 98 cents a ton, and in West Virginia it was selling at 97 cents a ton.

Can it be possible that because there happen to be millions of tons of coal that are produced in his State a Senator can fairly contend that coal that sold for $1.06 a ton on the average during the entire year of 1915 should bring $3 a ton from the Navy of the United States, especially when it is the very means by which we expect to conquer in this war against Germany? There has been no relative increase in the price of labor or in any other agency by which coal is produced.

Mr. President, it seems to me that when the Senator attempts to criticize Secretary Daniels or Mr. Creel by reason of the fact that they took this position he is doing something that is entirely unfair and contrary to the best interests of the United States. Secretary Daniels and Mr. Creel have done everything in their power to prevent the exorbitant prices of coal, and instead of being criticized they should be commended and honored for their effective work.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4285) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). The question is on the first amendment reported by the Committee on Commerce. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, after line 5, insert:

Cape Cod Canal, Mass.: The Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy are hereby authorized to enter into negotiations for the purchase of the existing Cape Cod Canal with the property, franchises, and appurtenances used or acquired for use in connection therewith or appertaining thereto; and they are further authorized, if, in their judgment, the price for such canal is reasonable and satisfactory, to make contracts for the purchase of the same, at the option of the United States, subject to future ratification and appropriation by the Congress. In the event of the inability of the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy to make a satisfactory contract for the voluntary purchase of said Cape Cod Canal and its appurtenances, they are hereby authorized and directed, through the Attorney General, to institute and carry to completion proceedings for the condemnation of said canal and its appurtenances, the acceptance of the award in said proceedings to be subject to the future ratification and appropriation by Congress. Such condemnation proceedings shall be instituted and conducted in, and jurisdiction of said proceedings is hereby given to the district court of the United States for the district of Massachusetts, substantially as provided in "An act to authorize condemnation of land for sites for public buildings, and for other purposes," approved August 1, 1888; and the sum of $5,000 is hereby appropriated to pay the necessary costs thereof and expenses in connection therewith. The said Secretaries are further authorized and directed to report their proceedings hereunder to Congress.

Mr. SMOOT obtained the floor.

Mr. KENYON. I ask the Senator from Utah to yield to me. I wish to suggest the absence of a quorum. There are less than 15 Senators here, and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-nine Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am compelled to attend a meeting of the Finance Committee at 2 o'clock, and I shall therefore confine my remarks at this time upon the pending bill to one question only, and that is, Is it wise now to make the appropriations provided for in the bill for work that is unnecessary and can be postponed to some future time?

In this connection I desire to call attention to the financial condition of our country. I doubt whether Senators realize the amount of money which has already been appropriated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and I am quite sure that Senators are not aware of the amount of appropriations that must yet be made at this session of Congress. When all of these are taken into consideration, the sum that will be appropriated for the present fiscal year will be so stupendous that the mind of man can hardly comprehend it.

I know that it is already too late to begin the cutting down of appropriation bills, but so long as there is an appropriation bill before the Senate, the enactment of which can be postponed for even a year, it ought to be done. This is one such bill, in my opinion.

Mr. President, the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, which were made in the second session of the Sixty-fourth Congress, we thought were of such magnitude that they would take care of all of the expenditures incident to any war in which we might engage. These are the appropriations made and their respective amounts:

For agriculture, $25,929,113.
For the Army, $273,046,322.50.
For the Diplomatic and Consular Service, $5,082,746.66.
For the District of Columbia, $14,172,997.85.
Fortifications, $51,396,593.
Indian affairs, $11,589,736.67.
Legislative appropriation bill, $39,894,592.42.
Military Academy, $1,344,896.18.
The Navy, $517,273,802.08.
Pensions, $160,060,000.
The Post Office, $331,851,170.

The appropriations in the river and harbor bill as it passed the House were $26,893,000.

The sundry civil bill carried $147,363,928.77.

The deficiency appropriations were $168,419,650.52.

The miscellaneous items were $41,093,670.08.

The permanent annual appropriations amounted to $145,864,830.32.

These appropriations, Mr. President, in the second session of the Sixty-fourth Congress, make a total of $1,961,277,050.05.

Take the first session of the Sixty-fifth Congress—the present one—and the following are the appropriations which have been made:

Urgent deficiencies for military and naval establishments, $3,281,094,541.60.

Then, under public act No. 1 at this session of Congress there was appropriated $68,020 for the payment of certain small claims.

Under public act No. 3, for authorizing bond issue and cost of printing the same, there was appropriated $3,007,063,945.46.

In the Army appropriation act we provided $35,000,000 for war-risk insurance.

Since then we have passed an act, which is known as the food-control act, carrying $152,500,000. We have also passed an act for the purpose of building aeroplanes, which is known as the aviation act, carrying $640,000,000.

Mr. President, all those appropriations——

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SMOOT. I will yield in just a moment.

All those appropriations amount to $9,226,993,357.11. Now I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. KELLOGG. I notice the Senator stated the bond issue at $3,000,000,000, and an appropriation of $3,000,000,000, in round numbers.

Mr. SMOOT. I simply included the bond issue of the $3,000,000,000 once, and the printing and costs of $7,063,945.46, both of which amount to $3,007,063,945.46.

Mr. KELLOGG. The Senator then stated a large appropriation of $3,000,000,000 and something in addition.

Mr. SMOOT. No; the Senator misunderstood me.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I was under the same impression as was the Senator from Minnesota [Mr KELLOGG], and I was about to ask the same question which he has asked. In order to clear the matter up I want to ask this question: Has the $3,000,000,000 authorized bond issue, to which the Senator from Utah refers, been appropriated? Does the Senator include the $3,000,000,000 of bonds which Congress authorized to be issued as in any way affecting the total amount of the appropriations made in these two sessions of Congress?

Mr SMOOT. Yes; Congress authorized the purchase of three billions of bonds from foreign countries, and we appropriated the money for them. Of course that has been included in the amount that has been appropriated in the figures which I have already given.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course if we appropriated the money to buy foreign bonds and use the avails of the three billion bond issue for that purpose, that is an appropriation; but how about the rest of the bonds which Congress authorized—the difference between three billion and the seven billion?

Mr. SMOOT. I will come to that later in speaking of our war deductions to be made from these appropriations.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator a question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. KELLOGG. I want to ask, if the Senator takes the total amount of appropriations and then adds the bond issue, has he not duplicated the expenditure?

Mr. SMOOT. No; it required the appropriation in order to purchase the bonds. The Senator from Utah has not added the bond issue to the total amount of appropriations. I have included in the total the appropriation made for the purchase of the bonds from foreign countries and the cost of printing and issuing the bonds, both of which amounts to $3,007,063,945.46.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Excuse me one minute. If we have bought $3,000,000,000 of bonds of foreign countries and put them in our Treasury, that is an asset, is it not, as well as a liability; or, as an expenditure incurred, it is an asset which we hold that would have to be deducted if the bonds are ever paid?

Mr. SMOOT. It will be an asset, of course; but I am trying to arrive at the amount of money which we have actually appropriated and which we have got to provide some means to raise, either by taxation or bond issues.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I see the Senator's idea.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, as I have stated, the total of all these appropriations is $9,226,993,357.11; and I have no doubt that at this session of Congress there will be estimates submitted by the Secretary of the Treasury calling for at least $5,000,000,000 more.

In connection with proposed legislation to raise revenue, the question of the amount we had appropriated and what the estimated income of the Government would be for the present fiscal year was under discussion in the Finance Committee. I made the statement that I had no question in my mind that there would be additional appropriations asked for at this session amounting to $3,000,000,000. My statement was questioned, although I knew in making that statement I was putting the amount below what would be asked for. As a member of the Appropriations Committee, I knew that the appropriations for the Army were based upon a certain number of drafted soldiers to take part in the present war with Germany, and provided for the payment of their compensation for 8 months instead of for 12 months. At different times it has been intimated in the press that additional appropriations will be asked for.

The first amount suggested was $750,000,000; the next was $1,500,000,000; the next was $3,000,000,000. Mr. President, there is no question of doubt that the amount will be at least $5,000,000,000. Five billion dollars added to $9,000,000,000 will make a grand total of appropriations of $14,000,000,000, and we have hardly started this war.

I was looking over the last report available of the amount of bond issues by the countries involved in the present horrible war. That report was dated April 17, 1917. Mark you, in the first year of our entrance into the war our appropriations will be $14,000,000,000. I find that England from the beginning of the war up to April 17, 1917, a period of two years and nine months, has issued in bonds $15,515,000,000. In other words, our appropriations for this one year will be almost as much as the total amount of the bond issues by England from the date the war started up to April 17, 1917. During the same period France has issued $10,532,000,000, Russia has issued $11,896,000,000, Italy $2,520,000,000, Germany $13,726,000,000, Austria $3,652,000,000, Hungary $1,730,000,000.

Why, Mr. President, it seems to me that there should be found no Senator objecting to the closest scrutiny of the expenditure of these huge sums of money which we are called upon to appropriate. We sit here and pass appropriation bills—and how easily it is done—never taking into consideration how this vast sum of money is to be raised. Somebody will have to pay it. It must either be raised by direct taxation or it must be raised by the issuing of bonds, the interest on which will be a burden upon the people for years to come. They are perfectly willing to stand that burden if they are satisfied that the money is expended economically, justly, and for the purpose of winning the war.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KELLOGG in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the Senator if he has compiled any figures as to how this money is to be expended—the amount in loans to other countries and the amount necessary for carrying on the war?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will answer the Senator now, although I expected to come to that question later. Out of the $14,000,000,000 we have authorized loans to foreign countries engaged in war with Germany of $3,000,000,000. Over half of that amount has already been loaned, and there is no question that the other half will be called for within a short time. It has only been a few weeks since we authorized the loan of $3,000,000,000; over half of that sum has already been advanced, and, if we are to believe newspaper reports—which I seldom take any notice of—we will have to provide for many billions more to be advanced to foreign countries engaged in the war.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I was rather interested in the inquiry of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], and I think it has perhaps escaped the attention of the Senator from Utah. Is there any condition attached to the loans we make to foreign Governments as to what they will do with the proceeds of the loans? Can they do as they have a mind to with the money, or do we loan it to them for certain specific purposes?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not think there is any obligation at all on the part of foreign Governments to our Government as to what they shall do with the money borrowed. Of course it is understood that all of the money we advance to foreign nations engaged in the war with us will be used for the prosecution of the war, but I do not think there is any obligation on their part that that money shall be used for that purpose, although I have not the least doubt that it will all be so used.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, is it not generally understood, if the Senator will permit me, that that money is to be used to pay the debts that the allies already owe to American business men, and the remainder, if there be any, is to be spent in the United States for the purchase of munitions and foodstuffs? While we are helping our allies by lending the money, we are at the same time accommodating the American business man by paying debts that might not otherwise be collectible.

Mr. SMOOT. It would be very natural that that should be the case. It would not be a business proposition to send the money, for instance, over to England and then send it right back here to pay obligations of England in this country. What the Senator says is absolutely true, that every dollar of it no doubt will be used for the purpose of paying for purchases made by those countries from business concerns in our own country.

Mr. President, the $3,000,000,000 that we are to loan foreign countries engaged in the war with Germany deducted from the $14,000,000,000 leaves an amount of $11,000,000,000 which must be provided for sooner or later, being the amount of appropriations passed and to be passed for the fiscal year 1918. So it seems to me that every bill should be scrutinized carefully. If the pending bill were a war measure, Senators would not find me objecting to the appropriations carried, no matter how much they might be, but it is not a war measure. I expect to speak upon the bill later, and I shall call attention to the fact that nearly all of the money that is appropriated in this bill is for the purpose of advancing projects which will never be used in any way, nor can they be used, for war purposes, even if the war lasted for three years, which God grant it may not.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I desire to get that point clear in my mind. The figures make me dizzy. Does the Senator say that the appropriations of this session of Congress and of the last session of the Sixty-fourth Congress, outside of any question of bond issues, amount to $11,000,000,000?

Mr. SMOOT. That is exactly what the Senator from Utah says, providing that $5,000,000,000 additional, for which I have no doubt an estimate will come from the Secretary of the Treasury, is appropriated.

Mr. KENYON. Then, up to this time the total amount would be $6,000,000,000?

Mr. SMOOT. Up to this time the total amount is something over $6,000,000,000.

Mr. KENYON. And the Senator anticipates that $5,000,000,000 more will be appropriated before this session of Congress closes?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have no doubt that that amount and much more is going to be requested. I want to say to the Senator that if it is for war purposes, if it is for our Army and our Navy, and it can be shown to the Appropriations Committee that it is for the purpose of carrying out a program, I am sure I am not going to stand in the way of the amount being appropriated.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, does the Senator think that Congress ought to have anything to do with arranging the program for which these billions of dollars are to be appropriated? Certainly the responsibility of Congress does not end with the mere appropriation of the people's money. If that be the limit of a Congressman's duty, I have been laboring all of these years under a serious and misleading idea of what a Congressman's duty really is.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think Congress ought to have something to do with it; but I want to say that after the program is arranged, no matter by whom it is arranged—and I was going to say partly put into operation—then it will be too late for Congress to say that it will not make the appropriations.

Mr. VARDAMAN. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator, but I am compelled to go to a meeting of the Committee on Finance in a few moments.

Mr. RANSDELL. I shall be very brief. I understand the Senator to say that the appropriations of this Congress will probably amount to something like $11,000,000,000. The bill now under consideration carries about $27,000,000——

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. RANSDELL. Which would be something in the neighborhood of one-quarter of 1 per cent, I believe, of the total appropriations?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. RANSDELL. That would not be a very heavy percentage—one-quarter of 1 per cent—would it?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the proponents of river and harbor bills in the past have always argued that, even though the appropriations carried were large, they were necessary for our commerce. Now the Senator refers to relative amounts. I admit $28,000,000 is thought a mere fleabite to-day. We see in this bill the same old creeks, the same old streams, the same old "pork." It has the same old earmarks of all past bills.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield further to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will excuse me, I must close in a moment.

Mr. RANSDELL. I want to ask the Senator one other question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield?

Mr. RANSDELL. In the Senator's speech on the 20th of this month, discussing the food-control bill, he stated that the greatest trouble about the high price of coal was the lack of transportation. I have the Senator's speech before me here, in which he cited a dozen different instances of it.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, there is no doubt about it, Mr. President.

Mr. RANSDELL. I refer the Senator to page 5315 of the RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will allow me to proceed——

Mr. RANSDELL. The Senator said then that the greatest trouble was the lack of transportation. Now, I ask him if, in his judgment, we ought not to do something to help along the transportation shortage, which he then showed was acute in every respect, and if this bill is not calculated to improve, advance, and promote transportation?

Mr. SMOOT. No, Mr. President; the digging out of little creeks in all parts of the country is not going to provide additional transportation nor help the delivery of coal to the market.

Mr. RANSDELL. I deny that this bill is for digging out little creeks, Mr. President.

Mr. SMOOT. I refuse to yield further.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. SMOOT. No; I refuse to yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then the Senator will please not interrupt the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the lack of transportation facilities will not be obviated by the appropriations in this bill. What we need is cars; what we need is engines; what we need is boats. There is plenty of water to carry coal to any of the eastern cities. There are plenty of rails, but we have not the cars; we have not the facilities for carrying the coal.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I refuse to yield.

Mr. RANSDELL. Oh, it is evident that the Senator wants to promote rail transportation but not water transportation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah declines to yield.

Mr. SMOOT. If I had the time, I would yield, but I can not just now.

Mr. RANSDELL. I wish the Senator had the time.

Mr. SMOOT. If I had the time, I would accommodate the Senator.

Mr. RANSDELL. The Senator wants rail transportation. He does not want water transportation.

Mr. SMOOT. I want rail and water transportation, I will say to the Senator, but not such items as is contained in this bill.

Mr. RANSDELL. All right.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say also to the Senator that as long as I am in the Senate of the United States I shall oppose, I shall vote against, and I shall do all in my power to stop the robbing of the Treasury of the United States for the purpose of spending money in projects such as named in this bill.

Mr. RANSDELL. I wish the Senator would specify them.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator knows I can specify them all right.

Mr. RANSDELL. I wish he would do it.

Mr. SMOOT. I notice this: The bill has been cleverly worded this year. In past times we knew what amount would be spent upon the Trinity River or the Red River or some of the other doubtful projects. Now they are bunched together, and we do not know. I say to the Senator now that the time is going to come when appropriations of this kind will not be sanctioned by Congress. What we ought to do now is to finish the projects that are under way, make the appropriations for them, and get them completed; but we appropriate every year just enough to keep a lot of men at work. The silt will fill up almost as much as is taken out each year. No project is ever completed. It runs on and on forever.

Mr. President, I did not want to touch on the bill at all to-day, because I expect to speak upon it later; but in connection with the financial statement I rose to make, when I was interrupted, I want to call attention to what estimated revenue we are to receive for this fiscal year, and from what sources it will come.

From the Postal Service the estimated amount of revenue is $335,276,345.12. The estimated revenues under the existing laws—that is, the internal-revenue laws, the customs receipts, and from all other sources under existing laws—amount to $1,303,000,000. We have also authorized a bond issue of $2,000,000,000. so that with the bond issue of $2,000,000,000 that we have authorized, and with the receipts from all sources, we will receive $3,699,024,345.12. Of course, under the law there is a sinking fund required. We might as well deduct that, because the law is never obeyed. I have introduced in the Senate several times a bill to repeal the law requiring a sinking fund, simply because it has never been put into force by any administration since the Civil War; so we can deduct the amount of that, which is $60,748,000.

Senators, do you see the amount of money we have got to raise? Do you know that it will be decades before this money is paid, even though you impose burdensome taxes upon the people? So, Mr. President, let us be mighty careful and let us scrutinize all the appropriations.

I know, just as the Senator says, that the amount carried by this bill is only $28,000,000. Why, Mr. President, we have come to think in billions now. We used to scrutinize carefully an appropriation bill that carried $10,000,000; but now about the only way to get anything through Congress is to ask for a hundred millions, at least, and it goes through with little discussion; and if it is a billion nobody questions it at all.

I must conclude my remarks for the present. I simply make the statement that I have believing that the people of the United States ought to know the amount of appropriations that have been made and the obligations we are placing upon them. Of course, if the money is spent for the purposes it was appropriated for and the expenditures are scrutinized carefully, I have no question but that the people of the United States, though hoping against hope, will not object in the end to whatever appropriations that are necessary.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, before the able Senator from Utah takes his seat I should like to ask him a question. I want to say in the outset that I most heartily agree with everything that he has to say on the question of economy and prudence in the disbursement of public funds. The power to tax and take from the toil of the laboring man a part of his earnings is a grave and serious function in government. It is a function that ought to be exercised or performed with great caution. Now, I hope the time may never come in the history of this Republic when it will be regarded as an act of disloyalty or treachery to the country for a Senator to ask that the closest scrutiny and greatest care be exercised with reference to appropriations and the disbursement of public funds. There is no difference of opinion between the honorable Senator and myself on that question, but, with reference to the bill pending before the Senate, let me express the hope that the able Senator may find time after he returns from his committee meeting to go through this bill carefully and point out to the Senators the improper items of appropriation and show us in detail the criminal extravagance which he intimates permeates the entire measure. I want the find these improper items myself. I desire to correct any defect of that character in this bill, and I assure the Senator from Utah that I shall vote with him to purge the bill of every dishonest or unmeritorious provision.

There are items in the bill, I admit, that probably the country could get along without, but after going over it very carefully with the committee I was impressed with the fact that most of the appropriations carried in the bill were for the purpose of maintaining and keeping up the work begun some time ago. It is for maintenance, and the failure to make the necessary appropriations at this time would cause the work to deteriorate, and therefore result in great loss to the Government and inconvenience to the people. This talk of "pork barrel" in the rivers and harbors bill has become a fad. It furnishes a popular text for a sermon on economy, and economy is always a popular theme. It is very easy for a Senator to say that a measure is without merit, but it is not always easy to prove the statement. I shall be very grateful to the Senator from Utah if he will, when he comes back, point out the defects in this measure, and I promise him and other Senators who are opposing this bill to contribute my utmost to ridding the country of any measure or policy which robs and plunders the people. Let me insist that the truth be spoken about this bill and the blessed sunlight of publicity turned in upon it. I would that I had a mirror which I might hold up and let the American people see it as it really is.

Mr. SMOOT. I am very sure that the statement just made by the Senator from Mississippi is from his heart, and I know that he believes it with all his soul. I know that he believes in economy. I know he is opposed to all waste in every form, and I know that he wants every dollar accounted for. In that connection I wish to say to the Senator that if I were President of the United States, under the conditions existing now, with these vast appropriations being made, I would ask Congress to appoint a board or commission to supervise and check up all the expenditures of the Govenment, so that in the future no wagging tongue could charge me with allowing appropriations of a wasteful nature to be made, and in my opinion it would stop all the scandals that are bound to come unless there is some check upon these appropriations.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I have no doubt but there will be mistakes made by this administration in conducting the war just as there were mistakes made in the Spanish-American War in 1898. There were scandals then that shocked the sensibilities of the American people—scandals that ought not to have happened and would not have happened if Congress had been vigilant, determined, and intelligent in safeguarding appropriations, purchases, and so forth. There are wolves in sheep's clothing in the city of Washington to-day—men who are posing as disinterested altruistic patriots, who, if the opportunity is presented, will rob and plunder the Public Treasury remorselessly. It is no discredit to the President to say that he has not the Argus eyes to see everything that is being done and watch every scoundrel who is trying to take advantage of this emergency to plunder the Government. Congress has its function to perform and it should perform that function fearlessly and patriotically.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment which I ask to have printed in the RECORD and also printed as an amendment and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the proper place in the bill the following:

During the continuance of the war in which the United States is now engaged no work shall be done or money expended on public works on rivers and harbors except for absolutely necessary repairs thereto or preservation thereof, or for surveys, construction, or completion of public works of immediate military necessity, to be determined and specially designated by the President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I do not agree with the position taken by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT]. Of course, if appropriations are extravagantly made or improvidently made or unnecessarily made for river and harbor improvements the Congress is to blame; but within reasonable limitations, provided only the appropriations are made according to the actual necessities of the case, honestly made and wisely made, I do not believe any appropriations that the Congress of the United States can make or does make are more important, more useful, more serviceable to the people, to the business, to the industry, and to the commerce of the United States.

It is not my purpose, however, to engage in a general debate on general principles of that character. If there is anything in this bill that is wrong, that smacks of graft, of the pork barrel, of improvident or unwise or unnecessary appropriations, I do not know it, and the burden is certainly on those Senators who take the responsibility of asserting it to prove it. Whenever and wherever they do demonstrate it I think I can pledge not only my own vote but the majority of the votes in this Chamber to the elimination of any such projects. But all this general characterization of a bill that has been so freely indulged in sometimes by Members of Congress of one House or the other, but more often by yellow journalists, who know not whereof they write, and who care even less about the truth and accuracy of their comments, is very much out of place and ought not to receive any serious attention or real consideration by this body.

When men or newspapers assail a measure it is their business to show wherein it is wrong, how it is wrong, and what is wrong about it, and until they do that specifically and particularly they need not expect to obtain a very wide hearing in the country nor a very successful outcome of any contest they may make in this body.

Mr. President, I have been impressed that this bill is pretty niggardly drawn because the project that I regard as the soundest from the standpoint of the public interest and from the standpoint of the national safety, defense, and security of the entire South Atlantic coast has apparently been entirely eliminated from this bill. I refer to the provision for the improvement of the harbor at Brunswick, Ga. Let me say, Mr. President, that in my judgment Brunswick has the best natural harbor south of Hampton Roads on the entire Atlantic coast. The ocean comes right up to the town. It is not a question of a long river voyage from the ocean to the city wharves and docks. Brunswick has a harbor that, with just a little money spent on it, would float the navies of the world, right at the city streets, and it has always been incomprehensible to me that the Congress of the United States has failed so long to make the small appropriation of $175,000 to improve the bar at that harbor so that we would fully develop one of the greatest harbors for military, naval, and strategic purposes on either coast of this great country.

Last year the bill that came from the House contained that appropriation, recommended by all of the engineering authorities of this Government, the local engineers, the General Board, and the Chief of Engineers. I speak from some personal knowledge of the case when I say that to my mind, considering the amount of money that it will take to accomplish so great an undertaking and secure so great a result, there is no proposition in this bill, north or south or east or west, on the Lakes or on the Gulf or on the Atlantic or on the Pacific, that for the amount of money involved has equal merit with this proposition. When I saw that the House bill did not include this item, I urged the Senate committee to include it. I presented an amendment to that committee urging that this appropriation of $125,000 for Brunswick Harbor, which was carried in the last appropriation bill, be included in this bill, and I deeply regret that apparently, judging by the bill before me, the Committee on Commerce did not see fit to do it. I hope my friend from Florida, the chairman of the committee, may yet be willing to make that change in the bill, or at least give some reason why it has not been done.

I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Florida if he can tell me why this item was not allowed.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I will state that this matter was taken up by the committee with the Chief of Engineers. The Senator's amendment was referred to the Chief of Engineers. The harbor at Brunswick is precisely as meritorious as the Senator has described. The improvement ought to be made. There are numerous other harbors and waterways in the country that are absolutely meritorious that have been recommended by the Chief of Engineers but that are not taken care of in this bill. The bill is limited to those items which I undertook to explain yesterday: First, maintenance of completed projects; second, maintenance and improvement of projects under way where it is necessary to appropriate a certain amount in order to prevent loss and waste; and, third, those new projects which are recommended by the War Department as being absolutely on the basis of military necessity.

If the Senator will allow me just a minute more——

Mr. HARDWICK. Certainly.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] entirely misapprehends this bill. He could not make such frequent denunciations as he has made of the character of this bill if he were not misinformed regarding the bill, in my judgment. Those statements could only be based upon prejudice, not upon facts. A man who says that this bill proposes a raid upon the Treasury or robbery of the Treasury for the improvement of dry creeks over this country is simply using language which can not be accurately characterized within the parliamentary rules of this body; and it is not because the Senator intends it in this way, I take it. It is because he does not understand the bill. I am willing to stake almost anything that he never has read it; and a lot of other opponents of this bill are in the same position. It is based upon prejudice, and that prejudice is based upon misinformation or lack of information; because in this very letter which was written to the committee in connection with the amendment of the Senator from Georgia the Chief of Engineers explains precisely what kind of a bill we now have under consideration and upon what the items in this bill are based. He says:

> At the beginning of the present session of the Sixty-fifth Congress, I was directed to recommend to the Secretary of War such items for a river and harbor bill as I believe to be now a military necessity.

I call attention to those words—"now a military necessity."

> Under this restriction the new project for Brunswick Harbor was necessarily omitted.

That is the whole restriction placed upon this bill throughout—that every item must be regarded as a military necessity. By whom? By the War Department; by the Chief of Engineers, under the direction of the Secretary of War. It is under that restriction that the Brunswick Harbor item, the improvement which the Senator has mentioned, was not specifically recommended.

The Chief of Engineers says in this same letter, referring to this amendment:

> I am familiar with the situation at Brunswick, and as a member of the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors had the pleasure of making a personal inspection of the harbor and favored the new improvement.

So that it is recommended, it is indorsed, by the Chief of Engineers; but it is in the same situation with hundreds of other projects throughout the country. It is not regarded now as a military necessity, and for that reason it is not covered in the bill.

If the Senator will allow me, I will put in the RECORD the letter of the Chief of Engineers, so that it will answer, perhaps, a little more in detail some of the questions he has asked.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the letter referred to will be printed in the RECORD.

The letter is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
Washington, July 5, 1917.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Chairman Committee on Commerce,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: 1. In reply to your letter of the 30th ultimo requesting on behalf of your committee my recommendation upon Senator HARDWICK'S amendment to the pending river and harbor bill, which provides not only for the maintenance of Brunswick Harbor but also for its improvement in accordance with House Document No. 393, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, at a cost of $175,000, or in all $208,250, I have the honor to say that it is with much regret that I am unable to recommend at this session of Congress the inclusion of the new project for this locality. I am familiar with the situation at Brunswick, and as a member of the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors had the pleasure of making a personal inspection of the harbor and favored the new improvement.

2. At the beginning of the present session of the Sixty-fifth Congress I was directed to recommend to the Secretary of War such items for a river and harbor bill as I believe to be now a military necessity. Under this restriction the new project for Brunswick Harbor was necessarily omitted. As far as I am informed it is not proposed to use this locality in any of the defense measures to be undertaken by the Army or Navy, so that I can not recommend the improvement in connection with the national defense.

3. The importance of Brunswick Harbor is well understood, and it is thought that all the needs of navigation will be sufficiently cared for by the existing project, and that the new work should be undertaken at a later date.

Very truly, yours,
W. M. BLACK,
Brigadier General, Chief of Engineers.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, if I understood the Senator from Florida correctly, then, this project was not included, because the War Department did not regard it as in any way connected with the military necessities of the country at the present moment.

Mr. FLETCHER. At present.

Mr. HARDWICK. I suppose we would have a right to expect that when another river and harbor bill, a regular one, is brought in, this provision then is to receive that consideration to which its merits entitle it?

Mr. FLETCHER. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him a moment further——

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes.

Mr. FLETCHER. I will say that I think beyond any question it is one of the projects that will be taken care of when we have a decent and proper river and harbor bill.

Mr. HARDWICK. Can the Senator tell me when that will be?

Mr. FLETCHER. I think that will come next December. I should think it ought to be in the bill that will follow in the December session, the regular session of the Congress. It ought to be done, and certainly, as far as I am concerned—and I believe I speak for the committee—I am favorable to this project, and it ought to be included in the regular river and harbor bill.

Mr. HARDWICK. I am quite sure the Senator is not only candid but sincere about that. His committee has before this time demonstrated its belief in this provision for the Brunswick Harbor by putting it in the bill which it reported during the last Congress.

Mr. FLETCHER. For that reason I will ask the Senator not to press the present amendment.

Mr. HARDWICK. I had just started to say that, resting on that assurance, I am not inclined to press this amendment at the present time, although I can not allow this occasion to pass by without saying that in my opinion the War Department has made a very great tactical error in not considering the use of Brunswick for the transportation of troops and supplies across the Atlantic.

I do not believe that there is a harbor on the entire Atlantic coast south of Hampton Roads so well adapted for the cheap and expeditious loading of troops and supplies. It can be done right at the city. The location of wharves and depots permits it, and there is not another place I know of on the Atlantic coast south of Hampton Roads where that can be done. So that while I hesitate to put my opinion against the opinions of experts, and would not do it if I were not afraid that in the multitude of duties the experts have not given the subject that attention and consideration to which its merits entitle it, I believe that from the standpoint of military necessity this $175,000 ought to be spent at once, and Brunswick ought to be extensively used in connection with this war. I urged that course upon the War Department. I was promised that it should receive serious consideration. It appears not to have received very serious consideration, certainly not favorable consideration. That responsibility, however, does not rest on my shoulders, but upon those of one of the great executive departments of the Government. I believe it has made a serious mistake in not using Brunswick, and using it at once, and extensively, for war purposes; but of course I can neither control nor regulate that matter.

In connection with my remarks on this question I ask leave to print without reading a very interesting article in the Manufacturers' Record, of Baltimore, Md., issue of July 5, 1917, by Mr. Albert M. Smith, secretary of the Brunswick (Ga.) Board of Trade. The article is entitled "Lost, by the Navy Department, one navy-yard site." If there is no objection, I would like to print that as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

LOST, BY THE NAVY DEPARTMENT, ONE NAVY-YARD SITE.

[By Albert M. Smith, secretary Brunswick (Ga.) Board of Trade.]

Away back in the last century, long before the Civil War, the United States Government purchased a site for a navy yard on Blythe Island, in the harbor of Brunswick, Ga.; having obtained the site, proceeded to forget about it, both officially and unofficially, until to-day. Though the ghost has once been raised, some 15 years ago, it would be a safe bet that not one man, even among the most aged, decrepit, and infirm of the officials and employees of the Navy Department, knows of the date of the deeds or recalls the fact at all that the Navy Department owns a splendid navy-yard site in one of the really great harbors of the country.

The navy-yard commission that visited and examined the southern ports for the purpose of learning which was best adapted to naval purposes consisted of M. T. Woolsey, Alexander Claxton, and E. R. Shubrick, names famous in naval annals, men who have not been forgotten in the wardrooms of our fleet to this day. Under date of December 20, 1836, through a resolution of the Senate of the United States, they submitted their report. After reviewing the advantages and disadvantages of the various ports, including their comparative healthfulness, or lack of it, the commission unanimously recommended Brunswick as the best location for a navy yard.

Referring to the harbors of Beaufort (Port Royal, S. C.), Savannah, and Brunswick, the report says:

"The preference is narrowed down to one of these, and having duly weighed their relative pretensions we have no hesitation in preferring Brunswick. Beaufort must yield to her in the essential points of depth of water, easy access, and capability of defense. Savannah must give way, for her easier access and greater depth of water on the bar can not be carried up the river to a site safe from the sea and an enemy and applicable to the establishment of a navy yard. Brunswick is the most southern frigate harbor on the Atlantic seaboard. Placed near the great outlet of the commerce of the West Indies and the Gulf of Mexico, her position in a state of maritime warfare would be invaluable, since the navigating interests of an enemy must pass by her door."

With respect of the available sites for a navy yard in Brunswick Harbor, the commission said:

"We believe Blythes Island, on the opposite shore, to be the most eligible. It contains some hundred acres, covered with timber, and every way convenient for wharves, docks, etc., and for a nursery of the live oak. It is distant from Brunswick 2 miles, and has bold water within a few fathoms of the shore. There is no doubt that the port may be strongly fortified. The islands of St. Simon and Jekyl present suitable positions for extensive works, and a sand shoal 2 miles within and in the center of the river (dry at low water) affords a third basis for powerful defense, and steam batteries will complete the whole. * * * It is deemed healthy, and the absence of a fresh-water river or fresh-water swamps seems to justify the opinion."

This report was transmitted by the Secretary of the Navy, under date of February 1, 1837, to the House of Representatives, and appeared as House Document No. 130 of the Twenty-fourth Congress, second session. There is no doubt whatever that the Government bought the site recommended by the commission. The fact has been recognized in Brunswick for some 80 or 90 years—no one seems to have any more exact or authentic record or information in Brunswick than is in the mind or unforgotten records of any now living official or employee of the Navy Department, but the fact of ownership by the Government has never been forgotten in Brunswick, and is not likely to be.

At the request of the Brunswick Board of Trade, William G. Brantley, formerly Congressman from this district, made strenuous efforts to have the records of the Navy Department searched and information covering the purchase of this site brought to light in order that it might be borne in mind in future by the officials of the department with the view to making some use of the site. The present writer has been informed that, after several months, during which frequent visits were made to the department by Congressman Brantley to urge the department to action, a record was found somewhere among the archives of the department that showed the acquisition of title by the United States. Thus was the ghost brought to light, to vanish and be forgotten much quicker than it had been resurrected, for the Navy Department officials and employees—the few who took note of this archaeological find—looked on it as an interesting relic, but not as being of sufficient importance to tax their overburdened minds with.

For the better part of a year the present writer, by letters to the Navy Department, to the General Board of the Navy, the commission on navy yards and naval stations, and through the Georgia Senators and Congressmen, has endeavored to secure attention from the Navy Department to the fact that this site of 1,695 acres is being overlooked and ignored while naval bases, navy yards, naval training stations, submarine bases, aviation training camps, torpedo bases, and even schools for training officers for the new merchant marine, are being established at ports all the way around the seacoasts of the United States, and even on the Great Lakes—though Georgia has no naval establishment of any kind, and, so far as present information goes, has never had one, and, judging by the history (or lack of it) of this splendid site in Brunswick Harbor, never will—but without securing recognition or action, except from the commission on navy yards and naval stations, which finally exhibited a lively interest and had tickets bought and Pullman accommodations reserved for a visit to Brunswick when called into active service by the breaking out of the war—Armageddon, not the Civil War.

Brunswick's location as the southernmost of the ports that possesses an anchorage is of the greatest strategic importance to the United States. It offers the most advantages for the Navy, because of the fact that it has the largest available anchorage areas of any port south of Hampton Roads, and the entire harbor is landlocked and at sufficient distance from the sea to be safely protected by fortifications on the islands at the harbor entrance. The anchorage areas are 2½ square miles 30 to 85 feet deep at mean low water, 7⅛ square miles 20 to 30 feet deep at mean low water, and 12⅛ square miles 10 to 20 feet deep at mean low water, with a 7-foot rise of tide, the greatest of all southern ports, increasing the depths and areas available.

Besides the 1,695 acres contained in the Blythe Island Navy Yard site, there are on the island 2,919 acres additional that the Government could secure, if needed, at very low cost. The site has a frontage of about 5 miles on deep water. Railroad connections can be secured easily, as the navy-yard site is on the southern end of the island, and the northern end of the island is separated from the mainland by only a creek and comparatively narrow stretch of salt marsh. The front of the site, which is on Turtle River, an estuary from the sea, nearly a mile wide and of great depth, faces Brunswick and is only 2 miles from the center of the city.

I would suggest that at this time when the Government is seeking in many ways to raise money, and as much more likely will be needed before the war ends, this site be sold by the United States. It would make a location of great value for shipbuilding, and the building of either merchant or naval vessels in a privately owned plant located thereon would be of vastly more benefit to the Government and to the people than is the navy yard "that never was on land or sea."

Mr. HARDWICK. Now, I rely on the assurance of the Senator in charge of the bill and my belief that the committee under proper circumstances, or what they regard as proper circumstances, will undoubtedly look after this project. Desiring earnestly to support this bill and not to embarrass its advocates, I am going to waive my own judgment in this matter and not press the amendment at this time, hoping and believing that early in the next session of Congress we shall have a river and harbor bill in which just such meritorious projects as these can be included, and when they can receive that consideration to which they are entitled.

Mr. KENYON obtained the floor.

Mr. FLETCHER. Will the Senator from Iowa allow me to interrupt him long enough to say to the Senator from Georgia that the bill carries an item in connection with the Brunswick Harbor?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; I am familiar with that. It is the usual maintenance item—a little over $30,000.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator from Iowa yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. KING. It occurs to me as the Senator is going to discuss some important features of the bill that there ought to be a quorum present.

Mr. KENYON. I hope the Senator will not call for a quorum if that is his purpose.

Mr. KING. I rose for that purpose.

Mr. KENYON. I wish the Senator would not, because Senators come in and go right out.

Mr. KING. Out of deference to the wish of the Senator from Iowa I shall withhold it.

Mr. KENYON addressed the Senate. After having spoken for some time, he said:

I will say to the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] that I will finish what I have to say, if he would be willing to adjourn now, in half an hour to-morrow morning. I am very tired. The heat has been oppressive to-day; or if some other Senator desires to go on, I shall be glad to yield at this time.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think some Senator will perhaps go on now. I should like to accommodate the Senator from Iowa, but I hope some one who is going to speak on the bill will proceed now, so that we can occupy the time. It is too early to adjourn.

Mr. KENYON. I think the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] is ready to proceed.

Mr. FLETCHER. Very well.

Mr. SHERMAN addressed the Senate. After having spoken for some time,

Mr. FLETCHER. May I interrupt the Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KIRBY in the chair). Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. FLETCHER. I presume the Senator will not be able to conclude his speech this afternoon and there is some desire for a short executive session. If that is satisfactory to the Senator I will ask to have an executive session.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well, I yield for that purpose.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. FLETCHER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

RECESS.

Mr. FLETCHER. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m., Tuesday, July 24, 1917) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Wednesday, July 25, 1917, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, July 24, 1917.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We bless Thee, our God, our Father, for this a newborn day, which we hail as an expression of Thy love, as a token of good will, and Thy continued care for Thy children.

Help us to use it so faithfully, so conscientiously, that we may prove ourselves worthy of that Divine son-ship revealed in the teachings, incomparable life, and character of Thy Son, Jesus Christ our Lord and Savior. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed with amendment bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 3331. An act for the protection of the owners of mining claims and of desert-land entrymen who enter the military or naval service of the United States in time of war.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 1811) providing for the counting of service in the Army or Navy of the United States as equivalent to residence and cultivation upon homestead entries and in the event of the soldier's death in such service providing for the issuance of patent for such land to his widow or minor children.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bills:

H. R. 646. An act for the relief of Mrs. Nancy E. Mullins; and

H. R. 5326. An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Signal Corps of the Army and to purchase, manufacture, maintain, repair, and operate airships, and to make appropriations therefor, and for other purposes.

FOOD CONTROL.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 4961) to further provide for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel, with Senate amendments thereto, disagree to all of the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I desire to state that it is my purpose to move to concur in the Senate amendment fixing $2 a bushel as a minimum price for wheat; and if I am given permission to make that motion, I shall not make any objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I would say to the gentleman from Missouri that the request, and the only request, that I can make is to take the bill from the Speaker's table, disagree to the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I insist upon making that motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not make the motion until we get somewhere.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Then we will postpone the consideration of it until I can.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to ask the chairman of the committee a question. I notice in the first amendment of the Senate, on page 2, line 13, that the Senate has limited the word "fuel" in its meaning, or at least it has added a descriptive clause "including kerosene and gasoline." I supposed at the time the word "fuel" was used it included natural gas used as a fuel, and I am pretty certain that it does; but it seems to me that by the insertion of the descriptive words "including kerosene and gasoline" it might be necessary also to further define fuel as including natural gas. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee whether that can be done in conference, or whether there must be some correcting resolution passed?

Mr. LEVER. That matter would be taken care of in conference, although I think it is covered by the broader word, "fuel."

Mr. BORLAND. I call the chairman's attention to page 16 of the bill, section 10, which gives the President power to take over certain industries, including mines. Amendment 46, which appears on page 18 of the bill, provides that the word "mine" as used in the section shall be held to include oil and gas wells and oil and gas pipe lines.

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. That clearly contemplates that oil and gas wells and pipe lines are within the purview of the bill.

Mr. LEVER. I think so.

Mr. BORLAND. If there is any doubt about it, I think that the first amendment of the Senate ought also to say "including natural gas wells and kerosene and gasoline."

Mr. LEVER. I promise the gentleman from Missouri to look very carefully into that matter.

Mr. BORLAND. One whole section of the southwest depends on natural gas for fuel. Natural gas is a fuel of the small householder and the flat owner, and he must use natural gas for his fuel.

Mr. CARLIN. Does not the gentleman think that the expression "fuel" would cover wood, coal, gas, and any other character of fuel?

Mr. BORLAND. I would think so, if it were not for the fact that the Senate uses the descriptive words "including kerosene and gasoline." In other words, they have added a descriptive clause, and if they had left that out I think the word "fuel" would be broad enough to cover natural gas and probably gasoline.

Mr. GARNER. I do not think that the rules of the House would permit the conferees to add something that is not in either bill.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, that is the question suggested by the gentleman from Texas which I would desire to ask the chairman, whether it was contemplated or feasible in this conference to redraft that Senate amendment in such a way as to clearly define what was intended by the House?

Mr. LEVER. It is absolutely within the power of the conferees to do that, and the conferees will be very glad——

Mr. MANN. That practically means to enlarge the scope of the Senate amendment?

Mr. BORLAND. We are not asking that.

Mr. MANN. I doubt very much if it can be done.

Mr. BORLAND. We are only asking that the Senate amendment should not restrict what is intended by the House.

Mr. MANN. I think to enlarge the scope in conference is not within their powers.

Mr. BORLAND. Not if it should not restrict the meaning of the House words?

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DYER. What is before the House?

The SPEAKER. The thing before the House is the unanimous consent asked by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] to take this bill from the Speaker's table and agree to the conference.

Mr. DYER. I ask for the regular order.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from Missouri has just demanded the regular order.

Mr. DYER. I withdraw it.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee what his attitude will be upon permitting the House to have a separate vote before the bill goes to conference upon Senate amendments numbers 55 and 58?

Mr. LEVER. What amendments are those, the whisky amendments?

Mr. RANDALL. The prohibition amendments, I will say to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. LEVER. I would say to the gentleman from California, I very much prefer that we send this bill to conference with the hands of the conferees untied, with the promise to the gentleman from California that the House conferees are going, as nearly as they can, to meet the wishes of the House on all the propositions involved in this bill.

Mr. RANDALL. Well, do I understand the chairman of the committee to say the conferees on the part of the House will bring back the same provisions the House has already adopted?

Mr. LEVER. It would be impossible for any conferee to make that promise.

Mr. RANDALL. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, still reserving the right to object, I insist upon an opportunity to offer a motion in connection with those two Senate amendments.

Mr. LEVER. I will say to the getleman that the difficulty about it is that we have not got the bill in such a position now that there can be any vote, and I am trying to get the bill in a position so at least we can see where we stand.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture whether in case he finds the conference committee is opposed to the Senate amendment in section 10, providing for $2 wheat, that opportunity will be given the House to vote upon the question before it is turned down by the conference committee?

The SPEAKER. What has the gentleman from South Carolina to say as to that?

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman from South Carolina is going to ask that question, I would want to ask that question about each of the Senate amendments.

Mr. LEVER. I was about to suggest to the gentleman from Missouri that it is exceedingly embarrassing to the conferees on the part of the House and would very much impair their services in conference to answer these questions specifically before going to conference. The House has voted upon these propositions and the House has taken its position. The Senate has taken a contrary position. The House conferees would like to be as free as possible to find out the exact attitude of the Senate conferees on these propositions and also in the meantime to inform themselves upon their own attitude in connection therewith, and it would be unfortunate, I think, in a bill of this character for the chairman of the House conferees to be giving in advance these promises, because it to that extent ties their hands in a free conference with the Senate.

Mr. RUSSELL. This further question: If the committee of conference from the House, as just indicated by the chairman, are anxious to carry out the wishes of the House, would it not be well for the conference committee on the part of the House to know what the wishes of the House are upon those questions?

Mr. LEVER. The conferees on the part of the House, I may promise the gentleman from Missouri, will give very careful consideration to every Senate amendment; and, while the conferees would not be willing, I think, to make promises in advance, the conferees would be very glad to have statements such as the gentleman from Missouri is making, indicating to some extent the feeling of Members of the House.

Mr. RUSSELL. Permit me to ask, can the chairman of the committee say whether there will be an opportunity given the House to discuss this question before it is acted upon by the conference committee?

Mr. LEVER. I will say to the gentleman from Missouri very frankly that if we are to open up this bill to discussion of disagreements between the Senate and the House as shown in the Senate amendments, I fear that the House may be kept here for a solid week discussing these matters.

I think the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] can trust the House conferees to do at least as fairly by the country as their ability permits them to do. [Applause.]

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. LEVER. I will be glad to yield.

Mr. DILL. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. DILL. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DILL. Would a motion to accept a Senate amendment take precedence over the gentleman's request for a conference?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. There are some of us very much in favor of the Senate amendment.

Mr. LEVER. As to wheat?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. As to the $2 minimum price on wheat, and we have a little fear that some of these gentlemen who have succeeded in getting cotton out of the bill will not be as ardent as to the provision as to wheat as some of us in the grain-growing States, whose constituencies would be hurt by the operation of this particular bill.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLACK. If the agreement for a conference is adopted, would it not be in order for any gentleman to move to concur in any of the Senate amendments?

The SPEAKER. No.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. The gentleman says that in conference the conferees will consider the wishes of myself and my colleague [Mr. RUSSELL], who want to retain the Senate amendment; but he said it with a sort of a sweet smile that indicated that he would not do anything more than consider it. I believe that this is an important feature of the bill. I believe it ought to be retained there, and I do not believe any of us would be doing our duty by our constituents if we do not make every possible effort to have it retained.

Mr. LEVER. I will say to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD], and without smiling, that I shall give very earnest consideration, and I know I can speak for the other conferees, to the suggestion being made by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] and his colleague [Mr. RUSSELL] and other gentlemen who may have suggestions to make on this proposition. I think it can be safely said that the conferees on the part of the House on the Agricultural appropriation bill from time to time have tried to meet as nearly as possible the wishes of the House and its Members individually; but I do not care to make any agreement that would tie our hands.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. For the present, Mr. Speaker, I shall not insist, but before this bill goes to final action I shall insist on a vote to retain the Senate provision that I have indicated. I regret that this bill has been so fashioned that it touches nobody but the grain grower. It cuts the prices of all he produces and leaves him to pay war prices for everything he consumes.

Mr. SABATH. Does the gentleman mean to say that the grower of wheat has been discriminated against when he is getting $2.50 for his grain?

Mr. BLACKMON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from South Carolina a question. I would like to ask him if he is in a position to give the House any information as to the possible length of time this bill will be in conference?

Mr. LEVER. I have no more wisdom than any other man in this House or any other.

Mr. BLACKMON. Does not the chairman of the committee think that this bill has been discussed at such length that probably everyone in the United States, including Congress, knows very well what we want?

Mr. LEVER. I agree to that; yes. As far as the House conferees are concerned, we will expedite this matter in conference with all possible speed.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire of the chairman of the committee if he will give the House an opportunity to vote separately on amendment No. 8, which is section 3 of the Senate bill, page 4, which prohibits these agents of the Government who act voluntarily or are paid from making contracts with themselves?

Mr. LEVER. I will say to my colleague on the committee, as I have said to these other gentlemen, that I do not wish to commit myself by promising to support these various and sundry amendments, because practically every amendment in the bill might raise the question of a separate vote. But I would say to my colleague on the committee that we will give that section very, very careful consideration. I know the interest that my colleague has had in this particular section.

Mr. THOMPSON. I understand, Mr. Speaker, the interest and the consideration that the committee of conference will give this provision in the bill, but doubtless that is the same consideration that the lion might give to a fox when he had invited him into his parlor.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. THOMPSON. No; I am talking seriously now. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, we on this side can not hear what is being said over on that side. We want to hear on this side how many Democrats are kicking against the administration's bill. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order. Gentlemen will take their seats and cease conversation.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] come out in front, and then gentlemen interrogating him will be bound to talk loud enough for him to hear, and then we also shall be able to hear.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that is a good suggestion.

Mr. THOMPSON. All I desire is an opportunity for the House to express its desires on this section added by the Senate. If we can get any assurance that the House can get an opportunity to express its views on this section, that is all that I want.

Mr. LEVER. I understand the gentleman's question perfectly, and I must answer his inquiry as I have already answered a number of inquiries as to promises of separate votes. If we are to take up this bill and consider it as amended by the Senate, Senate amendment after Senate amendment, separate vote after separate vote, with full discussion, we shall be delayed. I am sure my colleague on the committee knows, with the House itself, that it has not been guilty of any delay in the passage of this bill. [Applause.] We will be kept here in that event for a week or 10 days, and I believe the gentleman from Oklahoma knows the Members who are going to be the conferees on this bill well enough to know that they will give the utmost consideration to every Senate proposition that is at all reasonable, and that we shall be very glad to have the suggestions of individual Members of the House who may bring to our attention matters in which they are especially interested.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. Speaker, in reply to that I ask the gentleman if he thinks the Senate is likely to adjourn inside of a week or 10 days; and if so, then I will withdraw my request for a separate vote on this amendment.

Mr. LEVER. The Senate?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes.

Mr. LEVER. If the Senate is likely to adjourn at all, I have not heard of it. [Laughter.]

Mr. THOMPSON. If the Senate is not to adjourn in less than a week or 10 days, why the hurry?

Mr. LEVER. I will say to the gentleman—and I want the country to know this—the delay upon this food-control bill amounts almost to a national scandal. [Applause.] I do not want to put my colleagues in the House in the attitude of being criticized for one single, solitary moment for the delay in the passage of this great piece of legislation so necessary to the conduct of this war. [Applause.] I want the blame to rest where it belongs. [Applause.]

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. Speaker, in reply to the gentleman's statement, I am very much in sympathy with his desire for the speedy consideration and passage of the bill. But there are some things in this bill which ought to be considered very carefully, and which ought not to be rushed through here hurriedly, and I do not think the country or the people affected want them to be rushed through here without consideration. For instance, take the matter suggested by my colleague from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD], the minimum price that is placed upon one article of food. That ought to be considered very carefully.

Mr. LEVER. It will be.

Mr. THOMPSON. And the farmers of this country ought to be cared for, and if they are not cared for they will take care of some of us when we get away from here. [Laughter.]

Mr. LEVER. Let me suggest to the gentleman from Oklahoma that the remedy in this matter is very simple. If the action of the House conferees on these various Senate amendments is not satisfactory to a majority of the House, it is the simplest matter in the world to vote down the conference report and instruct the conferees.

Mr. THOMPSON. Surely; vote them down en bloc and not separately. You would vote down a hundred good propositions where you would vote down one bad one. That is almost impossible, as the gentleman knows.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from South Carolina yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. MEEKER. On the point made by the gentleman from Oklahoma, about taking care of the farmer, the guaranty to him is a minimum but no maximum. That is an exception.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. WEBB. I wish the gentleman from South Carolina would state what he meant by saying we would have a vote in the House.

Mr. LEVER. I mean if the conference report is voted down the gentleman would have the right to offer a separate proposition. That is as I understand the situation, although I make no claim as a parliamentarian.

Mr. THOMPSON. If the gentleman did that this week of delay that he speaks of would be extended into two weeks.

Mr. LEVER. I think not.

Mr. THOMPSON. It would not be any shorter anyway.

Mr. LEVER. I think the quicker we get into the conference the better, and I trust we may bring something back to the House in the shape of a conference report before very long, and if that report is not satisfactory the House has its remedy.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. I want to ask the gentleman from South Carolina this question: I had prepared and hoped to introduce this morning a motion to concur in Senate amendment No. 55, which is the prohibition amendment, with an amendment including wine and beer, which would be a reiteration of the original provision of the House on that subject. But under the rules of the House that can not be done at this stage of the proceedings. Now, it is not my desire to delay the consideration of this bill for one hour, nor to delay its reference to the conference committee of the two Houses. I desire, however, to take occasion to say that nothing that anybody who is in sympathy with the prohibition provisions of this bill has done yet has contributed to any delay in its consideration, and so far as I am concerned I feel sure they will not contribute to delay in the consideration of the bill.

Now, if the bill goes to conference without any motion or vote being had on that subject at this time will the gentleman from South Carolina agree that before he will agree to the Senate amendment as it is written or before he will agree to any conference report eliminating wine and beer from the consideration of this bill he will bring it back to the House and give us an opportunity to vote on that question?

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman from South Carolina makes such an agreement about any amendment, I am going to object.

Mr. BARKLEY. Let the gentleman from Illinois take that responsibility if he wishes.

Mr. LEVER. Let me answer the gentleman from Kentucky. The House conferees are going, as nearly as possible, to preserve the bill as it passed the House, and, without making any promises at all or entering into any agreement, the House conferees will, in reference to the matters to which the gentleman refers, undertake to see that the will of the House is as nearly carried out as it is possible for conferees to carry out the will of the House.

Mr. BARKLEY. I appreciate that; but in the event that the Senate conferees will not agree to a report which includes wine and beer in some form of control under this bill, then will the gentleman permit us to have a separate vote on the House provision in order to get the sense of the House as to what it wishes the conferees to do?

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question connected with this matter?

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. Let me first answer the gentleman from Kentucky. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] has observed the proceedings on the floor this morning, and I am satisfied that under the circumstances the gentleman asks me to go a little bit further than I ought to go on this proposition. The gentleman knows that as far as I am concerned personally, as a food conservationist, believing that we ought to conserve the food of this country, I feel that some such regulation and control of foodstuffs and feeds that go into the manufacture of beer and wine as was carried in the original House proposition ought to be restored to this bill. Does that answer the gentleman's question?

Mr. BARKLEY. No; not completely. I appreciate the difficulty the gentleman finds himself in, due to the attitude of certain Members. But I hope if this bill is sent to conference it will come back with the House provision retained as to all liquors covered by it.

Mr. LEVER. I am afraid I am not in a position to go further than the statement I have already made.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. I yield for a question.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am interested in section 23—Senate amendment 70—providing for the appointment of a joint committee on expenditures in the conduct of the war. It is publicly reported that the President is opposed to this amendment. Will the gentleman state to the House whether he has any advices from the President on that subject?

Mr. LEVER. I have.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is it in the form of a written communication?

Mr. LEVER. It is.

Mr. SLOAN. I object to any statement from the gentleman from Pennsylvania as to any statement coming from another branch of this Government, unless it comes through the regularly prescribed channels. The Constitution provides how the President shall communicate with this House and with Congress.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. What I want to know is whether the information published in the press this morning is correct. If it is not, perhaps it would be well for the gentleman from South Carolina to insert the letter in the RECORD, so that we will all have an opportunity to see it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] that he has no power to keep the gentleman from Pennsylvania from asking a question, or the gentleman from South Carolina from answering it. Of course, the Constitution provides about communications from the President to the Congress——

Mr. SLOAN. I thought perhaps——

Mr. MANN. The rules of the House provide how communications shall be received.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think we are not violating the Constitution at all. I want to know if the gentleman has certain advices from the President and whether he will publish in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the letter which he has. We should have authentic information on a matter of such importance.

Mr. LEVER. I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania very frankly——

Mr. SLOAN. I object to the question submitted and to the answer proposed to be given to it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not understand the gentleman.

Mr. SLOAN. I object to the question as propounded being submitted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania to the gentleman from South Carolina and to his answering it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has just stated that he has no power to fix what question the gentleman from Pennsylvania shall ask, that being an impossibility of nature [laughter], or to determine what answer the gentleman from South Carolina shall give.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. All I am asking is that the gentleman from South Carolina give us the information, so that it may be authentic.

Mr. LEVER. I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the press reports of this morning are substantially correct.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And the President is personally objecting to section 23?

Mr. LEVER. He is.

Mr. NORTON rose.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Kentucky rise?

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. NORTON] was on his feet first. I will be glad to yield to the gentleman from Kentucky later.

Mr. NORTON. I am very much interested in amendment numbered 54——

Mr. LEVER. What is that amendment?

Mr. NORTON. That is the amendment guaranteeing a minimum price of not less than $2 a bushel for No. 1 northern wheat at the principal interior primary markets of the country. I am particularly interested in this Senate amendment. I trust that the conferees will retain this amendment in the bill. I believe that the demand for wheat and the conditions of the wheat crop of the country and the present cost of its production would warrant the House and Senate in increasing the minimum guaranty price to $2.50 a bushel. While I am greatly interested in this amendment, I am much more interested in the immediate passage of this legislation, giving into the hands of the Federal Government the authority to encourage the production, conserve the supply, and control the distribution of food and fuel products. While I have had in mind to make certain motions, instructing the conferees on this bill to agree to this and other Senate amendments in the bill with amendments, I do not desire to offer any motion here this afternoon, and shall not offer any motion, that is going to delay the passage of this bill in any way. I desire to say, however, to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER], who is in charge of this bill and who is the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, that throughout the country there is plainly evident in the minds of many of the farmers of the country the idea that this legislation discriminates against them and is not altogether, as it should be, fair and just legislation; that it should include authority for the President to control not only the supply, distribution, and prices of food products and fuel but manufactured products as well. [Applause.] I wish to say that I believe the farmers are right in this view of the matter. I have given my fullest support to this legislation and shall continue to give it my fullest support, trusting that when this bill is passed other legislation by the Congress will soon follow placing within the power of the Federal Government the control of the supply, distribution, and prices of manufactured products. The farmers of this country are patriotic and loyal in the highest degree. They are willing during this war to have placed in the hands of the Federal Government, in the hands of the President, if you please, the absolute control of the prices of their products and the absolute control of the distribution of these products; but, believing in fairness and justice, they want the same thing done with the manufacturing industries of the country, and they consider such to be only a square deal, to which they, as both producers and consumers, are entitled, and they feel that they are not getting that in this bill. [Applause.] Still they are willing to trust to the future fairness of the Congress and the President. They are hopeful that this House and the Senate will in the end be fair and just in its legislation for all the people.

The farmers of the great Northwest, I know, now realize that this war is not going to be one of short duration, and they are prepared to do their part and do it to the fullest extent, if the Congress will but speedily direct the way. I am of the opinion that the Congress has already too long delayed the passage of this bill. Every Member of this Congress who has the interests and welfare of the people at heart should insist that this legislation be passed within the next few days, and that clear and unequivocal authority be given to the President to encourage the production, to conserve the supply, and to control the distribution and prices of food and fuel products. Then legislation should immediately follow, giving to the President the fullest power to encourage the production and control the distribution and prices of manufactured products and all other things necessary to the success of this war.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri demands the regular order, and the regular order is, Is there objection?

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker, I shall be compelled to object unless I can have the privilege of asking the gentleman from South Carolina a question.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr Speaker, I will withdraw my demand for the regular order for the present.

Mr. POWERS. I want to ask the gentleman from South Carolina if there will be any possibility of having a separate vote on the Pomerene amendment authorizing the President to fix the price of coal, coke, and so forth, and taking over the coal mines?

Mr. LEVER. I will answer the gentleman as I have answered several other gentlemen. I feel that to open the bill with promises of a vote upon these different propositions will open a Pandora's box that we can not control. I can promise the House, however, that the conferees will consider the Pomerene amendment with great care.

Mr. POWERS. Since the matter has not been considered by the House, what opportunity will there be for the Members of the House to submit the views of their constitutents on this proposition?

Mr. LEVER. As a matter of fact, the coal situation was given some attention by certain members of the Agricultural Committee when the bill was being considered in the committee, because we construed the word "fuel" to include coal, gas, and things of that kind. Certain members of our committee, some of whom will be on the conference committee, are quite familiar with the coal situation in this country.

Mr. POWERS. My question is, What opportunity will individual Members of the House have to lay the views of their constituents before the conferees on the part of the House?

Mr. LEVER. As far as I am concerned, I would be glad to give the gentleman 5, 10, or 15 minutes for that purpose at any time he wants it.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman from South Carolina has stated several times that under the circumstances he can not make these assurances, and I therefore demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is, is there objection?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Reserving the right to object——

The SPEAKER. But the regular order is demanded.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Then I object.

Mr. BORLAND rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Missouri rise?

Mr. BORLAND. I rise to ask the gentleman from New York to withdraw his objection.

The SPEAKER. That is not in order.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Missouri started the trouble and now he does not want anybody else to talk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Missouri are both out of order.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, if the Chair will indulge me a moment, it may be possible that we can agree to send certain portions of this bill to conference, if that is in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair never heard of any such thing being done.

Mr. MANN. You can not send certain portions of the bill to conference; you can disagree to certain amendments——

Mr. LEVER. We can at least get unanimous consent to disagree to certain amendments in the bill which are not objectionable and send them to conference, and the others may be discussed.

NORTH ISLAND, SAN DIEGO, CAL.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 4892) authorizing the President to take possession, on behalf of the United States, for use as sites for permanent aviation stations for the Army and Navy and for aviation school purposes, of the whole of North Island in the harbor of San Diego, Cal., and for other purposes, and agree to the Senate amendment.

Mr. MANN. Let the bill be reported.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause possession to be taken forthwith, on behalf of the United States, for use for national defense and in connection therewith as sites for permanent aviation stations for the Army and Navy and for aviation school purposes, of the whole of North Island, in the harbor of San Diego, Cal., and the provisions of section 355, Revised Statutes, shall not apply to the expenditure of any appropriations for improvements thereon for aviation purposes.

The Attorney General or the claimants to the said North Island are authorized to make application for the determination and appraisement of any rights private parties may have in the said island over and beyond any rights thereto in the United States to the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of California; the proceedings to be prosecuted in accordance with the laws of the State of California relating to the condemnation of property for public use. Either party may take an appeal from the judgment of such court direct to the Supreme Court of the United States within 90 days after such judgment is rendered. Upon the final ascertainment of the value of any right, title, or interest adjudged to be in any private claimants to the said island there shall be paid into court the value of the same as so determined, together with interest thereon at the rate of 6 per cent per annum from date possession thereof was taken as herein authorized; and thereupon the United States shall be vested with title to said lands. The amount so paid shall be distributed by order of the court to the owner or owners of such right, title, or interest in said island as their respective interests may be determined by the court. The amount necessary to pay the awards in favor of private claimants is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise specifically appropriated, to be disbursed under orders of the Secretary of War: Provided, That no compromise or settlement of claims to title to said lands shall be made involving the payment of more than $500,000.

The Senate amendment was read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 4892, which has just been reported, and agree to the Senate amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. I will.

Mr. MANN. I notice that the Senate amendment strikes out the limitation of expenditure, the amount that may be expended for purchasing this aviation station. Has there been an estimate made by the War Department as to what it will cost?

Mr. CALDWELL. The War Department believes that the island will not cost us a cent, but they do not wish to be handicapped, so that if a suit is brought and afterwards for any reason they are wrong——

Mr. MANN. That is the wildest kind of a foolish opinion for the War Department to express, to say that it will not cost a cent and then to object to a limitation of half a million dollars.

Mr. CALDWELL. The facts are these: This island has a little over a thousand acres in it. The property has been appraised generally at about a thousand dollars an acre. The claim of title by the United States Government to the land rests on the fact that when the Mexican Government granted the property to the original grantee it retained the right to reoccupy the property at any time for purposes of national defense. Following the War of 1848 with Mexico, in the treaty of Guadalupe-Hidalgo, the United States Government obtained all the rights of the Mexican Government in any lands north of the line that they drew across from the Gulf to the Pacific. Now, this particular island has been used for aviation purposes for some years under an agreement with the people who had possession of it.

Mr. MANN. Is it the island at San Diego that we have been occupying under a lease?

Mr. CALDWELL. It is the island we have been occupying at San Diego.

Mr. MANN. And now they propose to deny the title of the lessors?

Mr. CALDWELL. The claimants have notified the Government to get off.

Mr. MANN. And the Government claims that after it has gone into occupation under a lease, being ordered off, it can deny the title of the lessors?

Mr. CALDWELL. There was no lease. They had free use of the island.

Mr. MANN. There was a lease under a nominal consideration. I have seen the island.

Mr. CALDWELL. I think there was no lease. All I know about it is what the War Department has told us. The record shows that there have been three commissions to investigate the proposition. The United States attorney for the district has examined the title, the Judge Advocate General's office has examined the title, and they have obtained legal opinions from persons conversant with the Mexican law, and the unanimous opinion from these three sources is that the Government owns the land and can take it for the purpose of national defense. I have not searched the title; I rely upon these three sources of information.

Mr. CANNON. Does this bill provide that a half a million dollars shall be paid for it?

Mr. CALDWELL. The bill provides that the Government be authorized to take possession of the island for the purpose of national defense, and that the claimants to title be given privilege to prove any claim they might have to the island in the United States courts, and gives it jurisdiction. That is the way the bill was drawn by the War Department and sent to us. Mr. DENT, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, introduced it and the full Military Committee unanimously reported it. It came into the House, and the question was raised as to whether there should not be a limitation put upon the value to be paid for it. If you seize property in the name of the United States Government, the constitutional provision that you can not take property without due process of law is immediately invoked, so that they must put into the bill some provision by which anyone who claims title to the property may prove his claim. We added an amendment to the bill in the House limiting the amount for which a settlement could be made, but not limiting the amount to be paid in the court. If we start to take possession of this property and court proceedings are had and it is found that they have title, while we do not think they have, and it can be settled for a few dollars more than $500,000, then we can not keep possession; we can not settle it; we will have to try the case through the courts. If, on the other hand, they can make settlement, if we find that the claimants have good title, then this permits them to settle, and that is the whole question in a nutshell.

Mr. MANN. What authority is there for anyone to bring suit against the Government which illegally seizes somebody's property?

Mr. CALDWELL. This does not illegally seize it.

Mr. MANN. Then legally seizes it?

Mr. WALSH. The Constitution.

Mr. MANN. No; the Constitution does not give the right to bring suit.

Mr. CALDWELL. No; but the bill does.

Mr. CANNON. This bill enables them to sue?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Why does not the Government take possession and keep possession under its title and send them through the courts?

Mr. CALDWELL. That is exactly what this bill proposes to do.

Mr. CANNON. Then there is no power to compromise?

Mr. CALDWELL. None in the War Department.

Mr. CANNON. Then I have no objection to the bill.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman says there is no power to compromise.

Mr. CALDWELL. There is no specific power to compromise, but the United States attorney is always in a position where he can discontinue the suit.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The real effect of it is that they can not compromise at a larger sum?

Mr. CALDWELL. No; but he could consent to the entry of judgment, which is the same thing.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I do not propose to hold this up upon that ground, but it seems to me it would inevitably result in their paying more than the amount.

Mr. CALDWELL. The proposition is this: The idea of the department is to take possession of the property. They need it for the Nation's defense. We do not want to take anything that does not belong to us, and we do not want to pay for anything that we own. We do want possession of this island, and we want to give these people a fair chance to go into a recognized, constituted court and prove their claim and get anything that is coming to them. We do not want to limit them. We want to pay all that it is worth, no more and no less, and all the legal claim and no more and no less.

Mr. CANNON. If that is the situation, what is the objection?

Mr. CALDWELL. I do not see that there is any objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York for the present consideration of the Senate amendment? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the Senate amendment.

The Senate amendment was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. CALDWELL, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate amendment was agreed to was laid on the table.

FOOD CONTROL.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I renew my request for unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 4861, the food-control bill, with Senate amendments thereto, disagree to all of the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

Mr. LAGUARDIA rose.

Mr. LEVER. I shall be very glad to see if I can answer the gentleman's question.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from New York rise?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a question to the chairman of the committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York reserves the right to object.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I am interested in amendment No. 61, which was inserted by the House, requiring that all of the employees under this bill shall be appointed in accordance with the civil-service law. From the discussion which occurred in the Senate at the time the amendment was stricken out, it appears that Mr. Hoover stated that all of the men required by him should have such expert knowledge and commercial experience, and that it would not be expedient to limit the appointments to the civil-service requirements. I have here a letter from Mr. Hoover in which he states that these experts, specialists, and commercial men will not probably exceed in number one dozen. Then, after expressing his whole-hearted support for civil-service reform, he stated that it is the intention of the administration to take in en masse all of the present employees. It is the impression all through the country that a good many favorites are now employed or will be employed in merely clerical positions. It is true some of these men may have high commercial and technical knowledge elsewhere, but at present they are doing mere clerical work. I ask the gentleman to take into consideration this letter, which I shall ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD and present it in conference when the matter comes up.

Mr. LEVER. I shall be very glad to do that.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print the letter in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter referred to is as follows:

WASHINGTON, July 14, 1917.

HON. FIORELLO H. LAGUARDIA,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. LAGUARDIA: I am greatly obliged for your letter of the 12th.

The food administration has, as you know, no existence in law except an informal authorization from the President to formulate a volunteer organization for a study of the food situation and for accomplishing definite food conservation. With the exception of some small sums placed at our disposal to pay minor expenses, the largest part of the load falls upon the actual volunteers, who compose the entire directing staff and who not only volunteer their time but pay their own expenses as well.

I believe that the question of the civil-service status of the food administration employees should be deferred until the passage of some legislative measure, and that when this organization assumes form thereunder the best interests of food administration should be the guiding rule. As it now stands we expect in the future to draw our paid assistants from civil-service ranks wherever possible, and that policy will continue. Inasmuch, however, as many of the paid assistants have been for years associated with their departmental heads, the elimination of these assistants and of others without civil-service standing who have become familiar with the details of this work would seriously cripple our working force. Many of these employees have come here with a high and patriotic spirit of service, and it would seem a pity that they should be deposed at this time for no other reason than that they lack civil-service eligibility.

All of the directing staff are, as I have already indicated, volunteers who at great personal sacrifice are devoting their time, training, and experience to the Government in this crisis. It is impossible to conceive of these men being subjected to civil-service examination, inasmuch as they are now leaders in their own lines of trade and have been brought here in the effort to place at the command of the Government the most efficient corps of food experts that it is possible to gather together. We have also borrowed temporarily from various educational institutions a number of highly trained specialists, and these men must be paid something in lieu of their university salaries; and, like the strictly commercial representatives, this talent could not be obtained on a competitive-examination basis. These men will probably not exceed a dozen, all told, and will work along lines on which no one else in the country is able to give equally valuable service.

Service such as is given by these commercial and technical experts can not be measured by a salary standard nor secured through competitive examination.

It would seem to me that civil-service administration must be made elastic enough to meet the present situation. It is fairly obvious that unless it does expand and contract with the needs of the epoch it must break. To a certain extent, existing conditions make imperative a degree of elasticity in departmental regulations not ordinarily wise or necessary.

The necessarily temporary character of our organization, which is to terminate after the war, precludes the application of rules governing departments of long standing, which are to remain coexistent with the Government itself.

When the necessary legislation shall have been passed, the food administration can and will meet all reasonable requirements of the Civil Service Commission, so far as future clerical help is concerned. I am whole-heartedly in favor of civil-service regulation, but I believe you will realize that in a war-emergency organization of purely voluntary character, calling for the services of men preeminent in commercial and professional life, civil-service procedure can not be made absolutely sweeping and inclusive except as to clerical assistants other than those already in our employ, all of whom, I believe, should be mustered en masse into the service of the Nation.

Very truly, yours. HERBERT HOOVER.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 4961, with Senate amendments thereto, disagree to all of the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to make two inquiries. First, whether the gentleman's request will be modified so that it should include the appointment of conferees without any intervening motion? Second, I want a separate vote on amendment No. 70. That is the one creating an expenditure legislative committee.

Mr. LEVER. That is No. 23.

Mr. MANN. Section 23, amendment No. 70.

Mr. LEVER. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. MANN. That is my recollection of it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. It is section 23.

Mr. LEVER. Will the gentleman repeat his first question?

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman modify his request so as to ask unanimous consent to disagree to Senate amendments, excepting No. 70, and that when No. 70 is disposed of, and the House shall agree to the conference, the conferees shall be immediately appointed without intervening motion? If so, I shall not object.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Will the gentleman object to including along with that section 12?

Mr. MANN. I do not know whether amendment 70 would be considered a partisan amendment. It ought not to be a partisan amendment, although the President has indicated his opposition to it, and I think this side of the House is practically unanimous in favor of it. Of course it is perfectly patent that as to amendment No. 70, with the majority of the conferees Democrats and more or less, and properly so, susceptible to the influences of the administration, that amendment No. 70 would never come in in any conference report to be agreed to. Therefore I desire a vote upon that now. Now, the gentleman's proposition to send the real features of the bill to conference without present consideration by the House would not be met if immediately upon disagreement every gentleman of the House might offer a motion to instruct the conferees. If we are going to have a vote upon it at all, I would rather have it upon the amendments as they come up than any other way.

The SPEAKER. What has the gentleman from North Carolina to say?

Mr. LEVER. Well, Mr. Speaker, I feel in view of my attitude here this morning with respect to other amendments which are regarded as extremely important by individuals that it would not be fair to them to agree to the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Missouri rise?

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I rise to ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD an extract from a letter of a miller in the Southwest in regard to the present movement of wheat and the necessity for the immediate passage of this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by printing a letter from a miller about the movement of wheat in the Southwest. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I object.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that we dispense with the business on Calendar Wednesday to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to dispense with the business on Calendar Wednesday to-morrow. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may revise and extend and enlarge the remarks I made this morning.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina to adjourn.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The House proceeded to divide.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw that motion. I see the Rules Committee is ready to report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to withdraw his motion to adjourn. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what is the gentleman's intention?

Mr. KITCHIN. I moved to adjourn in order that the Rules Committee might bring in a rule on this conference matter, but I see they are ready now to report, and I therefore ask unanimous consent to withdraw that motion?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, Mr. MAHER was granted indefinite leave of absence, on account of illness.

FOOD-CONTROL BILL.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to proceed for one minute. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Rules has taken action upon a resolution the effect of which, if adopted, would be to disagree to the Senate amendments to the food-control bill, H. R. 4961, and to agree to the conference asked by the Senate, and it was the expectation of that committee, which has just returned to the Hall from its committee room, to present this resolution; but the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] informs me that there was a sort of understanding between certain gentlemen in the House, and it is not thought best to present the resolution at this time, and therefore I do not do so.

Mr. GILLETT. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. GILLETT. Why should not the gentleman present the rule now and let us debate it this afternoon? I understand the agreement was there should be no vote to-day; there is nothing else to do? Why would not the gentleman be willing to discuss it?

Mr. MANN. It will not take long to-morrow.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] that the purpose of the rule is to expedite this bill.

Mr. GILLETT. How much debate are you going to allow on it?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That will have to be determined when the rule is presented, but it would not expedite it in any way to present a rule and have discussion all day without any vote.

Mr. GILLETT. No; but it would give us an opportunity, when there is nothing else to be done, to express ourselves. I do not see why you should want to squelch debate.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do not think it would expedite the passage of the bill in any respect to present the rule now unless it is to be voted upon to-day.

The SPEAKER. If some gentleman will move to adjourn, the Chair will put the motion.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] moves that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the motion for the present.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can not withdraw it for the present, but he withdraws it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman withdraws it temporarily. The Chair will recognize him to make it again.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, it is perfectly evident that we can not get this bill to conference this afternoon, for the reason, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] understands, that there was a tentative agreement that we would not vote to-day, but that we might discuss the bill. As far as I am concerned, personally, I have discussed this bill so long that I am tired of it, and I prefer to see the House adjourn with the understanding that to-morrow we go to conference, even if we go to conference under a rule.

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. LEVER. For a question.

Mr. FERRIS. I would like to make an inquiry of the gentleman. There are four or five propositions on this bill, Senate amendments, that are of nation-wide importance. They will probably be national issues in the next campaign. Why is not the gentleman willing to let us discuss each one of those this afternoon? Let us not idle away the time. We really need the information.

Mr. MANN. There is a great deal of information needed on that side of the House.

Mr. FERRIS. And there may be some needed on the other side. However, I make the suggestion in perfect good humor.

Mr. LEVER. I will say to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] that this bill is rather peculiar legislation. It is different from the usual kind of legislation that is brought into this House. To open it up for discussion again this afternoon would simply mean to carry on the discussion probably through to-morrow, and through the next day, and through the week, and I am exceedingly anxious to have the bill go to conference. I had hoped we might do it by unanimous consent this morning under the rule.

Mr. FERRIS. Just a word further. There were only five votes against this bill in the House and six against it in the Senate. The gentleman has plenty of votes and power and ability to get his bill through any time he wants to do so. I would like to see some of these amendments considered.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 1 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, July 25, 1917, at 12 o'clock noon.

PROPOSED NITRATE PLANT.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I desire to have printed in the RECORD a letter written by my colleague to the Birmingham Age-Herald, of Alabama, regarding the relative merits of Muscle Shoals, in the Tennessee River, and the Warrior River as available sites for the nitrate plant which the Government proposes to construct.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the Birmingham Age-Herald for Sunday, July 22, 1917.]

UNDERWOOD TELLS WHY MUSCLE SHOALS IS THE BEST SITE FOR THE NITRATE PLANT—MAKES EXHAUSTIVE COMPARISON OF MERITS OFFERED BY TENNESSEE AND WARRIOR RIVERS—BASES CONCLUSION ON WHAT IS BEST FOR ENTIRE STATE—NITROGEN FOR WAR AND FOR FERTILIZERS ESSENTIAL TO CONTINUED EXISTENCE OF THE NATION.

(Special.)

(By Hugh W. Roberts.)

WASHINGTON, July 21.

What are the facts in the controversy between citizens of Alabama regarding the relative merits of Muscle Shoals, in the Tennessee River, and the Warrior River as available sites for the nitrate plant which the Government proposes to construct?

The average citizen, it is apparent, knows very little in respect to the technical advantages the one point might possess over the other. Engineers who have investigated both seem to differ. Senator UNDERWOOD, who for five years has fought in Congress for a Government-owned nitrate plant for the manufacture of explosives and fertilizers, and who believes that such a plant should be built at Muscle Shoals, has stated the case as he sees it.

In his statement he compares from Government records the Warrior River and Muscle Shoals. He refers to the report of Engineer Little, who investigated the Warrior's availability, and reports of other engineers who have studied and rendered verdicts on Muscle Shoals. Without severity he criticizes the deductions of Gen. Black, who submitted the recently discussed report to the interdepartmental board.

The statement of Senator UNDERWOOD must either be successfully criticized and refuted by fact and evidence or accepted as final. It will either precipitate a live newspaper discussion or put to an end the newspaper controversy which, with misinformation as to basis, has been raging in Alabama.

DEDUCTIONS MADE.

The deduction made from the statement of Senator UNDERWOOD is that, by certain omissions, Engineer Little presented the Warrior in a light a trifle too favorable, and that Gen. Black exceeded even the estimates of Engineer Little.

The Senator points out that in estimating the average flow of the Warrior, Engineer Little failed to include in his series of years three very dry years, the figures on which, he adds, were obtainable. He points out, too, that Engineer Little in providing for dams ranging from 14 to 150 feet failed to note that when the low dams were overflowed their power would be eliminated. He states further that Engineer Little evidently did not take into consideration the fact that in constructing certain dams navigation in the Warrior from one to two years would be stopped.

AS TO GEN. BLACK.

In dealing with Gen. Black Senator UNDERWOOD refers to the possibility of clerical errors appearing in the report. Whereas Engineer Little claims for the Warrior less than 58,000 horsepower, Gen. Black states that the Warrior is capable of generating 77,000, and adds that this total could easily be increased to 100,000.

In estimating costs Gen. Black estimates efficiency of machinery at 100 per cent, which machinery, states Senator UNDERWOOD, does not exist, whereas Engineer Little estimates efficiency of machinery at 72 per cent.

But, accepting the figures of both as correct, Senator UNDERWOOD attempts to prove that the Warrior is not comparable as a source of power to Muscle Shoals. He holds that Muscle Shoals is capable of 85,000 secondary horsepower, which, if retailed, would net a sum sufficient to pay interest on the total investment and furnish nitrates for explosives and fertilizer at cost of operation. Engineer Little does not refer to secondary power in the Warrior.

BRING OUT FACTS.

The statement of Senator UNDERWOOD follows:

"From certain articles I have read in the Birmingham papers, I fear there is an entire misconception of the purpose of an act passed more than a year ago for the establishment of a Government nitrate plant, and I, therefore, ask that I may state some of the facts in the case in the columns of your paper.

"The premises upon which is based the proposition for the establishment of the air-nitrogen industry in this country through the action of the Government are clear and undeniable. They are axiomatic and should carry the force of other self-evident truths.

"The first is that a nation can not conduct a war of defense or offense without explosives; that explosives can not be made without nitric acid; that an adequate supply of nitric acid can not be secured except through the use of Chilean saltpeter or the fixation of atmospheric nitrogen; that the supply of Chilean saltpeter might be cut off from the United States at any time by an enemy navy. Therefore, it is not only a patriotic duty but a national necessity of the very first order of importance for Congress to insure the establishment in the country of the air-nitrogen industry on a scale adequate to supply the Nation's requirements for nitric acid in times of war.

"CHEAP FOOD SUPPLY.

"The second is that a people can not survive the fierce competitive struggle in times of peace without a plentiful and cheap food supply; that a cheap food supply is chiefly a question of securing more food per acre cultivated without an increase in labor; that this defines cheap agricultural fertilizers; that cheap agricultural fertilizers are chiefly a question of cheap and assured source of nitrogen supply; that the one adequate supply of nitrogen is the atmosphere. Therefore, it is economic necessity of the very first order of importance that the country should have a cheap and plentiful supply of air nitrogen in the form of a fertilizer.

"To make assurance of the soundness of these premises doubly sure we have but to consider what has taken place in Europe. Germany, at the outbreak of the war, was expending for Chilean saltpeter used chiefly as a fertilizer and for the manufacture of nitric acid between $40,000,000 and $50,000,000 per year. She had available within the borders of the empire 660,000 tons, valued at $30,000,000, sufficient for a few months requirements. When this should be exhausted there remained no means of replenishing the supply by reason of her being cut off from Chile. Within 18 months Germany expanded the air-nitrogen production in the country by the investment of approximately $100,000,000 and the employment of an additional 300,000 continuous horsepower. To-day she is independent of all outside sources of nitrogen and will continue so throughout all time.

"The allies have approximately 500,000 continuous horsepower engaged exclusively in the fixation of air nitrogen for explosives and, furthermore, air-nitrogen nitric-acid plants are now being actively installed all over the allied countries of Europe, notwithstanding the sea is open to the allied nations for the transport of saltpeter from Chile, which, however, the shortage of sea bottoms makes highly undesirable and expensive as a source of nitrogen supply.

"NITROGEN IN OTHER NATIONS.

"The United States is about the only country in the world which is without the air-nitrogen industry. Japan, Norway, Sweden, Germany, France, Austria, Italy, and Switzerland together conduct the industry on an enormous scale, employing 1,000,000 continuous horsepower, involving an investment of $150,000,000 and an annual production which in normal times has a value of $78,000,000. The greatest water-power center in the world, with which none other compares, is Niagara Falls, where at this time more power is being developed than ever in its history, namely, somewhat in excess of 450,000 continuous horsepower. This is equivalent to about one-half of what the countries outside of the United States are consuming every second of the year in the fixation of atmospheric nitrogen.

"These facts should have our earnest consideration, for we are here dealing with the greatest single factor affecting a nation's economic prosperity in times of peace and its power of defense and offense in times of war.

"The people of the cities are always demanding cheaper food and the farmers always desire higher profits for their crops. There is but one way to produce cheaper food for the people and secure greater profits on the farm at the same time, and that way is to produce more on the farms at less cost. There is but one way to accomplish this result, and that way is to furnish agriculture in America with fertilizers at lower prices.

"Germany can be referred to as promoting European agricultural methods. She has increased in 20 years her grain crop 15 bushels to the acre with cheap nitrogen fertilizers. In the same time the United States has increased its grain crops 3 bushels to the acre. The naturally poor soils of Germany to-day yield practically double that of corresponding crops in the United States, due to the liberal use of fertilizers.

"A number of years ago the Congress passed a bill to dam the Coosa River for hydroelectric power to be used in the production of air nitrogen in a plant to be erected in Montgomery. Through misrepresentation a President of the United States was induced to veto the bill, and the plant went to Canada. The freight cost on every ton of fertilizer produced by that plant and bought by the Alabama farmers is $5 a ton.

"In March, 1916, an amendment to a bill was pending to the national-defense act in the House of Representatives to erect an air-nitrogen plant in the United States and was defeated by the machinations of an unholy lobby. A few weeks afterwards this opposition was exposed in the Senate and an amendment was adopted to the national-defense act appropriating $20,000,000 for the erection of an air-nitrogen plant for the manufacture of powder in times of war and fertilizers in times of peace. This proposal was bitterly opposed by interested parties before its enactment, and in my opinion obstructive tactics have continued to be used against its successful consummation down to the present time.

"SOURCES OF OPPOSITION.

"Cheap nitrogen would interfere with the business of some of the great industries of America. Therefore if the Government has determined to make nitrogen it is manifestly to the interest of those who opposed the plan to see that it is not made at a low cost.

"The primary cost in the manufacture of air nitrogen by known processes that are commercially possible is largely determined by the cost of hydroelectric power. Therefore if the farmer is to be benefited by the erection of the plant in the way of low cost of fertilizers the cheapest water power possible must be utilized.

"I have advocated the erection of this plant from the beginning. I believe there is no greater boon that can come to the farmers of the South than a plentiful supply of cheap fertilizers. The location of this plant at some particular town or place fades into insignificance compared to the great problem of securing low-cost nitrogen for the farmers and cheaper food for the people.

"I have studied this problem in all its details for more than five years, and I have satisfied myself that aside from Niagara Falls there is no place this side of the Rocky Mountains where hydroelectric power can be produced at as low cost as it can on the Tennessee River at Muscle Shoals.

"I might make the comparison with all the proposed sites without fear of not being able to establish the statement just made, but for the present I desire merely to make a comparison between a power plant established at Muscle Shoals and one at some point on the Warrior River by a comparison of statements made by Government engineers.

"From the very best study I can make of the Warrior River and the Tennessee River power propositions, the case stands practically as follows:

"Mr. G. K. Little (local Government engineer on the Warrior River) reports that there is, under his plan for the Warrior River development, 47,117 primary horsepower, and this is taken from his report without any changes or any question of accuracy of the report.

"In the memorandum submitted to the Nitrate Board, Gen. Black, Chief of Engineers, United States Army, states that the primary available 24-hour per day power is about 79,000 horsepower, with storage, while Mr. Little states that the primary 24-hour per day power, with storage, is 57,117 horsepower.

"Evidently this 79,000 horsepower stated in the memorandum referred to and submitted to the Nitrate Board was a clerical error, since Mr. Little himself claims only 57,117 primary horsepower available at the switchboard. Gen. Black says, in giving the estimated cost of the Little plan, that the development is based upon 79,329 horsepower at the switchboard.

"By an inadvertence, perhaps, Gen. Black took the theoretical primary horsepower, which is available only upon the operation of machinery at 100 per cent efficiency, which Mr. Little obviously realizes impossible, because he uses 72 per cent efficiency.

"AN EXCUSABLE ERROR.

"So it appears that there was, perhaps, an excusable error made in the statement to the Nitrate Board that there would be made available 79,000 continuous 24-hour horsepower from the proposed Warrior River development in estimating the cost of this plan based upon a development of 79,329 horsepower at the switchboard.

"Mr. Little in his report gives no estimated cost of hydroelectric power per kilowatt hour or horsepower year, and it is reasonable that he does not, since to do so would require a detailed survey of the power plan he proposes, and this Mr. Little did not have the opportunity to make. The lowest estimate he claims is about 1.5 mills per kilowatt hour for steam power, which would give a cost of about $9.80 per horsepower year. This would be more than double the cost of power at Dam No. 2 on Muscle Shoals. Mr. Little suggests in his report that steam power can be produced about as cheap, according to his information, as hydroelectric power can be produced; in fact, Mr. Little's plan is largely a steam-power proposition.

"This seems to me to state the Warrior River case, allowing that the engineering facts in Mr. Little's report at 100 per cent correct. Now, let me state the Muscle Shoals case as I see it from the record.

"Maj. Lytle Brown, United States district engineer at Nashville, in a letter of March 28, in transmitting a memorandum prepared by Mr. W. G. Waldo, giving a statement of the amount of power and the cost of power as estimated by him at Muscle Shoals, says in closing his letter:

"'It is my opinion that the results given by Mr. Waldo are as reliable as present knowledge can produce.'

"And Assistant Engineer Winn, in submitting Mr. Waldo's statement to District Engineer Brown, says:

"'I have checked the statements and computations contained therein and I have found them correct.'

"The facts presented by Mr. Waldo in his statement, transmitted by Maj. Brown, were all extracted from Document 1262, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, which document contains the minute details of the final survey of the Muscle Shoals stretch of the Tennessee River, requiring, as I am informed, nearly a year's time and a cost of $150,000 to the Government.

"In Mr. Waldo's statement he estimates the primary power at Dam No. 2 at Muscle Shoals at 70,000 horsepower and the secondary 10 months' power at 85,000 horsepower. So we see that Assistant Engineer Winn and District Engineer Maj. Brown approved 70,000 primary horsepower at Dam No. 2, Muscle Shoals, and 85,000 secondary horsepower. Mr. Little reports 57,117 primary horsepower from the Warrior River developments, and makes no mention of secondary power.

"Assuming that the Government could sell at the switchboard of the power house at Dam No. 2, Muscle Shoals, 85,000 secondary horsepower with a 70 per cent load factor, or, in other words, 70 per cent of the total 85,000 secondary power produced, at 2 mills per kilowatt hour ($13.07 per horsepower year), at the switchboard, this would give a gross annual earning from this secondary power of $777,665. Deducting from this sum the operating cost of producing this secondary power, estimated at 0.63 of 1 mill per kilowatt hour ($4.12 per horsepower year—and in this cost is included 10 per cent depreciation per annum on all machinery as well as 1 per cent depreciation per annum on all structures both for navigation and for power purposes), leaves a net income available for the payment of interest charges of $532,525 annually.

"WILL PAY 4 PER CENT.

"The estimated total cost submitted by Mr. Waldo and checked by Assistant Engineer Winn and approved by Maj. Brown, amounts to $13,300,000. The net annual income of $532,525 will pay interest on this entire investment at the annual rate of 4 per cent.

"I believe that this is a fair statement of the earning power of the secondary power alone of the development at Dam No. 2, based on statements and estimates approved by the United States engineers themselves. If this statement is approximately correct, then the Government can get the use of 70,000 primary power at Dam No. 2, Muscle Shoals, for the production of air nitrogen and the manufacture of nitric acid at the cost of physical operation, and the farmers in time of peace can get the same for the manufacture of fertilizers.

made available at the switchboard, while the power on the Warrior River and the Tennessee River at Muscle Shoals, in my opinion, is not a fair one.

"The cost of power at Muscle Shoals was taken from an estimate for an alternative navigation power dam at site No. 2 (Doc. 1262, 64th Cong., 1st sess., p. 177), and this dam and its estimate contemplates a head of 110 feet. Gen. Black states that the primary power at this dam is 60,000 horsepower, which would require a minimum flow of only 6,000 second-feet. The minimum flow of the driest day in the driest year in history—1904—is shown by the record to be 7,000 second-feet. (Doc. 20, 63d Cong., 2d sess., pp. 59–62.)

"The estimate for the Warrior River is based on the regulated mean monthly flow for the wet period from 1905 to 1914, inclusive, excluding the dry years 1902, 1903, and 1904, although the data for these years were obtainable.

"The power estimated and reported at Dam No. 2 on the Muscle Shoals by the United States engineers is power that is actually to be made available at the switchboard, while the power on the Warrior River report by Gen. Black is potential power which can not be made available except with machinery that is 100 per cent efficient; and such machinery does not exist. In other words, the fact that the machinery is not 100 per cent efficient is conceded by the engineers in the case of Muscle Shoals, and was overlooked by Gen. Black in the case of the Warrior.

"The $16,000,000 cost for Dam No. 2 at Muscle Shoals as reported by the engineers to the nitrate board is the cost of a navigation power dam at site No. 2 of an alternative suggestion or proposal made by Maj. Burgess with no intention of its adoption, and he did not recommend its adoption unless landowners whose lands would be overflowed by the building of Dam No. 3, which dam Maj. Burgess did recommend, should charge the Government exorbitant prices for these lands. Since Maj. Burgess made his report satisfactory prices have been secured on a majority of these lands, and of course this alternative suggestion will never be carried out.

"FOR NAVIGATION STRUCTURES.

"It is well to remember that in the estimated cost of this alternative dam 110 feet high at site No. 2, there was included in the cost $4,495,000 for navigation in no way connected with this dam itself, and therefore if this dam should be built there would be chargeable to the construction of this dam out of the $16,000,000 total for the alternative plan, $11,505,000 and not $16,000,000 as suggested by Gen. Black. This reference to this alternative dam and its cost of $16,000,000 is merely explanatory, and, of course, it will be obvious that navigation structures not connected with the dam itself should not be charged into the cost of power on Muscle Shoals any more than on the Warrior River—and there was no such navigation charge included on the Warrior.

"In my comparison of these two propositions I have accepted the report made by Mr. Little as correct, and that, as he reports, the total cost of his power plan will be $14,538,000, with 57,117 horsepower. And I am willing to go so far as to accept Gen. Black's report to the nitrate board on the Black Warrior as follows:

"Cost of installation: About $91 per horsepower for dams and substructures of power houses only. Equipment, including turbines, electrical generators, transmission lines, etc., depending upon the site selected for the nitrate plant itself, add largely to this figure.

"These additional items of cost, by the way, Mr. Little estimates at $6,768,000, which would be, on 57,117 horsepower, $118 per horsepower. The amount added to the $91 for dams and substructures amounts to $209 per horsepower.

"But conceding all this $6,768,000, and not counting it in the cost of power and accepting the cost suggested by Gen. Black of $91, we must, in all justice, accept the report sent to Gen. Black by Maj. Lytle Brown, that the cost of power at Dam No. 2 on Muscle Shoals would be $83 per horsepower at the switchboard, with a total development of 115,000 horsepower, and in this cost of $83 per horsepower the cost of the locks at Dam No. 2 is included.

"Of course, it must be recognized that the 11 dams and 11 power houses, as proposed on the Warrior, with many miles of transmission line, and the dams varying in height from 14 feet to 150 feet that with these varying heights and small units of power plants there will result, of necessity, low efficiency, and some of these low dams on the Warrior will be drowned out in high water and of course produce no power at that time.

"In the construction of the proposed dams on the Warrior, especially the new dam near Tuscaloosa, navigation on the Warrior will be interrupted for a period of time perhaps as long as two years.

"On the other hand, at Dam No. 2 at Muscle Shoals there will be but one dam and power installation, and one operation as against 11 proposed on the Warrior.

"OTHER PRODUCTS NEEDED.

"Fertilizers are not composed entirely of nitrogen, although it is the most important and most needed element in our fertilizers. Everyone understands that a complete fertilizer must have potash and phosphates as well as nitrogen. Should the nitrate plant be constructed at Muscle Shoals the backwater from the navigation dams would reach up into the beds of phosphate rock that are found in Tennessee. The cost of transportation will be very small. I know of no other place in the United States where this element of cost in the production of fertilizer can be practically eliminated.

"According to the statistics contained in Government crop reports, the total fertilizer bill of the country for 1914 amounted to $185,000,000. Of this total, $86,395,000 was for nitrogen, $69,005,000 for phosphoric acid, and $29,600,000 for potash, the total for nitrogen and phosphoric acid amounting to $155,400,000. Before the Committees on Agriculture and Military Affairs of the House in February of last year, it was testified to and it has not been denied or questioned that at Muscle Shoals it would be possible in connection with the building of a Government nitrate plant to produce fertilizers compounded of phosphoric acid from phosphate rock and nitrogen from the atmosphere and sell them to the farmers of the country at one-half the price the farmers have been paying for such fertilizers in normal times.

"Suppose that in one year the farmers of this country should use this fertilizer to the extent of the nitrogen and phosphoric acid used in 1914, namely, $155,400,000, there would be a saving in one year to the farmers of the country on their nitrogen-phosphoric acid fertilizer of $77,700,000 on the basis of 1914 consumption.

"It is of interest to remember that Alabama farmers paid a fertilizer bill in 1914 of $11,300,000, and if they can get their fertilizers at Muscle Shoals for one-half what they formerly paid they ought to have the opportunity to do so.

"The average yield of wheat per acre for the last 10 years in the United States has been about 15 bushels; in the United Kingdom about 33 bushels; and in Germany 31 bushels. This difference is due to the larger use of nitrogen fertilizer in Germany and in the United Kingdom.

"One electric horsepower working through a year will fix 1,000 pounds of air nitrogen, and extensive experiments have shown that 1 pound of available nitrogen applied to an acre of wheat will increase the yield one-third of a bushel. A thousand pounds of nitrogen applied to the proper acreage will increase the yield 350 bushels.

"These are the reasons that compel me to favor Muscle Shoals with a possible power installation, as reported by United States engineers, of nearly 680,000 horsepower.

"In conclusion, let me say that I have had no desire whatever to antagonize the natural wishes of my friends and neighbors, but occupying a position where it falls to my lot to be one of those who must determine what is best for the entire people of the State of Alabama in reference to this matter I have reached my conclusions based on the facts that I have stated above.

"OSCAR W. UNDERWOOD."

WABASH RIVER BRIDGE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2106) to authorize the county of Cass, in the State of Indiana, to construct a bridge across the Wabash River east of the city of Logansport, at a point known as Cedar or Rock Island, in said Wabash River, which was, in line 6, to strike out "interest" and insert "interests."

Mr. WATSON. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

PROTECTION OF MIGRATORY BIRDS.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at the completion or disposition of the pending river and harbor bill the bill (S. 1553) to give effect to the convention between the United States and Great Britain for the protection of migratory birds, concluded at Washington, August 16, 1916, and for other purposes, be made the unfinished business.

Mr. SMOOT. I rather think that that is out of order. Under our rule I do not believe that unanimous consent can be given to make a bill the unfinished business when there is already a bill on the calendar as the unfinished business.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. There is always a bill before the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. The bill is not before the Senate, and it would have to be taken up before unanimous consent for its consideration could be given. I wish to state to the Senator that I am not opposed to the consideration of the bill he has in charge, and I am perfectly willing that the bill should be passed now, but under the rule it seems to me impossible until the bill comes before the Senate to make a unanimous-consent agreement to vote on the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I have not asked for any vote on the bill. I have asked to make it the unfinished business, and I know of no limitation or any rule which prohibits a unanimous-consent agreement on the bill at any time the Senate sees fit, unless it takes some Senator off the floor, whether at this hour or any other. I only ask unanimous consent—I make no motion about it—that at the completion of the river and harbor bill this bill be made the unfinished business.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I submit that that can not be done by unanimous consent. The unfinished business is a matter of fact, not a matter of consent. The bill which is pending when the Senate adjourns is the unfinished business. Unanimous consent might be given to take up this bill after the unfinished business is disposed of, but it would be the right of the Senate at any time to displace it with another measure, in which event the bill would not be the unfinished business.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I see nothing in the point raised by the Senator. All in the world I want is to have this bill passed, giving effect to a treaty solemnly entered into, and which has already been ratified by Canada passing the law. The passage of this proposed law is the only thing required to complete that convention.

I simply want unanimous consent to take up the bill. I do not care whether or not it is made the unfinished business. I am confident, if the bill ever comes before the Senate for two and a half hours, it can be easily passed. I do not want to move to take it up this morning, for I do not wish to interfere with the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] in the consideration of the bill which he has in charge. If it can be understood, however, that this bill shall be taken up at the completion of the bill now before the Senate, that is all I ask.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that the Chair was about to construe the request of the Senator from Arizona that the bill for which he asks consideration be made the special order after the conclusion of the pending bill. If the Chair was right in his construction, the Chair will put the question as to whether or not there is dissent from that request.

Mr. KENYON. Does an agreement to that request amount to unanimous consent?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It would be unanimous consent.

Mr. KENYON. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made to making the bill referred to by the Senator from Arizona a special order.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. What Senator has made the objection?

Mr. VARDAMAN. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] objects.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I did not clearly understand the request of the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] when he made it, and I now withdraw my objection to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arizona wish to renew his request?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arizona asks unanimous consent that upon the completion of the consideration of the pending bill, the migratory-bird bill shall be made the special order. Is there objection?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I do not care to object, but I see that the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] is not present. I think that Senator came into the Chamber a moment ago because of the request that was submitted by the Senator from Arizona——

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The Senator was present when I made the request.

Mr. KING. But after the objection was made by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] the Senator from Missouri left the Chamber.

Mr. REED entered the Chamber.

Mr. KING. I see the Senator from Missouri has now returned to the Chamber, and I shall resume my seat.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. REED. What is the request, Mr. President?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The request is that upon the conclusion of the consideration of the bill now before the Senate the unfinished business, the migratory-bird bill, shall be made the special order.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, there have been half a dozen Senators, or something like that number, who have raised the point of order that that sort of thing could not be done. It is wholly unprecedented, as I look at it, though I may be in error, but the business of the Senate can not be mortgaged and farmed out in that way, and the time in the future taken up by unanimous-consent agreements, and it ought not to be. The bill has been objected to once. I should like to inquire how often it has to be objected to in the same morning?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state to the Senator from Missouri that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], who made the objection, withdrew his objection.

Mr. REED. Well, I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The objection is made.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Then, Mr. President, I give notice that after the disposition of the bill which is now before the Senate as the unfinished business, I shall move that the Senate take up the bill (S. 1553) to give effect to the convention between the United States and Great Britain for the protection of migratory birds concluded at Washington August 16, 1916, and for other purposes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, let me suggest that the Senator from Arizona see to it, if possible, that when the Senate quits work for the day, instead of taking a recess it adjourn until to-morrow. Then there will be two hours of morning business to-morrow, and the chances are that the Senator can get up his bill.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I will take advantage of that suggestion, if the opportunity occurs, notwithstanding the notice I gave.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator from Arizona might assist in having that occur.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I am going to try to have it occur. I am much obliged to the Senator from Washington for his suggestion.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. FLETCHER. Regular order, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi is recognized.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I was about to suggest that we proceed with the consideration of the river and harbor bill and get it out of the way, so that the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] may have his measure taken up. I am afraid we must pass the river and harbor bill before the Senator can get unanimous consent to have his bill made the special order.

WAR APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, supplementing my remarks of yesterday, I desire to state that the $5.000,000,000 additional appropriations which I then predicted would be asked for at this session of Congress, have already been realized and comes from the War Department through the Secretary of the Treasury. There will be deficiencies from other departments of the Government amounting to approximately $150,000,000, and a request has already been made for $500,000,000 additional appropriation for the Shipping Board. We have been also told by the Secretary of the Treasury that no doubt $2,000,000,000 more would be required to be loaned to foreign countries who are engaged in war with Germany. With these amounts added to the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, referred to by me on yesterday, the total appropriations required will approximate $17,000,000,000.

OMISSION OF PETROLEUM FROM FOOD-CONTROL BILL.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask to have printed in the RECORD several telegrams relating to the food-control bill. I present these telegrams for consideration by the conference committee on the food bill.

The telegrams are as follows:

TULSA, OKLA., July 24, 1917.

Senator CHARLES CURTIS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The real situation relative to the oil-producing industry is so little understood at Washington that it seems to us the Government is likely to make a very grave mistake on account of the increased price of everything entering into the cost of a well, the price of material having increased conservatively 80 per cent; labor, teaming, and drilling at least 75 per cent. The men who develop the oil business can not afford to take the risk of opening new pools at the present price of crude oil, at least 40 per cent of the pools in this field being idle at the present time. Crude oil is the only product in the United States that has not advanced in price since war was declared. If aggressive drilling is suspended for 90 days there will be a big slump in the production, which can not be made up even if a much larger price is offered for crude. In our opinion this matter is of great importance to the Government and they should take steps to find out the real and not the theoretical conditions existing in the oil field. Please file with conference committee on food control.

TULSA CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.
TULSA CLEARING HOUSE ASSOCIATION.

KANSAS CITY, KANS., July 24, 1917.

Hon. CHARLES CURTIS,
Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Kansas has just entered on a period of petroleum producing and refining, and I understand there is a provision of the food bill now pending in Congress attempting to regulate the price of petroleum and its products of such a character as will badly hamper and injure that industry in our State. If you can, consistently, use your efforts to have this omitted from the bill, as the mere rumor of it has already badly affected our oil interests.

JAMES F. GETTY.

WICHITA, KANS., July 24, 1917.

Senator CHARLES CURTIS,
Washington, D. C.:

Believe you can do more for the State of Kansas and for the country at large by encouraging the development of the oil industry in this State, as wonderful developments will be made unless discouraged by the insertion of the petroleum clause in the food bill. Congress has wisely encouraged the production of wheat; the production of oil is just as important. We believe unwise to insert this clause.

B. F. MCLEAN,
President Fourth National Bank.

CHANUTE, KANS., July 21, 1917.

Hon. CHARLES CURTIS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

We urge you to use your influence to eliminate kerosene and gasoline from food-control bill, feeling its passage will prove disastrous to entire oil industry.

MILLER PETROLEUM REFINING CO.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4285) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question before the Senate is on the amendment which has been heretofore reported by the Secretary.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Let the amendment be again reported, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will again state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, after line 5, it is proposed to insert the following:

Cape Cod Canal, Massachusetts: The Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy are hereby authorized to enter into negotiations for the purchase of the existing Cape Cod Canal with the property, franchises, and appurtenances used or acquired for use in connection therewith or appertaining thereto; and they are further authorized, if in their judgment the price for such canal is reasonable and satisfactory, to make contracts for the purchase of the same, at the option of the United States, subject to future ratification and appropriation by the Congress. In the event of the inability of the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy to make a satisfactory contract for the voluntary purchase of said Cape Cod Canal and its appurtenances, they are hereby authorized and directed, through the Attorney General, to institute and carry to completion proceedings for the condemnation of said canal and its appurtenances, the acceptance of the award in said proceedings to be subject to the future ratification and appropriation by Congress. Such condemnation proceedings shall be instituted and conducted in, and jurisdiction of said proceedings is hereby given to the district court of the United States for the district of Massachusetts, substantially as provided in "An act to authorize condemnation of land for sites for public buildings, and for other purposes," approved August 1, 1888; and the sum of $5,000 is hereby appropriated to pay the necessary costs thereof and expenses in connection therewith. The said Secretaries are further authorized and directed to report their proceedings hereunder to Congress.

Mr. MCNARY. On behalf of my colleague and myself, I submit an amendment intended to be proposed to the pending bill, which I ask to lie on the table and be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I wish to resume my remarks which I commenced on yesterday on this bill.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. KENYON. I yield to the Senator.

NATION-WIDE PROHIBITION.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on Commerce [Mr. FLETCHER] if he will consent to have the pending bill temporarily laid aside in order that I may present a request for unanimous consent for the fixing of a date for a vote on the nation-wide prohibition constitutional amendment? I think it will take only a few minutes. If it leads to any debate, I shall withdraw the request.

Mr. KENYON. Considering the condition of some of the creeks and rivers which are proposed to be appropriated for in the pending bill, I should think that would be a very appropriate course.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not like to stand in the way of the Senator's request, and if it does not lead to debate I shall have no objection to his preferring it now; but I am very much afraid it will lead to debate.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I have just entered the Chamber. Has the Senator from Texas asked unanimous consent; and if so, for what?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I have asked unanimous consent that the pending bill be laid aside temporarily in order to ascertain if unanimous consent can be granted to fix a date for voting on the joint resolution for a constitutional amendment for nation-wide prohibition.

Mr. PENROSE. I desire to say to the Senator from Texas that I shall object just now to unanimous consent. I understood from him that he would not call this matter up until later in the morning, when certain Senators were present.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The Senators to whom the Senator from Pennsylvania refers have come in. It is for that reason that I have at this time made the effort to secure unanimous consent.

Mr. PENROSE. I was not in, and I object to the request at this time. I want to tell the Senator that I have no desire to filibuster or to make continued opposition to the consideration of this measure, but I think it ought to be proceeded with in due course and in proper order.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I was acting in entire good faith. I presumed that the present moment would be acceptable, the absent Senators having arrived.

Mr. PENROSE. I do not say the Senator was not acting in good faith.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Very well. I withdraw the request for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas withdraws his request.

PETITIONS OF CITIZENS OF FOREIGN POWERS.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa yield to me a moment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. KENYON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, on yesterday the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS]—I thought the Senator was in the Chamber when I rose or I would have waited for his presence, but I will present the matter anyhow—stated:

I present a petition signed by Edward de Valéra, member elect of the British Parliament, and other officers of the Irish republican army, praying for the complete liberation of the Irish Nation. I ask that the petition be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the petition was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Then follows the petition, with the names of the signers.

Mr. President, I must have been out of the Chamber when that request was made or I should certainly have called attention to the Senate Rules and Manual, paragraph 5 of Rule VII of which says, in part:

No petition or memorial or other paper signed by citizens or subjects of a foreign power shall be received, unless the same be transmitted to the Senate by the President.

Mr. President, I understand that this very petition was sent to the Vice President with the request that it be placed in the RECORD, and that the Vice President, referring to this rule, called attention to the fact that it could only be submitted to the Senate through the President of the United States. I presume some one has imposed upon the senior Senator from Illinois.

Mr. President, as soon as the Senator from Illinois comes into the Chamber, I desire to state now that I shall ask that the petition be expunged from the permanent RECORD.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4285) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I always dislike to discuss the river and harbor bill. It seems to arouse so much heat in the breasts of certain Senators and apparently it makes such angry feelings, that I do not want in any way to be a party to arouse it. It is only because I esteem it a public duty to put before this large body of Senators, incidentally hoping that it may trickle out in some way to the country, the facts about the bill as they occur to me.

Every time we have discussed a similar bill or bills in the past we have always been met with the suggestion that those who fight the river and harbor bill think that they are a little more honest than the rest of the Senators, and such sneering remarks are not pleasant. If not something of that character, then that we are engaged in helping the railroads, because river transportation will injure the railroads. I have never seen any session yet where these arguments were not advanced as to those who were against the river and harbor bill.

Mr. President, I accord to every man who believes in this river and harbor bill an honesty of judgment, of purpose, and belief that he is doing his best for the community, for his State and for his district. I think the whole trouble that we have gotten into in this country about river and harbor bills is the question of locality, of something for the benefit of a particular locality instead of a benefit to the entire Nation. That is the trouble with our country anyhow. We think along local lines. Our internal war troubles are caused sometimes because men are thinking along local lines, not about the great broad national questions.

I agree with the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT]—despite the heated declaration of the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]—that this bill is full of indefensible items. I said on yesterday that, in my judgment, it was the worst river and harbor bill that had ever been here. That is too severe an indictment of this bill, when I reflect back over the years that are gone; I want to withdraw that statement. I do not believe it. I had thought that this grouping of items in bunches, so that nobody could find out just the amounts that were to be used for each particular item, characterized this as the worst river and harbor bill, but the explanation of the Senator from Florida has been somewhat persuasive about that, though not absolutely conclusive. It seems to me that it is a bad policy to put 10 or 12 items together in one lump sum; nobody can bore into the thing to find out what they are for.

The Senator from Utah has pointed out that this Congress and the closing days of the last Congress will have appropriated approximately $11,000,000,000. I do not believe anybody is objecting to that money being used for the prosecution of the war. We are going to win this war if it takes every dollar of of money and property in this country. We have got to do it or be yellow, and the American people are not yellow. But the very fact that these war expenditures are running to such enormous amounts of money behooves Congress, if it cares anything for the taxpayers of the country, to scan somewhat closely the bills that come along here that we are told are war measures. This is one of them. If we do not take care of Smiths Creek and Fishing Creek or Banana Creek, we can not hope to win this war. Where are the torpedo boats going if Banana Creek is not improved, and what is going to become of the submarine if the Wateree and the Congaree and the Okmulgee, and a lot of other "ees"—the Great and Little Peedee—are not improved? It is a great war measure, and to injure this measure or cut it down—ah, what cheer it would carry to the Kaiser! Any man who tries to cut down these appropriations and stop this great war-emergency measure, as we are told, is apt to be put in the line of those who are bordering close to treason to their country. Where are we going to stop these expenditures?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. KENYON. I beg the Senator not to call for a quorum. I have heretofore said when the attempt was made to call for a quorum that it merely required Senators to walk in and walk out. On a warm day the least amount of exercise for a Senator seems to be desirable, and the Senator is little concerned about this bill. It is constructed so as to be sure of passage.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. KENYON. I will not yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator can not help it. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Hollis	Martin	Sheppard
Beckham	James	Myers	Sherman
Borah	Johnson, Cal.	Nelson	Shields
Brandegee	Jones, N. Mex.	New	Smith, Mich.
Calder	Jones, Wash.	Norris	Sterling
Chamberlain	Kellogg	Overman	Swanson
Culberson	Kendrick	Page	Tillman
Cummins	Kenyon	Phelan	Underwood
Curtis	King	Pittman	Vardaman
Fernald	Kirby	Poindexter	Wadsworth
Fletcher	Knox	Pomerene	Warren
Hale	Lewis	Ransdell	Watson
Harding	McLean	Saulsbury	Weeks
Hardwick	McNary	Shafroth	Williams

Mr. JAMES. I desire to announce the absence of the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] on account of illness. I will allow this announcement to stand for the day.

Mr. MYERS. My colleague [Mr. WALSH] is necessarily absent from the Senate on account of illness in his family. He is paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN]. This announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] on account of illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], and also the absence of the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] on account of illness in his family. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-six Senators have answered to their names. The Chair announces that a quorum is present. The Senator from Iowa will proceed.

Mr. KENYON. I wish to say to those Senators who have been disturbed that the call for a quorum was made against my earnest protest by a Senator who I see has himself retired to the cloakroom for meditation. I am not quite clear as to the subject I was discussing at the time of the unfortunate occurrence, but I wish to refer to the present situation in Congress. I wonder why it is that the tax bill which we have heard so much about is not before the Senate at this time. My attention is called to that by reading in the Washington Post of yesterday an article entitled:

Costs $500,000 a day—Delay by Congress on tax bill halts wheels of industry—Alarm felt by business—Expected expansion waits on adoption of definite policy.

Then the article goes on to say:

Business in the country is becoming alarmed by the situation in Washington, and Congress is rapidly losing what confidence business heretofore has had in it, which was considerable in the early stages of the war, but has now dwindled to the vanishing point. The determination to give the pork barrel—

I use that language only because it is in the article; I realize that it is a great offense to use it—rivers and harbors bill the right of way in the Senate this week, ahead of the bills designed to raise the war revenues of the Government, is certain to have a disquieting effect throughout the Nation. The country expects prompt action on the taxation bills, and if Congress were in closer touch with public opinion no further delay would be tolerated.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

Mr. KENYON. I do not indorse the sentiment which is fashionable nowadays to find fault with Congress and make Congress the goat for everything.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. KENYON. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. I interrupt the Senator to inquire if it is not a fact, as he well knows, and the Senate well knows and the author of that article ought to have known, that the tax bill was not before the Senate at all, and that there was no loss of time in handling the tax bill by taking up the river and harbor bill. It is not here yet.

Mr. KENYON. The tax bill, I understand, was before the Senate, and has been taken back to the committee.

Mr. FLETCHER. It is before the committee. The committee is at work upon that bill. What the writer calls the tax bill, I presume, is the revenue bill, and it is before the committee and not before the Senate. Therefore we are not losing any time when discussing another measure.

Mr. KENYON. I think that statement is correct. I wonder why a bill does not come from the committee that is such an important measure, when it has been determined on once, before it was taken back to the committee.

The Senator from Louisiana, interrupting the Senator from Utah, referred to the fact that inasmuch as we are spending $11,000,000,000 of money, this little item of $27,000,000 does not amount to very much any way; that it is inconsequential. I tell you, Mr. President, the Members of Congress nowadays, even if they are very poor, sort of dwell in an atmosphere of tremendous sums of money. We used to think in terms of millions. We have gotten up now to billions. If anybody has the audacity to mention a mere trifling sum of $27,000,000, they call down upon their heads the condemnation of distinguished Senators. Whose money is this $27,000,000 that we are so glib about spending? Is it ours, or are we trustees here in some way for the people who have to pay the taxes? Some day they will have a chance to say what they think about Congress spending money in this way. Twenty-seven million dollars is a trifling sum, according to the Senator from Louisiana. That is just the sum by a strange coincidence that I noticed in reading the paper this morning is necessary to pay the additional amount that we voted to the poor underpaid clerks of the Government in the District; and there is talk now of the economy of cutting out what we have agreed to do for these underpaid men and women employed by the Government just to the extent of $27,000,000. I quote from the paper this morning an article in which Congressman FITZGERALD, chairman of the House Committee on Appropriations, intimated the possibility of being compelled to cut down these salaries to the point where they were before Congress raised them. He says:

There is grave doubt—

Assuming that this article is correct—

There is grave doubt whether Congress will wish to continue the arrangement made for this fiscal year as to the increased pay for clerks. The matter will be taken up when the Appropriations Committee meets in November to begin work upon the regular appropriation bill.

The Government will spend $10,000,000,000 during the present year—and Heaven knows just what the expenditures are going to be in the next fiscal year. The drain will be something terrible in the years to come, and it will be absolutely necessary to hold expenditures to the minimum. When Congress authorized this bonus to the clerks the war was not on, and the expenditures, including the large items for preparedness, did not exceed $1,800,000,000 per year.

In the next breath Mr. FITZGERALD showed a willingness to stand by Government clerks to the limit in the matter of a pension for the superannuated, who have given all their best years to Uncle Sam, and for whom there is no provision for retirement.

AGAINST CONTRIBUTORY PLAN.

"I want to see this thing of pensions done right by Congress," he declared. "I am not in favor of a contributory system of pensions. Let the Government retire its old and faithful clerks in the only right way—out of its own money."

As the "watchdog of the Treasury," Mr. FITZGERALD scents tremendous expenditures for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and wants opportunity to cut somewhere, but the comparatively small item of $27,000,000 which the clerks will get this year in additional pay is a mere drop in the bucket—and the warm-hearted Brooklyn Representative doubtless will see so many other places to cut when he starts upon the appropriation bills next winter that he will change his mind about the clerks.

Sufficient drops will in time fill up the bucket—

But the point is that the friends of the clerks in Congress must be on guard against the economy cry being applied to them. It is less than four months until the Appropriations Committee will begin work upon the bills for the next fiscal year.

Mr. President, I would not advocate for one moment that we should make no river and harbor improvements in this country. I am simply trying, if possible, to point out, and I shall, where in this bill saving can be made so that a lump sum of $10,000,000 or $15,000,000 at the most would carry on all the necessary river and harbor work. This bill through and through, while it has been cut of many new projects, is the same old friend that has appeared here at every session of Congress. It is slightly battered and somewhat disguised, but easily recognized, though now appearing as a war measure.

As I have indicated before, the people of this country are willing to pay millions of dollars to preserve world democracy. They are not willing to pay a penny to preserve legislative pork. We are admonished by Mr. Hoover to have meatless and wheatless days in this country.

Let us start out by having some porkless bills in Congress. To place a single dollar of unnecessary taxes upon the American people now is a crime, and it is no time to be unloading on the Government a defunct and bankrupt canal, as this bill is doing. We have a proposition here for the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal—costing the Government, if it comes to a 25 or 30 foot depth, $20,000,000—that the Angus commission said in their report was of little use as a ship canal. This, it is true, does not absolutely provide for payment, but it might as well. When the condemnation is made, no one doubts what Congress will do.

Then here is the Cape Cod Canal—C. O. D., cash on delivery; take your canal. I do not know anything about it. You can not find out anything. I have not been able to find out anything about it. I suppose the Senator from Massachusetts will give us that information.

Mr. PENROSE. Will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. KENYON. Certainly.

Mr. PENROSE. I simply want to state here that in my opinion the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal proposition is one of the most meritorious in the measure. It completes the link of waterways from Beaufort, in North Carolina, to Delaware Bay and ultimately up to Boston, if the other canal is constructed. The lower canals were started over a hundred years ago. The Government even at that time thought they were meritorious and made appropriations for them.

Mr. KENYON. Perhaps we will go on with the appropriation a hundred years from now.

Mr. PENROSE. There is an enormous amount of tonnage. I think perhaps the Senator does not realize the tonnage that goes through the Delaware and Chesapeake Canal. It is only 11 miles long, connecting Chesapeake Bay with Delaware Bay. The tonnage from Philadelphia and Norfolk is very large and of an important character.

Mr. KENYON. I would like to ask the Senator if it is a paying proposition now?

Mr. PENROSE. The canal was built a number of years ago and is maintained commercially; they charge tolls. I do not think the people concerned in it are pressing to have the Government buy it. The price fixed—I do not even recall what it is—has been determined on after a very exhaustive investigation. I do not think the Government ever went through a more honest transaction than this.

Mr. KENYON. I say very frankly I do not know anything about it. The Senator from Massachusetts is going to explain it, and we will hear what he says concerning the investigation and the contract.

Mr. PENROSE. As I understand, the matter has been investigated by the Board of Engineers of the War Department for a considerable number of years. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] is more familiar with the status of the matter than I am, but it is a little stretch of 11 miles.

Mr. KENYON. Is the Senator now referring to the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal?

Mr. PENROSE. Yes, sir.

Mr. KENYON. I thought the Senator was referring to the Cape Cod Canal. I am familiar with the Chesapeake & Delaware.

Mr. PENROSE. No; it is a little stretch of 11 miles, which was started a number of years ago by the States of Maryland and Delaware.

Mr. KENYON. I realize that, and they are now indebted to the Government, I think, for some $600,000 or $700,000 that they have never paid.

Mr. PENROSE. I do not know how that is. In what way are they indebted to the Government?

Mr. KENYON. The Government was part owner of the canal and entitled to a dividend on stock, which, I understand, it has not received owing to defalcations or delay of the officers of the company.

Mr. PENROSE. I do not know as to that, but at the same time the canal serves a useful public purpose and a vast amount of tonnage goes through it and pays toll.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. KENYON. I do.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I assume the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] does not desire to make such a gross misrepresentation, at least, as that which I think I just heard. What was the amount that the Senator from Iowa mentioned?

Mr. KENYON. To make this canal sufficient for naval purposes will cost the Government some $20,000,000.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I refer to the statement of the Senator from Iowa that the present canal company was indebted to the Government, I think, some $600,000 or $700,000.

Mr. KENYON. I do not know how much they are indebted to the Government; but does not the Senator admit that they are indebted to the Government?

Mr. SAULSBURY. The Senator from Iowa, I think, said the company was indebted to the Government some six or seven hundred thousand dollars. I think that was his statement. I have stated a number of times on the floor of the Senate that the Government has obtained two or three times a judgment, which is now on appeal in the third circuit court of appeals of the United States, against this canal of $50,000, and I did not want the Senator to fall into the error of saying it was six or seven hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. KENYON. I am glad the Senator interrupted me. We are becoming so accustomed to large figures——

Mr. SAULSBURY. I understand that; but I want to try to keep the statements about this enterprise within reasonable bounds.

Mr. KENYON. I am sure the Senator can defend it. My statement was that this was no time to load onto the Government defunct and bankrupt canals, and that the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal is one of that kind, as I understand it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not think the Senator would make that statement if he had read the public documents which are on file.

Mr. KENYON. I have read the public documents, including the Agnus report and the Casey investigation.

Mr. PENROSE. Will the Senator permit me one further interruption, and then I am done?

Mr. KENYON. I shall be very glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. PENROSE. I do not suppose the Senator is in a hurry.

Mr. KENYON. Not at all.

Mr. PENROSE. In case we should ever reach a state where our coast is menaced by submarines, this system of canals from North Carolina to Philadelphia and to Boston would be of enormous military value in the transportation of munitions and of smaller war vessels.

Mr. KENYON. What is the depth of the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal?

Mr. PENROSE. The proposition of having the Government to take it is to deepen it and develop it, which would take but a very short time.

Mr. KENYON. It would take five or six years, would it not?

Mr. PENROSE. No; it could be done in one summer. It is only 11 miles long. A dredge could be put in there, which would deepen it in a couple of months.

Mr. KENYON. The depth of the canal now is about 9 feet, is it not?

Mr. PENROSE. Yes.

Mr. KENYON. It would have to be made 35 feet to be of any practical use for the Navy.

Mr. PENROSE. I do not think so; but the Senator from Delaware will know the depth which is contemplated for the canal.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, the proposition as to this canal has been to make it from a depth of 12 feet to 35 feet. Personally I am in favor of making it 35 feet in depth, just as I am in favor of building a canal across the State of New Jersey of the same depth. It will then furnish an opportunity to concentrate our fleet from Narragansett Bay to the Virginia Capes.

I want to say to the Senator that this is recommended especially by the Secretary of War, and it is also favored by the admiral in charge of the naval affairs of this country—Admiral Benson. It has been supported by every naval and military man whose acquaintance I have the honor to have.

Mr. KENYON. I had not intended at this time to enter into a discussion of that canal. I have the papers here and expected to take it up when the question was raised. The discussion has been drawn out by the statement which I made—the Senator from Delaware was not here—in reference to unloading propositions of this kind on the Government.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Would the Senator permit me just there to say that I think that is an unfair reference to the people who are the owners of this canal, who, I think, are three or four thousand in number. I happen to know possibly two or three of them, but I am the person who, more than anyone else, is responsible for pressing upon the Government the importance of acquiring this canal and endeavoring in this body to have the Government acquire it, simply because I believe it is one of the greatest projects which the Government can perform. In the opinion of the Secretary of War—not the present Secretary of War but former Secretary of War Garrison—and in the opinion of the War College, the acquisition of this canal will particularly protect against invasion, particularly protect in a summary way, and particularly aid the Navy of this Government in concentrating for the defense of this country in time of war.

The military value of this canal has been reported on by committees of Congress and by boards of engineers since 1886, to my knowledge. This canal in its poor, miserable condition materially assisted in the defense of Washington against the Confederate forces in the Civil War. This canal might, as was pointed out, in 1812 have aided in saving Washington from the invasion of the British troops at that time, if we had been able to get our troops here.

When the Senator has concluded his attack upon the pending measure I shall endeavor to reply to his statements as to an effort to unload bankrupt canals upon this Government. Statements of that kind are not fair to the people who own this canal. The stock is admittedly worthless; the canal does pay net each year 4 per cent on a bond issue of two million six hundred thousand and odd dollars. It is unjust and unfair to the owners of the canal to say that they are trying to unload it on the Government.

Mr. KENYON. The stock is absolutely worthless, is it not?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Yes; I think so; but if the Senator would take the time to read the report of a committee, in which the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] joined, as did also former Senator Works, of California, who was a member of the Senate at that time, he would find that the committee which made the investigation as to value, stated that the stock was worthless, but estimated the value of the bonds at 80 cents on the dollar, which would have made a total sum of about $2,100,000.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the Senator at what they estimated the value of the franchise?

Mr. SAULSBURY. The franchise is worth nothing.

Mr. KENYON. The House placed in the bill at the last session, I think, $1,300,000 for the canal.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Yes; that has been put into the bill once or twice by the Senate committee.

Mr. KENYON. That was an amount which the owners would not accept.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I might say to the Senator that this canal is paying one hundred and four thousand and odd dollars a year interest on its bonded indebtedness. Manifestly, as a business proposition, the people who own those bonds are not going to accept 50 cents on the dollar for a 4 per cent investment.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa permit me to ask the Senator from Delaware a question?

Mr. KENYON. Yes.

Mr MYERS. My curiosity is aroused. I want to ask the Senator from Delaware how can the stock be worthless if it pays 4 per cent net dividend each year?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, the Senator from Montana evidently misunderstood me. I said that the company paid 4 per cent on its bonded indebtedness. It paid dividends on its stock in the olden times, when the canal was up to the then standard of efficiency. It has not, however, paid any dividends on its stock for I do not know how long, but for perhaps 25 or 30 years, though it does pay annually $104,000 plus as interest on its bonded indebtedness, which is 4 per cent on two million six hundred thousand and odd dollars, which is the amount of its bonded indebtedness. The Senator from Montana misunderstood me.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I had not intended, as I have stated, to discuss at this time this canal, and what I shall have to say about it will be only in a cursory way; but I think I will say what I have to say, as the Senator from Delaware is now here and he may be out of the room later.

The Agnus report, I assume, is a very accurate document. Gen. Agnus was the chairman of a commission some years ago which was appointed to investigate this matter—a citizen whose word no man will question and whose character and ability is far above reproach. The estimate was made of the cost to the country of the sized canal that would be of any practical use to the Government for $20,621,323.70. Then the commission say this, which I want to put into the RECORD:

> As stated in a following paragraph of the report, from borings made in 1882 and 1906, the commission has been led to fear the existence of treacherous material for an approximate distance of 7,000 feet along the route of the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal which will require special and costly treatment, by revetment or otherwise, to insure stable conditions. The commission has not sufficient data on which to base a proper design, nor has it the time to secure such data. However, in a comparison of routes a sum of money must be estimated to cover this feature, and $500,000 has been inserted in the above estimate for that purpose.

Further on, from page 8 of the same report, I quote the following:

> In its investigations by means of borings the commission has confirmed the very unfavorable conditions noted by Capt. Thomas Turtle, Corps of Engineers, United States Army, in his report of March 1, 1883, to Lieut. Col. William P. Craighill, Corps of Engineers, United States Army. (See Appendix G.)
> Although Capt. Turtle seems to have recognized the serious bearing of this condition upon the fate of the route for a ship canal, there is no mention of it in either of the final reports made since Capt. Turtle's. There is every indication of a large reservoir of supply of very fine sand which is water bearing and flows with water. In the opinion of the commission, the sand might require at intervals extensive works on both sides of the canal over an approximate length of 7,000 feet to confine it. On account of the great depth of the sand stratum the works would be very expensive. Additional investigations of greater magnitude than heretofore attempted are required before a detailed design is made. The commission with data available can not make even a probable estimate as to the cost of such works, but feels that a certain sum should be quoted therefor, and has stated this estimate above as $500,000.

I want to call attention to this further in the report. It was considered by the Agnus commission as a commercial proposition I think entirely, because they say on page 20:

> The value of the works of the present canal as a part of a ship canal is relatively very small and has not been estimated.

Its value for a ship canal was considered by them to be so small that the committee made no investigation.

Now, I desire to call attention to the hearings before the committee as sustaining what I have said about the condition of this canal and some of its operations. I quote from page 34 of the testimony of Mr. Hall, who was secretary of the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal Co.:

> Senator WORKS. Your stock has reduced in value, too, I suppose?
> Mr. HALL. Oh, the business was much better last year than it has been for a great many years.
> Senator WORKS. Yes; I understand that; but how low have your shares of stock gone?
> Mr. HALL. Well, the stock has not paid dividends since 1876.
> Senator WORKS. I am not talking about what the stock has earned.
> Mr. HALL. I am not prepared to say; I do not know.
> Senator WORKS. Do you know of any sale along about the time your bonds went so low in value?
> Mr. HALL. I think about a dollar a share, or something like that; but there were so few sales, that I could not say. There have not been many sales; only a few in recent years.
> Senator WORKS. The last sale you know of was $4 a share?
> Mr. HALL. Yes; $4 a share.

I also quote from the testimony of Mr. Fry, who was the treasurer of the Southern Transportation Co. The chairman [Mr. SAULSBURY] asked him this question:

> Are you familiar with the physical condition of the canal?
> Mr. FRY. To some extent.
> The CHAIRMAN. Well, what is the physical condition of the canal as it now exists?
> Mr. FRY. I do not think the canal is in as good condition as it was a few years ago. We started in the transportation business about 10 years ago, and we could carry larger cargoes through the canal then than we can at the present time.
> The CHAIRMAN. Explain that, will you?
> Mr. FRY. That is brought about, no doubt, by reason of the canal not receiving proper dredging and proper maintenance. I have always understood that the canal company has not had sufficient revenue to give the proper attention to maintenance. At any rate, the canal seems to be gradually filling up.

I also desire to quote a few words on page 135 from the testimony of Mr. Groves, manager of the Baltimore & Philadelphia Steamship Co.:

The CHAIRMAN. I do not know that you answered as to the present condition of the canal, Mr. Groves.

Mr. GROVES. I am very glad you asked me that. That is the very important proposition of the whole thing. That canal is in a bad condition, a very bad condition. These locks are in bad shape, and they have always been kept in bad shape. They never do anything but what they have to. We had an expcrience there one season, which has been about five years ago.

He went on to explain how the gates fell down. On page 136 he says:

They have no superintendent on that canal, and have not had for years. And then on the sides of the canal the piling is worn out. It has been covered with oak sheet piling and it rots out, and it is in a fearful condition.

I quote now from page 137:

The CHAIRMAN. Have there been any permanent improvements other than necessary upkeep of the canal?

Mr. GROVES. Nothing except what they have to do absolutely.

The CHAIRMAN. Then there has been no work done there which would be considered really as a permanent betterment of the canal?

Mr. GROVES. Not a thing.

The CHAIRMAN. You are familiar with the canal?

Mr. GROVES. Absolutely; I go through that canal, and I know more about it than any living man. I go through it more.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. KENYON. I do.

Mr. SAULSBURY. As the Senator from Iowa has referred to the committee which was investigating the desirability of purchasing this canal, or, rather, the conditions surrounding its possible purchase, and has mentioned former Senator Works, who was a member of that committee investigating the subject, I ask that the Secretary may read a letter which I received some time ago from Senator Works, showing the conclusion Senator Works had come to about it. Then I will ask leave merely to make a statement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa consent that the letter may be read now?

Mr. KENYON. I will be very glad to have it read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE, COMMITTEE ON FISHERIES,
Washington, February 27, 1917.

Hon. WILLARD SAULSBURY,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I had the honor to serve with you on a subcommittee of the Committee on Coast and Insular Survey of the Senate in the investigation of the conditions of the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal Co. and its finances and the physical condition of the canal itself, with a view to determining whether the canal should be taken over by the National Government and made a free canal.

I had known nothing about the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal before that time. The investigation by the subcommittee was a very interesting one to me, and, as you remember, I attended the hearings quite regularly throughout. I will probably not be in the Senate when the question of the purchase of the canal by the Government is finally considered, and I would like to say to you now, if it will help you in any way to bring about what you desire in this matter, that I was thoroughly and completely convinced by the hearings before our subcommittee that the Government should acquire this canal and make it free, and I hope that you will in time be able to accomplish this result.

Sincerely, yours,

JOHN D. WORKS,
United States Senator.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I only desire to say, in addition to that, Mr. President, that the other member of that committee investigating the subject at the time, the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] is still a Member of this body, and I trust that before this discussion concludes he will state his impressions. Mine are so well known that I do not think it is worth while for me to elaborate them at this stage of the discussion; but suffice it for me now to say that the three members of that committee—two of us still being Members of the Senate and the other having expressed himself as indicated in the letter just read—possibly know more about that canal than almost any other Member of the Senate.

Mr. KENYON. I have no doubt of that, Mr. President; I have no doubt that the Senator from Delaware knows more about it than any other Senator, and I have no doubt that he perhaps has assisted some of the booster meetings held in behalf of this canal in Wilmington and other places. It has been the subject of booster meetings for some years. I do not claim to know all about this canal; I have never attended any of the numerous booster meetings which have been held in that part of the country in its behalf. I am merely calling attention to the fact that it does not need to be acquired at this time by the Government as a war-emergency matter, and I reiterate that it is no time to be putting bankrupt canals onto the Government.

Mr. SAULSBURY. May I say to the Senator——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield further to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. KENYON. I do.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The Senator can not accuse me of sleeping upon the matter of the acquisition by the Government of this canal. I have been endeavoring——

Mr. KENYON. Of sleeping on the matter?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Yes.

Mr. KENYON. Oh, no; I have not accused the Senator of that; far from it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I have been endeavoring for the last three years, notwithstanding the opposition of the Senator from Iowa, to get this canal taken over by the Government for the very purposes that we may now need it, as we are in war; but the argument when we are in war is that we can not make it available before the war is finished, and prior to the war the argument was that we would never need it. Even a few months ago, when I tried to find out through a similar effort to the one I am making now, exactly what this old canal, this decrepid canal, as it is, this canal that does not pay any dividend on its stock, could be bought for by the Government, the Senator stood just as he stands now, and opposed the acquisition by the Government of the information as to what this canal would cost, so that we might consider whether it was worth while to secure it.

Mr. KENYON. Now, let me ask the Senator a question. I will premise the question by saying that I certainly have not accused the Senator of sleeping on this project at all. His constituents need not worry about that. I am sure they should be impressed by the Senator's enthusiasm for it; but what I want to ask the Senator is, Has the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy ever asked for the acquisition of this canal as a military or naval matter?

Mr. SAULSBURY. They have both recommended it. I am not sure that in any formal communication the Secretary of the Navy has done so, but I know that he is in favor of it. Admiral Benson, who is the technical naval man in charge of our naval affairs, strongly favors it. The Secretary of War has twice in the last two years recommended its acquisition. His letters were sent to the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate on April 3, 1916, and on April 19, 1917. In a letter addressed to a Member of the House, under date of May 8 of this year, the Secretary of War says:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, May 8, 1917.

Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. MOORE: In reply to your letter of the 25th ultimo, urging the expediency of early action by this department looking to the condemnation of the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal, I have the honor to inform you that I have already recommended its purchase in a letter to the Committee on Military Affairs under date of April 3, 1916, when I not only gave it favorable consideration as to purchase but also recommended its subsequent enlargement to a depth of 25 feet and a bottom width of 125 feet. These views were again expressed by me in a letter to the Committee on Military Affairs on April 19, 1917.

It is hoped that this matter may have the early attention of Congress and receive its favorable consideration.

Yours, very truly,

NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

Those views are concurred in by the Secretary of the Navy and by Admiral Benson, and the project has been advocated by Admiral Melville, I think, as long ago as 1886, although I am not sure of that date. Admiral Dewey favored the Government obtaining this canal, and every technical naval and military man of whom I know who has ever had anything to do with the consideration of this matter has recommended it.

Mr. KENYON. Then, how does it happen that the agitation for the acquirement of this canal never commenced until a few years ago?

Mr. SAULSBURY. If the Senator will allow me, there has been a great deal of agitation regarding it. Possibly it was one of the booster meetings in Wilmington which caused the revival of this subject. My distinguished friend, the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL], and the distinguished Representative from Philadelphia, Mr. MOORE, visited Wilmington, and had a meeting there among the business men only about a month or two after I had been elected to the Senate, and before I had taken my seat. They did me the honor to ask me to preside at that meeting. I had then no knowledge of this matter; I had never considered the subject, and never examined the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal. I presided at that meeting, and became very much interested in the matter. I continued the investigation of it, and became convinced of its very great value and merit. I am the reason—I think I may claim that credit—for the very great effort which has been made in the last three or four years to acquire this canal for the Government, because I believe it is one of the greatest things we can do in the way of the defense of this country, and particularly of the defense of my State, to which of course I give special attention.

Mr. KENYON. That was about the first agitation of the matter, was it not?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Oh, no. This agitation has gone on for years. I remember away back in the seventies, when I was very young, my uncle, who at that time was governor of the State, was very strongly advocating the building of a new canal—not this canal, but one across the lower part of the State from Baltimore. So the agitation has been going on for years and years. This canal was built back in 1829.

Mr. KENYON. I want to say that I do not believe by any means that this canal is the worst project in this bill.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I am obliged to the Senator for going that far.

Mr. KENYON. I am inclined to believe there is some merit to the proposition, but I do believe that now is not the time for the Government to undertake this tremendous expenditure, unless the work can be made use of during this war and be of some benefit during the war.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President——

Mr. KENYON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I was going to say to the Senator that the only expenditure called for on this account under the present bill is $5,000, which is to be used for the simple and sole purpose of ascertaining by means of a commission of condemnation how much this canal will cost the Government.

Mr. KENYON. But this commission is authorized to make contracts.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Oh, no; I may say to the Senator that——

Mr. KENYON. The bill provides that—

The Secretary of War is hereby authorized to enter into negotiations for the purchase of the existing Chesapeake & Delaware Canal, and all the property, rights of property, franchises, and appurtenances used or acquired for use in connection therewith or appertaining thereto; and he is further authorized, if in his judgment the price is reasonable and satisfactory, to make a contract for the purchase of the same, subject to future ratification and appropriation by Congress.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Precisely; to obtain an option on the purchase, practically.

Mr. KENYON. Well, of course, when the Secretary of War makes the contract and brings it in here, that is the end of it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. If I may be pardoned, Mr. President, the Senator need not fear for one moment that the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, or the President of the United States can make any contract to purchase this canal at any reasonable figure.

Mr. KENYON. They can not make a contract?

Mr. SAULSBURY. They can not do it; it is a legal impossibility for them to do it.

Mr. KENYON. Well, then, what is the use of putting it in the bill?

Mr. SAULSBURY. For the obvious reason that it is necessary to base condemnation proceedings upon an attempt to make a contract and upon the failure to make one. So far as I know, every condemnation proceeding must be based on a failure to contract, and the reasons must be given. The Senator recognizes that. That is the sole and only reason for putting in the bill the provision which the Senator has read. I have ample evidence, which I can read to the Senator, that it is quite impossible to make this contract. The president of the canal company himself says it is impossible; he has written to a former Secretary of War to that effect; and that statement has been repeated to me in a letter from the counsel of the canal company. The proceedings for condemnation, as I have said, must be based on the failure to contract, and therefore on application the commission of condemnation is to be named by the Attorney General, under instructions of the Secretaries of War and of the Navy, so that the amount necessary to be paid for this canal may be ascertained.

There is $5,000 appropriated in this bill for that purpose. This canal has been estimated to be worth to the Government $2,514,000. I think a few years ago, when I started this effort, it could have been purchased for $2,200,000.

Mr. KENYON. The property has been running down ever since, but the price runs up when it is to be unloaded on the Government.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I think that the agitation has caused it necessarily to go up, because it has aroused hope among the owners of the bonds and stock of this canal.

Mr. KENYON. Aroused hope that the Congress will take it?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Precisely so; and for that reason they will not give up their bonds and stock.

Mr. KENYON. I think their hope is probably well founded. I assume, of course, Congress will take it. No proposition in the river and harbor bill can be defeated.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I sincerely hope that it will do so at some time or other; and I shall keep at it until I either go out of Congress or until the Government does acquire it.

Mr. KENYON. I did not understand the last statement of the Senator.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I say I sincerely hope the Government at some time or other will acquire this canal, and personally I think it is such a great thing, and the result will be so desirable for the welfare of that particular portion of the country that I have the honor in part to represent, and for the benefit of the Navy and the defense of this country, that I sincerely hope the Government will acquire it. I shall certainly endeavor in every way in my power to further it.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I imagine that Congress, whatever their view about it may be, may as well capitulate. The Senator has proposed it as an amendment to most of the bills that come along and has been very diligent in the matter. If we are to have a great intercoastal canal from the neighborhood of Boston on down through and down the coast, paralleling the ocean, as is the plan, and across the Gulf to Louisiana, and possibly on to Mexico and the Rio Grande, this little insignificant affair is not worth very much discussion, because the plans of these river and harbor boosters contemplate a series of canals and waterways absolutely paralleling the ocean from Boston to the Rio Grande, which leads one to remark, Why an ocean anyway?

I want to get back, now, Mr. President, because I was diverted. I am always impressed by the argument the Senator from Delaware makes on this canal. I have heard it a good many times, and it is pretty hard to resist it. This bill is brought before us in the nature of a preparedness—a war measure. I want to call attention to the fact that in the House the Democratic caucus refused to place this river and harbor bill on their legislative program as a war measure. They did not so regard it. This bill contains $200,000 for surveys, and these certainly can not be in any way related to the war. It is interesting to observe the proviso which the House placed in the bill with relation to these surveys on page 41:

Provided, That no examination or survey herein provided for shall be made until after the close of the war with Germany except such as the Secretary of War shall recommend as associated with the prosecution of the war.

That is the way the bill stood. The committee struck out "recommended as associated with the prosecution of the war" and inserted the word "direct," so that the war connection of these surveys that the House had carefully guarded is eliminated by the Senate committee.

I should like to call attention to the fact that there are unexpended balances on hand, or were in March, of $31,428,146.70. There were unexpended balances from former appropriations on the 1st of July of $19,838,432.37. So now we find on the 1st day of March that that was over $31,000,000 of unexpended balances. There is a million dollars that was set aside in the river and harbor bill of 1915 for use for emergency purposes. Not a cent of that million dollars has ever been used. So we had on the 1st day of July, of unexpended balances, about $20,000,000. Those could not be transferred, I realize, to any project except the particular project for which the appropriation was made; but I have here the balances as to these different projects. I think I will put some of them in the RECORD.

The Pollock Rip Channel had unexpended on March 1, 1917, $82,474.73. The balance July 1, unexpended, was $23,000.

Nantucket Harbor, March 1, 1917, $12,206.99; July 1, 1917, $12,206.99.

Providence River and Harbor, March 1, 1917, $372,411.93; July 1, 1917, $80,000.

Newport Harbor, March 1, 1917, $34,102.91; July 1, 1917, $25,942.

Harbor of refuge at Point Judith, March 1, 1917, $22,203.75; July 1, 1917, $22,106.41.

New London Harbor, March 1, 1917, $117,802.38; July 1, 1917, $25,400.

Connecticut River above Hartford, March 1, 1917, $3,094.50; July 1, 1917, $2,500.

Harbor of refuge, Duck Island, Conn., March 1, 1917, $67,510.33; July 1, 1917, $15,000.

So it runs. In some of them there is no balance whatever available, but nearly all have some balance.

For instance, Flushing Bay Harbor, N. Y., March 1, 1917, had a balance of $81,573.21; balance July 1, 1917, $80,300.

In the Wilmington district, Cold Spring Inlet, March 1, 1917, $43,306.78; July 1, 1917, $40,000.

Raccoon Creek on March 1, 1917, had a balance of six thousand and some odd dollars. On July 1 it had no balance left.

Alloway Creek had a balance on March 1, 1917, of $4,902.99. There was nothing left for Alloway Creek on July 1.

Mantua Creek had a balance of $13,699.99 on March 1, and on July 1 a balance of $2,300.

Absecon Inlet on March 1, 1917, had a balance of $35,845.09; on July 1, 1917, a balance of $4,000.

There is no apparent freight or boats at Absecon Inlet, as far as I have been able to see from a personal visit to the inlet; nothing but a dredge sucking out a little sand and taking it out into the ocean and getting rid of it. There was a balance on hand for Absecon Inlet, and this dredge is doing nothing but spending the money that has been appropriated for that particular place; but it is trivial, so, of course, it is inconsequential.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. KENYON. I do.

Mr. McLEAN. If I will not disturb the continuity of the Senator's remarks, I should like to ask him a question.

Mr. KENYON. Not at all.

Mr. McLEAN. Referring to page 4 of this bill, where I see there is an appropriation of $71,000 for some seven or eight different harbors along the Connecticut coast or in the Sound, does the Senator know how that money is to be allotted where these appropriations are bunched and include a dozen different projects?

Mr. KENYON. I will say to the Senator that it was explained to us yesterday that that is in the interest of economy, and, of course, being in the interest of economy no one will question it. The bill is drawn in the interest of economy, of course, but the engineer has the right to spend that money as he pleases.

Mr. McLEAN. If the first project necessitates the expenditure of the whole fund, then the other projects get nothing. Is that the idea?

Mr. KENYON. Of course. I call the Senator's attention to one section of the bill providing just how that may be done.

Mr. McLEAN. Very well. I will not interrupt the Senator further; but it seems to me that is a very strange way to leave the matter, because it is entirely within the discretion of he engineer in charge, I suppose, to appropriate all the money to a single project.

Mr. KENYON. I am going to read the Senator section 2, page 31:

SEC. 2. Where separate works or items are consolidated herein and an aggregate amount is appropriated therefor, the amount so appropriated shall, unless otherwise expressed, be expended in securing the maintenance and improvement according to the respective projects adopted by Congress after giving due regard to the respective needs of traffic. The allotments to the respective works so consolidated shall be made by the Chief of Engineers as authorized by the Secretary of War. In case such works or items are consolidated and separate amounts are given to individual projects, the amounts so named shall be expended upon such separate projects unless, in the discretion of the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War, another allotment or division should be made of the same. Any balances remaining to the credit of the consolidated items shall be carried to the credit of the respective aggregate amounts appropriated for the consolidated items.

So that the Secretary of War, acting through the Chief of Engineers, has the right to do anything he pleases, as I understand, with that fund.

Mr. McLEAN. But, if I remember correctly, the Senator, in reading the balance of the appropriation for Duck Island, said that it was originally something like $60,000, and that there is now remaining something like $6,000. My impression is that the whole appropriation for those seven or eight harbors would not be any more than sufficient to take care of Duck Island, though I am not sure about that.

Mr. KENYON. I am not informed as to that, either.

Mr. McLEAN. But evidently the plan of the bill is one that will probably assist in its passage by leaving these separate contracts to the discretion of some officer and appropriating a sum of money sufficient perhaps for one.

Mr. KENYON. I hope the Senator will not suggest such a thing as that this bill is in any way drawn so as to assist its passage. This is a purely patriotic bill, presented here as a war-emergency measure. Without it the war may fail.

Toms River, N. J., had a balance on March 1, 1917, of $4,649.39.

Old Mans Creek had a balance of $4,609.38 on March 1, 1917. There was nothing left for Old Mans Creek on the 1st of July, 1917—a most unfortunate situation.

There was no balance left for Little River, Del., nor was there any balance left for Woodbury Creek in New Jersey.

As to Susquehanna River, there was a balance of either $8,550 or $6,550.

Broad Creek, in Maryland, had $8,000 left on the 1st of July. The Rappahannock River, in Virginia, which had $30,000 on March 1, 1917, had $3,000 on the 1st of July.

Norfolk Harbor, which had $74,591.52 of unexpended balance on March 1, 1917, had $59,431.78 on July 1, 1917.

The Roanoke River had a little over $2,000.

Fishing Creek, N. C., had on March 1, 1917, $1,402.05, and, remarkable to relate, had $1,402.05 on July 1. Fishing Creek, as I understand from the discussion yesterday, while mentioned in the bill, has been rather harshly treated and can receive none of the money in the lump-sum appropriation unless it be a few pennies that fall from the tables of the other projects that are grouped with Fishing Creek.

Pamlico and Tar Rivers had nothing left on the 1st of July.

Contentnea Creek had $769.94 of balance on March 1, 1917, and nothing on July 1, 1917.

Smiths Creek, N. C.—I do not know which Smith that is; one of the Smiths—had on March 1, 1917, $1,525.96, and on the 1st of July had $23.96. The number of Smiths Creeks was 23.

Swift Creek—that is the name of it—on the 1st of March, 1917, had $1,000, and on the 1st of July had $1,000 of unexpended balance. I ought to say, I think, however, that in some of these cases there were contracts made. I have not given the figures as to the balance available exclusive of outstanding liabilities or contract obligations. I have not undertaken to give those figures.

The harbor of refuge at Cape Lookout had an unexpended balance of $471,358.21 on March 1, and of $66,696.63 on the 1st day of July.

The Little Peedee River, one of the great institutions of South Carolina, had $485.07 on the 1st of March, and it had gotten down to $250 on the 1st day of July.

The Great Peedee River, related in some degree to the Little Peedee, had on the 1st of March, 1917, $4,641.17, and had nothing left on the 1st of July.

The Santee and the Wateree and the Congaree, all of which are in this bill, had $35,329.11 on the 1st of March, 1917, and $10,000 on the 1st of July, 1917.

So it goes, Mr. President; and the final figures are as I have given them before: Balance available March 1, 1917, exclusive of outstanding liabilities and contract obligations, $31,428,146.70; on the 1st day of July, $19,838,432.17; and that, with the million which was set aside in a former river and harbor bill, makes practically $20,000,000 available for the specific projects on the 1st day of July.

Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Georgia that where this money is judiciously expended it is not wasted. Just how the system that has grown up in this country can be remedied, whether through Congress or through a commission, is a most difficult problem. I am contesting these bills because there is so much waste in them. It is true that the railroads of this country have undoubtedly done much to destroy traffic on the rivers of our country. Other nations handle that problem where they absolutely control or own the railroads, and the two work in harmony; but the railroads have a great advantage over the rivers. They can get to the factories with their switch tracks. They can go to the banks with their bills of lading and get money. They are not so much troubled by problems of ice. The water carrier is at a great disadvantage. How that can be remedied, short of the Government absolutely taking over the railroads and the waterways and operating them jointly, it is pretty difficult for anybody to say; but we have gone along in this country with this dribbling policy on rivers and harbors, and we have not gotten anywhere.

Here is a time of all times when the people are calling for transportation, when the element of transportation enters into the high prices throughout this country, when the railroads are short of cars, and yet the great waterways of this country, like the Ohio and the Mississippi and the Monongahela, are carrying a very small portion of the commerce of the country. We have spent in this country approximately $900,000,000 on our rivers and harbors. There has not been so much complaint about the harbors. The complaint has been that the railroads have secured nearly all the terminal facilities of these harbors—a legitimate complaint. The waterways, the great rivers, have not been able to carry on their work in competition with the railroads.

Why, we have spent on the Mississippi River over $150,000,000, and yet the commerce on that river has gone down something like 80 per cent. We have spent enough to build a railroad on each side of that river from St. Paul to New Orleans and let the Government operate it. Col. Townsend, in a speech, I think before the Rivers and Harbors Congress here, tried to explain why it was that the rivers were losing this commerce. I think it is something that we must deplore. The Mississippi River runs along my State the entire width of the State. You can get on the Mississippi at St. Paul and come down the river and scarcely meet a boat. Once in a while you will meet a boat. That great waterway, that neglected opportunity, apparently could carry the commerce of this country that does not materialize.

The address of Col. Townsend in relation to that subject was placed in the RECORD in the House some time ago. It is worthy of the careful reading and thought of any person who is interested in this subject. I am going to refer to just one or two things in it. He says:

St. Louis for the past 50 years has been the principal origin or terminus of the traffic on our western rivers, and its records summarize their tendencies. Its river commerce attained its maximum of 2,120,000 tons in 1880, and has since steadily declined to 153,000 tons in 1914. In contrast, it may be stated that the commerce at Sault Ste. Marie, the outlet to Lake Superior, in 1880 was 1,300,000 tons, and attained a maximum of 79,000,000 tons in 1913. The commerce of New York Harbor exceeds 125,000,000 tons.

Now, after discussing the railway question, he said:

Nor is it an answer to the question to charge unfair competition by railroad magnates in granting rebates, carrying freight at less than cost price until the boat line has been bankrupted, making contracts at uniform rates to their patrons during the entire year, and charging excessive rates to those who utilize the boat during periods of navigation. Whatever may have occurred in early days, such methods have practically ceased since the establishment of the Interstate Commerce Commission; but the decline in river commerce has been more rapid, since the railroads have been compelled by law to give the shipper equal rates, than when there was no restraint on the practices of which they are accused.

Nor can the decline of commerce be attributed solely to the shallowness of our rivers, nor the failure of Congress to make adequate appropriations for them. For the past 10 years there has been maintained in the Mississippi River at all stages a channel of 9 feet from Cairo to New Orleans, and one of 8 feet from Cairo to St. Louis—a channel which far exceeds in navigability that of the far-famed Rhine with its 50,000,000 tons of freight annually. Yet it has produced no visible effect on the decline of commerce.

In the opinion of the writer the failure to utilize our rivers for transportation arises primarily from much more powerful causes than those above mentioned and which it will be far more difficult to correct. The United States differs from European countries in that the latter were developed before the age of steam and were forced to rely on water transportation for the movement of freight.

Then he goes on to discuss the question of the location of the factories, and the conditions existing on western rivers being such that the shipper turns to rail transportation. I want to get at his real reasons for this declaration. He said:

For this condition of affairs the American people are responsible rather than Congress. The average voter is provincial. A local improvement appeals to him more strongly than a well-digested plan which will be of benefit to the entire country. He theoretically is a believer in a reform in the methods of making appropriations for rivers and harbors, but with the proviso that the particular stream in which he is interested be included in the general plan. He even talks glibly of the "pork barrel" and river and harbor steal without the remotest idea that his pet measure may be classed in such a category, and if a Congressman should support a bill which did not provide for such local interests he would run great danger of failure at the next election. In their efforts to relieve themselves from this tyranny of their constituents, Members of Congress have delegated to the Corps of Engineers a power to review all works of improvement before taking action thereon.

Further:

By considering the Mississippi Valley as a whole, and treating the problem of transportation by water just as a railroad handles transportation by land, i. e., first completing a trunk line connecting those localities where there is a large commerce awaiting transportation, and then successively completing the most important branches, much better results would be obtained.

But we have actually had instances in river and harbor appropriations where the branches were made deeper than the main channels of the stream. Then here is his recommendation, and this is the recommendation that Congress ought to think a good deal about.

Specifically the writer would not abandon—

This is Col. Townsend, who is the head of the Mississippi River Commission, a great authority on waterways—

Specifically the writer would not abandon any navigable stream in the Mississippi Valley that has been partially improved, but would leave 58 of them in their statu quo, confining operations to snagging and the maintenance of existing works, and would concentrate appropriations on opening up a channel of the capacity of that existing on the lower and middle Mississippi to Chicago and Pittsburgh. Chicago is accustomed to water transportation. The topography around Pittsburgh has forced the shipper to build his factory on the river bank. These centers of trade, therefore, afford the best opportunity of determining whether the shipper wants river transportation. They, with New Orleans, are the keys to the problem. If the facilities thus afforded by the Government are utilized, the upper Mississippi and the Missouri Rivers should then receive attention. When they are facts accomplished, the other streams should be improved in the order of their importance. But it must frankly be admitted that such a program will be impossible of accomplishment without a change of sentiment in the average American voter. While it is impossible to indict a people, they can be educated.

So Col. Townsend put his hand on the nerve of the whole matter. It is the desire to secure something for the local community, and that leads to this piecemeal system, and it leads to this dribbling policy. Gen. Marshall, who was for several years Chief of Engineers, once said:

Few, if any, of the larger works have ever been prosecuted at a rate sufficiently rapid to realize the fullest efficiency and economy.

When the whole improvement is provided for then the community makes its plan for docks, the construction of boats, and so forth.

Mr. NEWLANDS, the distinguished Senator from Nevada, once said on this floor:

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Utah will permit me, I will say that I regard the moneys that are now being spent upon the small streams under the present system as practically wasted.

I wish to put in the RECORD just an instance or two of this dribbling policy. In 1890 work was commenced upon the Colbert and Bee Shoals Canal, above Riverton, on the Tennessee River. That was not finished until 1911. Some time ago I read an article in one of the magazines that a lock on the Columbia River had been 24 years in building. The James River project was commenced in 1884 and it is only now about half completed, and will require some $3,000,000 more to complete it.

Sandy Bay Harbor was begun in 1884 and has been in progress ever since. We have expended nearly $2,000,000 on it, and it will require $5,000,000 more to complete it. They have been about 30 years on it already. That is an example of this waste, a waste that runs through this bill; and of course I realize nobody cares anything about these instances that have occurred in the history of river and harbor legislation.

The Hennepin Canal was constructed at a cost of over $7,000,000, and in 1913 there were only 11,000 tons of freight which went through that canal. Out of the $900,000,000 that have been expended on these rivers and harbors it is a perfectly safe estimate that half of it has been squandered. We have abandoned projects when it became apparent that it was idle to keep them up. The mere fact, as the Senator from Florida suggested yesterday, that a part of this goes to maintenance of projects already completed is not in every instance a complete argument, because it may be utterly useless as to some of these insignificant and trivial creeks, even though they have been completed—whatever can be completed about them—to keep on spending the public money.

We abandoned Grand River, Mich., I think, after expending over $400,000 upon it, having very small commerce, the engineer's report in 1913 stating that the commerce involved was insignificant. We abandoned that instead of keeping on and spending year by year thousands of dollars on Grand River.

Mr. President, I realize what a perfectly enthusiastic reception my remarks on this subject have. I realize what a perfectly hopeless proposition it is to ever weed out anything in a river and harbor bill. I have seen this Senate adopt projects that the Army engineers had condemned and adopt them on yea-and-nay votes, while we are always told to follow the Army engineers.

I have made up my mind, while in the past I have been perfectly willing to stand up day by day and argue out these river and harbor bills, that if this kind of expenditures are the kind of expenditures the people of this country want, I do not know that it is the duty of a Member of this Congress to enter into an extended discussion of them, no one paying any attention to him, simply to take his right, as he has the right, to give his view as briefly as he can and to put in the RECORD some of the figures and get a yea and nay vote upon it, and let the people in Congress respond, as they will some day, to their constituents for voting their money as money is voted in these river and harbor bills.

The Big Sandy River, $1,700,000 expended; in 1913 about 300 tons of coal floated on it.

Cape Lookout Harbor, that Gen. Kingman pronounced to be dear at any price.

On the Arkansas River, on which we have spent three and a half million dollars, where the commerce has dwindled to insignificance.

Ouachita River, with a system of locks and canals upon which we have spent $3,000,000, not enough commerce to speak of. Yet this bill provides for turning over a fund that is left from Lock 7, I think it is, and putting it on Lock No. 5, over $300,000. It is wrong, of course, ever to turn any of this money back to the Public Treasury. Keep putting it into the bottoms and rocks of Ouachita River. Then go out and tell your folks about it. Tell them it does not make any difference what they are taxed. Tell them we have not got time to pay attention to these things; we are too busy. They are going to pay some attention to it, though, some day. Mark that.

I have heard Senators talk about projects and say, "That is my project." One distinguished Senator on this floor some years ago said that the river and harbor bill was a steal, but he said, "we want our share." One Congressman testified before the House committee as to a project, that it was "his baby." Ah, it is funny, a huge joke these things are, but $27,000,000 is so trivial that the Senator from Louisiana does not want to pay any attention to it.

It is not very trivial on these clerks, upon whom you are going to save in the District of Columbia, just cutting out that much so that you can have an appropriation for your Banana Creek, and your Swift Creek, and your Fishing Creek, and your Altamaha and your Okmulgee, and your Great and Little Peedee. Those are for military and naval purposes, of course. We have reached the point now that at the last session of Congress we even had, if such a term can be used, a pork-barrel fish-hatchery bill, fish hatcheries spread over the country, and if you take the members of the committee you can locate where the fish hatcheries were, and a public-building bill with public buildings for towns of less than 700 people; but it never got out of the committee in the Senate. Thank the Lord for that! Oh, it is a lot of fun spending somebody else's money for war purposes like this fake measure. How you do enjoy it! Would you spend your own money this way?

Mr. President, the country will be absolutely lost if the Okmulgee and the Oklawaha and Sarasota Bay are not improved. If the inland waterway from Pensacola to Mobile Bay is not improved, how can this country carry on a successful war?

Mr. FLETCHER. Will the Senator allow me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. KENYON. I yield, if the Senator will explain it.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not want to interrupt the Senator, but I will say to the Senator that that project is not in the bill at all.

Mr. KENYON. The Oklawaha River?

Mr. FLETCHER. The canal between Pensacola and Mobile is not in the bill at all. As to the Oklawaha and the other streams mentioned, there was not a cent for improvement; it was for maintenance.

Mr. KENYON. There is some maintenance, and the Oklawaha was in the bill presented here by the committee just before we adjourned.

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes; it was.

Mr. KENYON. For about $700,000.

Mr. FLETCHER. And it ought to be in this bill.

Mr. KENYON. I know the Senator thinks so.

Mr. FLETCHER. It ought to be.

Mr. KENYON. We would feel safer in this war if the Oklawaha was in here for more, I am sure. Where are your torpedo boats, where are the submarine destroyers if you do not improve the Oklawaha River and if we leave it out of this bill? What a shame to leave it out of this bill! What cheer it will bring to the Kaiser!

Mr. FLETCHER. Does the Senator claim that there is no connection between the movement of the products of the country, the food of the country, from the producers to the consumers; that that has no relation whatever to the public affairs of the country or even to the war?

Mr. KENYON. Is it the purpose to improve the Oklawaha River to reclaim the land so that food can be raised?

Mr. FLETCHER. The purpose of it would be to enable the 85,000 bushels of corn that are produced on the banks of the river to reach a market, together with the other products.

Mr. KENYON. If the Senator conceives that that is the purpose, I do not see why anything was left out of the bill on that theory.

Mr. FLETCHER. It ought not to have been left out.

Mr. KENYON. No; the Senator would not have left it out if it were left to him. If there are rivers or creeks in Florida that the Senator would have left out, I would like to know what they are.

Mr. FLETCHER. There are plenty of them, but you have no rivers in Iowa——

Mr. KENYON. We have no rivers in my State? We have rivers in which you could put all the rivers of Florida, and then there would be room for more.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Government controls the jurisdiction and supervision over these navigable streams. You can not have a bridge go across one of them, you can not do anything on one without the consent of the Government. The Government ought to take care of them. If the Senator has any in his State that need that sort of improvement the Government ought to take care of them.

Mr. KENYON. I know that is the Senator's theory, and so he puts in this bill a survey for Banana Creek as a great water proposition. I have the history here of the county in which Banana Creek is located, giving the rivers and everything else in the county, and I have the Rand-McNally map and have searched in vain for such an insignificant stream as Banana Creek is. The Senator believes in that. He believes in it honestly; I do not question that. He believes that it is the proper expenditure of public money. He did not put Banana Creek in here merely to satisfy our allies, the Italians; he put it in because he believes that Banana Creek might be so improved that it would be a great national resource. He believes in that; I grant him that right; but I do not believe in it. He has a right to fight for it and I have a right to fight against it, and propose to do so.

Senator Toombs once said on this floor:

> It has become a national disgrace for Congress to engage in a miserable scramble for a slice from the public Treasury.

Mr. President, I am now going to take up some of the projects in this bill. I did not intend to take so much time on this matter, but one does not know where to stop.

Let us go along through the bill a little. "Boston Harbor." I do not mean to contend at all that Boston Harbor is not a great project, and that the Government ought not to improve it in every way, but I am referring to this more to show two things: First, that a new system has been devised in this river and harbor bill, whereby unexpended balances are turned over to some project without any particular appropriation, and then the project is fastened upon the Government as a going project; and secondly, to show that they do not follow the Army engineers. I refer to the item of Boston Harbor, on page 3 of the bill:

> Boston Harbor, Mass.: The unexpended balances of appropriations heretofore made and authorized for this improvement are hereby made available for improvement in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 931, Sixty-third Congress, second session.

The existing project—35 feet—costing $7,994,000, is nearly completed. The project for 40 feet depth, which is the project referred to in House Document No. 931, is to cost $3,845,000. Now, see what Col. Newcomer says before the House committee on page 16 of the hearings:

> Mr. TREADWAY. I did not intend to ask it, but since you have made that statement, I will ask you why Boston was eliminated?
> Col. NEWCOMER. For the reason that the new project proposed there was one to provide for a greater depth only at the outer entrance, which was rendered advisable on account of wave action. It does not give an increased depth to the docks at all, because the inside channels will remain at 35 feet, but solely for convenience in entering a port like that it is desirable to have an increased depth over the bar outside. It is only a question of providing greater convenience in getting in It is a very desirable matter, but it is not a need of any urgent character. It is a case where a few hours' delay will enable them to meet the situation.
> Mr. TREADWAY. That is the commercial situation?
> Col. NEWCOMER. Yes, sir.
> Mr. TREADWAY. You are not referring to the question of getting to the navy yard?
> Col. NEWCOMER. It is the same thing in that respect. We do not require any increased depth to the navy yard. That depth is 35 feet.

There is an Army engineer—Col. Newcomer—who says they do not need the 40-foot project to get to the navy yard. The testimony continues:

> Mr. TREADWAY. There are two or three more questions that I would like to ask. What is the need in this bill for items for surveys?
> Col. NEWCOMER. We did not really pay much attention to the question of surveys. That is a matter that we did not consider especially important from our point of view. There are a great many of those items in here that appeal to me as being superfluous.

So we have—and I am not seriously objecting to the Boston Harbor proposition; I am citing it for the reasons stated—so we have the beginning of a new system of turning over unexpended balances in order to establish a certain project with practically no consideration by Congress, and making it a project that hereafter comes up for its appropriation; and secondly, to show that the infallible Army engineers are not always followed.

All the new projects, and especially the project for New York Harbor, can hardly be objected to; but I want to show what the testimony of the Army engineers as to Hell Gate is; and almost everybody is in favor of making the thing better over there by blowing the hell out of Hell Gate. I shall read in a moment what was said by Col. Newcomer in answer to inquiries from Mr. HULBERT. Remember, this is a 40-foot channel now through East River to Hell Gate. The proposition of the bill—and I am not finding fault with that, but I am showing it is not in accord with the testimony of the Army engineers, and we are continually told by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] that the Army engineers are very close to divinity. I quote from the testimony as follows:

> Mr. HULBERT. Do you not regard the strategic value of the East River as providing the means of ingress and egress to and from the Brooklyn Navy Yard, and particularly in view of the fact that there are four bridges across the river, the demolition of any one of which might entirely block off the navy yard, as a sufficient justification for adopting at this time 40 feet at Hell Gate?

Col. NEWCOMER. It seems to me that 35 feet at Hell Gate is really adequate, for this reason: The depth of 35 feet, with 5 feet of tide, gives you practically 40 feet. The draft of our heaviest battleship contemplated is about 33 feet. It seems to me that 35 feet will answer. Of course there would be a certain advantage in having access to the navy yard for a crippled vessel; but whether you would want to go to the very large expenditure that would be involved in the 40 feet all through Hell Gate in order to provide that facility, in addition to the other across Diamond Reef, I do not know. The Navy Department has not asked for it.

We are told that this is a project required for military and naval purposes; that every one of the new projects, as was stated on the floor yesterday, the Army engineers have stated were war projects. If I am mistaken, I shall be glad to be corrected by the chairman of the committee. Now, Col. Newcomer comes in and states that there is no necessity for the 40-foot channel through East River and Hell Gate; that a 35-foot channel is sufficient, and that the Navy Department has not asked for a 40-foot channel.

Mr. CALDER. Will the Senator from Iowa yield to me?

Mr. KENYON. I will.

Mr. CALDER. I hold a copy of a letter in my hand which is addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors of the House of Representatives, which was written by the Secretary of the Navy, in which he very strongly advocates the building of this 40-foot channel.

I may say to the Senator from Iowa that it was after this letter and the letter from the Secretary of War indorsing what Secretary of the Navy Daniels stated, that the Committee on Rivers and Harbors again met and incorporated the proposition for a 40-foot project. If the Senator will permit me, I shall read a paragraph of the letter, as follows:

It will be readily understood that with a 40-foot depth of channel leading into the navy yard from the south and an equal depth through Hell Gate would practically double the strength of our fleet if concentrated in Long Island Sound, for the reason that the exits at Ambrose Channel and Montauk Point are so far apart that it would take double the force to contain our fleet in these waters in order to guard the outlets at both of these points to prevent the egress of our fleet.

Mr. KENYON. I want to say to the Senator from New York, in order that he may understand my position, that I am not opposing that proposition. I think the channel ought to be 40 feet; that is a proper way to spend money on rivers and harbors. New York is a great port; and it is just as important to the people of my State as it is for the people of New York that that harbor be improved. It is also important for the whole country that Hell Gate be blown up.

Mr. CALDER. I thank the Senator from Iowa for approving the improvement of our port and the rivers adjacent thereto.

Mr. KENYON. I want to suggest——

Mr. CALDER. If the Senator will pardon me for just a moment, I might add that I know the Army engineers are not sympathetic with the 40-foot project, but the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy were strongly for it, as was also the President. They saw the wisdom of it, and that is the reason why it is in the bill.

Mr. KENYON. I desire to suggest to the Senator that there ought to be, it seems to me, an amendment to that proposition, in line 20, on page 6, where it reads a "40-foot channel," by making it read a "40-foot commodious channel."

As I understand the situation there it is something like the bow of a stovepipe. If you merely had your 40-foot depth in the center, would it be possible to use it around the bend at that point?

Mr. CALDER. Answering the Senator, I will say that perhaps the project as provided for in the bill would help a great deal; undoubtedly it would; but to be really effective we ought to have what the engineers have termed "a 40-foot commodious channel," and I am hopeful that something will occur to make that possible before we pass the bill.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. KENYON. I do.

Mr. KNOX. I want to ask the Senator if he knows what the depth of the Panama Canal is?

Mr. KENYON. Not accurately; no.

Mr. LODGE. I think it is 40 feet.

Mr. CALDER. I think it is 40 feet.

Mr. KNOX. I should like to ask the Senator if he does not think that at all our principal Atlantic and Pacific ports the minimum depth ought to be at least the depth of the Panama Canal? Otherwise you will be maintaining a waterway down there that will be available for vessels that can not come into our own ports.

Mr. CALDER. If the Senator is addressing me, I will reply to him by saying that undoubtedly the channels in our important harbors and ports ought to be at least 40 feet deep.

Mr. KNOX. If not, it seems to me that we have built the Panama Canal for the commerce of foreign nations that would draw the maximum depth there, but which could not obtain access to our own ports. The formula, I think, should be that the minimum depth of our own ports should be the maximum depth of the Panama Canal.

Mr. CALDER. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. KENYON. Does the Senator know the draft of our largest ocean boats? I do not mean our battleships. Our battleships draw 33 feet, I think.

Mr. KNOX. I know that they can not get into New York Harbor with a 35-foot depth. Perhaps the Senator from Massachusetts, who is more directly interested in harbor work than I am, will be able to answer that question.

Mr. WEEKS. It is not safe for the largest dreadnaught to rely on a 35-foot channel, especially with a rocky bottom and a swift current. All Navy men, where a channel is to be used by the largest type of dreadnaught, desire a 40-foot channel. In connection with that, I will read an extract from the testimony of Admiral Benson, who is now the Chief of Operations of the Navy Department. He was discussing before the Committee on Commerce a very meritorious project, the Cape Cod Canal, and he added this:

It will acquire additional importance if the contemplated measures for deepening Hell Gate are carried through, and they must eventually be carried through, whether at this time or some other time, on account of the additional tremendous strategic importance of that place.

Mr. KENYON. I do not think there is much difference of opinion as to making the channels in all these important harbors of sufficient depth to make them safe, and we could do that if we saved some of the money wasted on worthless projects.

Mr. CALDER. I hope the Senator realizes the fact that the port of New York accommodates 52 per cent of the tonnage of the country, according to the figures of last year.

Mr. KENYON. I realize that.

Mr. CALDER. I am glad to know the Senator realizes it.

Mr. KENYON. I referred, Mr. President, a while ago to a general lump sum of $1,000,000 that was available from a former river and harbor act for any necessary uses, and that is available now. I think I will put the evidence of that in the RECORD at this time. I read from page 132 of the House hearings:

Mr. FREAR. May I inquire if you have not $1,000,000 left from the fund that was appropriated several years ago in a lump sum with which to provide for all immediate necessities?

Col. NEWCOMER. No; not all immediate necessities.

Mr. FREAR. I mean it can be applied to anything——

Col. NEWCOMER. It can be applied to necessities in so far as it will go.

Mr. FREAR. It can be applied to anything which is regarded by the engineers as necessary?

Col. NEWCOMER. Yes, sir.

Mr. FREAR. And that fund can be used at any time?

Col. NEWCOMER. That is available for necessities as they arise. As I said before, we expected that would all be required to take care of the plants and necessary expense of supervision and matters of that kind. As a matter of fact, I might inform the committee that in view of the possibility of the failure of any river and harbor bill this year we have been looking around to see to what extent allotments made from that appropriation might be recalled and made available for more urgent or more essential work. You understand that in making these allotments the work does not proceed sometimes with the expedition we expect, so that it may be a matter of a couple of years before the expenditure is actually made, and it is very likely we could supplement that $1,000,000 by some additional amounts withdrawn from other places. But that is now the unallotted balance.

The grouping process goes on through the bill. On page 7 I find the following:

Keyport and Shoal Harbors, Woodbridge, Cheesequake, Matawan, and Compton Creeks, Elizabeth, Raritan, South, and Shrewsbury Rivers, and Raritan Bay, N. J.: For maintenance, $58,000.

I find grouped also on the same page the following:

Cold Spring and Absecon Inlets, Absecon and Tuckerton Creeks, and Toms River, N. J.: For maintenance, $35,000.

We have appropriated heretofore for Cold Spring Inlet $981,200. There is practically no commerce on that waterway. One place—I think it was Cold Spring Inlet, but I am not sure as to the name just now—was referred to in one of the engineer's reports, and it was stated that the harbor should be improved so as to permit the resumption of the yacht races at one time sailed at Cape May and forming the most attractive event of the season. Of course it is interesting to the taxpayers to contribute nearly a million dollars in order to improve conditions so that yacht races may go on uninterruptedly.

I intend at this point, Mr. President, merely to put in the RECORD the figures showing the amounts expended and the commerce upon a great many of the creeks and rivers provided for in this bill. For instance, on page 12, I shall put into the RECORD the amounts that have been expended and the commerce on the rivers there grouped, namely, Manteo Bay, Scuppernong, Pamlico, Tar, South, Bay, Neuse, and Trent Rivers, Fishing, Contentnea, Swift, and Smiths Creeks, and so forth. On page 13 the Santee, Wateree, and Congaree Rivers; on page 14 the Altamaha, the Oconee, the Okmulgee; on page 16 the Kissimmee, Caloosahatchee, Orange, Anclote, Crystal, and other rivers.

I desire also to put in some facts with relation to the Tombigbee River, on page 20; the Red, the Black, and the Ouachita, and a number of other Louisiana streams, and also the Arkansas, Black, Cumberland, and Tennessee Rivers.

I am going simply to put in what perhaps may be very dry statistics, but they will be handy to have for future reference with relation to these projects and as showing what I have been contending.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator whether the statement to which he refers will cover the appropriations for the years from the beginning on down to the present time or the mere total?

Mr. KENYON. I do not want to put the matter in the RECORD as a statement; I want to put in facts from the records, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. FLETCHER. The matter will show the appropriations for these rivers from the very beginning by years, I take it?

Mr. KENYON. Yes; it will show the origin of the projects and the appropriations.

Mr. FLETCHER. Will it show the commerce?

Mr. KENYON. Yes; for the last three years.

Mr. FLETCHER. Only for the last three years?

Mr. KENYON. I think that is all the engineers' reports show. I will show whatever the engineers' reports show, but I will say to the Senator that I would rather not do it to-night. I can state it in perhaps an hour in the morning.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KENYON. Yes.

Mr. RANSDELL. I will ask the Senator if he does not think it is fair, when he shows the entire expenditure made upon these projects since the beginning of the Government, to show also the entire commerce that the rivers have borne year after year since the Government began to make appropriations for them?

Mr. KENYON. I will say to the Senator that I should be very glad to do that if I had the figures. The engineers' reports do not give those figures, and I am simply putting in the RECORD what the engineers' reports show.

Mr. RANSDELL. Does not the Senator think that it gives rather an improper impression about these various projects when you show the expenditures made upon them, say, for the last 100 or more years, and you show the commerce upon them only for the last three years? That is hardly a fair showing. Is not that a one-sided statement of the case?

Mr. KENYON. Well, just as anybody views that. I suppose that most people realize that there has been some commerce on some of these streams from about the time the improvement started. I was not aware that many of them had been improved for as long as a hundred years.

Mr. RANSDELL. I will say that, for instance, in my own State the commerce on the Red River is undoubtedly very small at the present time. The appropriations on the river are small now. In times past there has been a very large commerce upon the Red River, and the appropriations were fairly large. If you should take the appropriations for the Red River in the aggregate, they would show up pretty large; but if you should take the commerce on the Red River in the past you would find that an enormous quantity was carried on that river, though at the present time, and for the past three years, the commerce has been small. It would not give one a correct idea of what that river was in the former years when we were spending a great deal of money upon it.

Mr. KENYON. Does the Senator contend that the commerce was more upon the Red River before they commenced to improve it than it was afterward?

Mr. RANSDELL. I did not intimate anything of the kind. I said that the commerce on the river was very large in former years. I remember when I was a boy that there was a considerable obstruction in the river near the town of Alexandria, where I was born. That obstruction was removed at very considerable cost. There were no railroads near the river in those days. All the commerce of that section was carried by water. There were considerable improvements made upon the river at heavy cost, and a very large commerce was carried upon it. For the last few years the annual expenditures have been quite small, and the commerce has been small. The only point I was making was to ask the Senator, in all fairness, if in his statement about the Red River he is going to give the total expenditures made from the beginning of the Government upon it, whether he ought not also to give the commerce that has been carried on that stream since the beginning of the Government, so that one might fairly offset the other?

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I have not the commerce on the Red River from the beginning of the Government. I suppose it might be possible to secure it, but I really have no means of getting it. If the Senator could furnish it to me, I should be very glad to use it.

[At this point Mr. KENYON yielded the floor for the day.]

Wednesday, July 25, 1917.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, if there are no other interruptions I will proceed with the merry business we are now engaged in of finding places to waste the public money while the Finance Committee is trying to find things to tax to raise the money. It is quite significant, Mr. President, and somewhat discouraging that at a time when the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] calls the attention of the Senate and of the country to the fact that there will be voted for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, the sum of $17,000,000,000 to cover Government expenses, and, while the Committee on Finance is searching every conceivable avenue of taxation to find methods of taxation to raise a portion of this stupendous sum, we should be engaged in considering a bill carrying on wasteful projects and wasteful systems that have existed in this country for so many years.

If there ever was a time in the history of this country when the Representatives and Senators in Congress ought soberly to investigate and consider the appropriation bills before them, this is the time, but Congress is not doing it, and Congress will not do it. The Senate of the United States will not vote its honest convictions on this bill; it can not do so. I realize the difficulty that Senators are in. I realize that some of the most splendid and honest Members of this body can not vote against this river and harbor bill, or anything in it, because when they do the structure falls down, and when they do they are voting against meritorious projects in their own States. That is the unfortunate situation that arises in connection with river and harbor bills, and I do not believe it is ever going to change.

What are the different political parties going to say to the people of this country? All the political parties, except the Socialist Party, will undoubtedly say that they stand by every expenditure made to carry on this war. It may be that the Nation having the last dollar will win this war. The situation is becoming more ominous every day to thinking patriotic Americans, and yet we hear the doctrine announced on this floor, as was announced yesterday, that our expenditures now have grown so tremendous and $27,000,000 is such an infinitesimal sum that we ought not waste any time considering it.

Mr. President, I am concerned not for the future of our country, because I have a firm belief in Providence, and that in some way Providence is working out great problems for the benefit of the world, but I am concerned as to what is coming in the next few years, if we go on with a condition of affairs that arouses the feeling of the people.

We have been told on this floor that even though more foodstuffs go into beer than go into whisky, we must not touch beer, because if we do trouble and dissatisfaction will be produced in certain communities, but, believe me, these continuous wasteful expenditures are involved in the question of domestic tranquillity more than beer.

The Democratic Party said in 1916—and I am talking in no partisan sense, for there is never any politics in raids on the Public Treasury:

> We demand careful economy in all expenditures for the support of the Government, and to that end favor a return by the House of Representatives to its former practice of initiating and preparing appropriation bills through a single committee chosen from its membership, in order that responsibility may be centered, expenditures standardized and made uniform, and waste and duplication in the public service as much as possible avoided. We favor this as a practicable first step toward a budget system.

The Republican platform in 1916 said:

> The increasing cost of the National Government and the need for the greatest economy of its resources in order to meet the growing demands of the people for Government service call for the severest condemnation of the wasteful appropriations of this Democratic administration, of its shameless raids on the Treasury, and of its opposition to and rejection of President Taft's oft-repeated proposals and earnest efforts to secure economy and efficiency through the establishment of a simple businesslike budget system to which we pledge our support and which we hold to be necessary to effect any real reform in the administration of national finances.

But we can not even get consideration for a resolution which I introduced in the Senate some time ago providing for a commission to study and report on the budget system to the next session of Congress. We are going on spending billions of dollars, creating thousands of offices in this country, with no reports to Congress, and if any attempt is made to provide a war board or war council in which Congress may have a part to ascertain how the money which it appropriates is being expended, we are met with the strongest influence against the proposition.

Mr. President, before taking up a number of these projects and hurrying along as fast as the weather will permit, I ask to have read from the desk an article in the Star, quoting a speech of Vice President MARSHALL at one of the conventions of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress in this city.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

FOR INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION CONTROL OVER ALL TRAFFIC—VICE PRESIDENT MARSHALL ADVISES RAIL AND WATER BUSINESS BE COORDINATED—SPEAKS AT CONVENTION.

Vice President MARSHALL to-day advised the National Rivers and Harbors Congress, in convention at the New Willard Hotel, to insist that the Congress of the United States coordinate the control of the rail and water traffic of the country under the Interstate Commerce Commission, first enlarging the personnel of the commission so that it may have enough men to do all the work that will be necessary.

"It is not my business to start anything in the United States," the Vice President said. "I discharge my full duty when I listen to the utmost, in all humility, or go to sleep, when these questions are discussed before me. But permit me to suggest, not as one who knows, but as one who has listened, that it would be to the interest of the men who stand for improved waterways in this country to have the Interstate Commerce Commission enlarged and to commit to its care the control of both rail and water rates and the manner in which they affect each other."

CRITICIZES WATERWAY IMPROVEMENTS.

Mr. MARSHALL said he believes there is an absolute necessity for completely overturning the United States Government on the question of interstate commerce. The people of the country, he said, will never be satisfied "with the present slipshod methods of river and harbor improvement." He said he had looked at river and harbor bills himself, "sometimes with a yellow and jaundiced eye," and he thought some of them had contained projects which ought never have been approved by Congress. He advocated such improvements by legislative action "in a scientific way."

"You will not dispute the fact," Mr. MARSHALL said, "that the more money you expend the less traffic you have. Traffic does not arise as a result of improving rivers. The railroads have the right to meet river traffic rates. They do meet them, and the result is that notwithstanding the fact that rivers have been improved, traffic on rivers ends when the railroads meet the river rates." This, Mr. MARSHALL said, is a condition which will be improved if the control of water as well as rail rates is committed to the care of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, on yesterday the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] placed in the RECORD a letter from Gen. Black. Among other things, the general said:

At the beginning of the present session of the Sixty-fifth Congress I was directed to recommend to the Secretary of War such items for a river and harbor bill as I believe to be now a military necessity.

It does not seem possible that Gen. Black recommended all of the items in this bill as a military necessity, and yet that is the way his letter reads. Now, let us see how essential to military conditions are some of these mighty streams of commerce.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator to make a suggestion?

Mr. KENYON. Yes.

Mr. FLETCHER. Perhaps I am somewhat at fault in the statement I made, and I think perhaps the Senator has fallen into the same error. What were referred to as being based upon military necessity, or having direct relation to the national defense as specified by the Chief of Engineers, were the new projects in the bill. I have been, perhaps, a little broad in some statements that I made, that every item in the bill was considered a military necessity. What I meant was the new items in the bill; because, as I explained in the outset, the completed projects are provided for under the head of "Maintenance," and the projects already adopted and under improvement under the head of "Maintenance and improvement." Then come the new projects, which are based upon the idea of having direct or indirect relation to the national defense, or, in other words, the military necessity. So it is with reference to the new projects that I wanted to confine that observation which I made myself and which, I think, may have mislead the Senator.

Mr. KENYON. I assume that is probably what Gen. Black meant. I can not imagine that he would include all of these projects as military necessities.

On page 12 of this bill, under this new grouping system, we find, under one item, a number of matters. True, the item is small, but it illustrates the system; and I put into the RECORD the facts concerning a number of these items.

Scuppernong River: Engineers' reports, volume 2, page 2185. The Government has expended the sum of $34,900 on that river. The reports show a commerce up and down the river of 9,448 tons. This includes over 2,000 tons of lumber, which, I assume, can be floated without any large improvement to these streams.

Mr. WATSON. What was the value of that commerce?

Mr. KENYON. The value was something like $380,000.

Contentnea Creek, N. C., which is included in the same grouping system: I want to read into the RECORD from the Engineers' reports, volume 1, page 549, the original condition of this mighty stream of commerce:

Previous to improvement this stream had a depth of about 3 feet during nine months of the year from its month to Stantonsburg, 63 miles above the mouth, but was obstructed throughout its entire length by fallen timber, sand shoals, and overhanging growth, and was navigable for shallow-draft craft only during the higher freshet stages of about three to six months of the year.

The existing project was adopted by the river and harbor act of March 3, 1881, and contemplated clearing the stream of obstructions so as to obtain from its mouth to Stantonsburg a depth of not less than 3 feet during the higher stages about nine months of the year, at a cost estimated in 1888 at $77,500. It was amended in 1894 to limit maintenance below Snow Hill and extended in 1899 to include maintenance to Stantonsburg.

The work of the year consisted of removing from the channel 360 obstructions between the mouth and Snow Hill, 32 miles, using the United States hoister Contentnia and hired labor. There was expended in this work $961.96, all for maintenance, as a result of which the natural channel was unobstructed.

The project was completed in 1896 for $13,105.44 less than the estimate of 1888. Since that time work has been confined to maintenance principally below Fools Bridge.

A very appropriate title for a bridge on this stream.

A channel free from obstructions and 3 or 4 feet deep exists for from six to eight months during the year to Fools Bridge, 42 miles. Above that point the stream is in poor condition. Expended on present project to June 30, 1916: For improvement, $64,394.56, and for maintenance, $19,532.33; a total of $83,926.89.

Now, let us see about the commerce on this great waterway. Without the development of these mighty waterways this war, of course, will be a failure. The commerce for the year 1915 amounted to 9,607 short tons. In 1913 the commerce was 8,684 tons. So the commerce on this stream has increased somewhat. The work that was done in the year, as shown by the engineers' reports—

Consisted of snagging for the purpose of clearing the natural channel of obstructions from the mouth to Snow Hill 32 miles above the mouth. * * *

The hoister Contentnia began operations on this stream on February 18, 1916, and to March 31, 1916, removed a total of 50 large logs, 33 stumps, 45 snags, 29 saw logs, 11 trees, and 1½ cords of small snags from the channel; and cut and hauled back 177 trees and 14 cords of brush from the banks.

There will be little trouble about the fuel question this winter. We can get our wood out of some of these streams.

Commercial statistics, season of navigation, 1915: Navigable during freshet stages only; about three months during the year.

The commercial statistics I have given.

We have spent $85,000 on this stream. Is it not honestly time to abandon projects of that character?

Mr. WATSON. What is the value of that commerce?

Mr. KENYON. The value of the commerce is given as $146,975. Of that, 6,900 tons was timber of a value of $20,000.

I pass now to another mighty stream of commerce.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, has the Senator stated the amount carried in this bill for maintenance of Contentnea Creek?

Mr. KENYON. It is impossible to tell. That is the advantage of this grouping system; the engineers can spend any amount of it on Contentnea Creek, or all of it. The Senator from Florida stated the other day that it was $1,000.

Mr. FLETCHER. That is the amount. It is not impossible to tell, if you refer to the report of the engineers. That is the estimate for it—$1,000.

Mr. KENYON. Of course a man feels very cheap now in saying anything about $1,000.

Mr. FLETCHER. The commerce was valued at $146,975.

Mr. KENYON. I have stated that, of which about $20,000 was timber.

I pass now to the next great waterway in this plan of developing our waterways as included in this group system, and that is Smiths Creek. I have no information as to the amount of this appropriation that will be used for Smiths Creek, but it can all be used; and just for the sake of history and some people who may quietly, around their own firesides, read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, to save them the trouble of looking up the engineers' reports, so that they may understand how the people whom they have elected to Congress are standing by their rights and keeping them from unnecessary taxes, I put a few facts in the RECORD from the engineers' reports:

Smiths Creek rises in Pamlico County. * * * It is about 5 miles long, but navigable only 2 or 3 miles above its mouth. Wind tides prevail throughout its entire length.

That is a very advantageous thing to know.

The discharge depends on prevailing winds and is impossible to measure. The current is sluggish. The fall is very small. Average width between banks is about 100 feet.

The commerce for the last three years, which is all that is given in the engineers' reports, is as follows:

1913, 2,935 tons.
1914, 3,545 tons—

You see, it is gradually growing up. There is an enormous increase—

1915, 5,896 tons.

There is one good thing about that creek. We have not spent such an enormous amount of money on it; only about $17,000.

Mr. SMOOT. It was only discovered about three years ago.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to state, in fairness, that the bill does not carry a cent for Smiths Creek, unless it is possible that something is left over out of the lump-sum appropriation for these items and from those that are specified and estimated for. In other words, the commerce on Smiths Creek was $145,000 last year, and there is no estimate for any expenditure on that creek at all; and therefore none of this money will be spent on Smiths Creek unless, as I say, something is left over, and it is needed there, from the other items mentioned in the bill.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator states there—and I do not charge the Senator at all with the responsibility for it—the unfairness of the whole system pursued in making up this bill. Twelve or fifteen items are grouped in here together, and then a lump sum is applied to them. Under the very terms of this bill, with which the Senator must be familiar, the section near the close of the bill, the engineers are given the power to spend this money in any of these groupings just exactly as they please. So it is not quite fair. The Senator has, perhaps, a good deal of information as to what the Army engineers are supposed to do.

Mr. FLETCHER. No.

Mr. KENYON. The Senate has not that information.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am basing that, if the Senator will allow me to say so, upon the report of the engineers that is submitted to Congress and printed, and is here on the desks, and is in the document room. The reports show the estimates made for the different items in this group.

Mr. KENYON. Well, what is this put in the bill for?

Mr. FLETCHER. Only for this reason—now, let me ask the Senator if this is not reasonable:

Suppose during the current year, between now and June 30, 1918, a storm should come, or some accident should happen, whereby the channel should be closed up; and suppose the engineers could take a dredge out of Fishing Creek or Contentnea Creek, where they might be working, and in a day's time remove that bar. Would not that be a wise thing to do? It would cost almost nothing; but the engineers could not do it unless you grouped these items in this way. By grouping them in this way they would have authority to do it in case of an accident or emergency like that, and that is the whole purpose of grouping. The reports themselves show specifically every item for which estimates have been made, and there is not an estimate of a dollar made for Smiths Creek, so that it can not be spent there except in case of some emergency like that, which I believe would be proper and economical.

Mr. KENYON. No; it can not be spent there unless the engineers decide to spend it there. That is true, and that is the whole situation. I agree with the Senator that there is a storm coming, but it is coming from the voters when they discover some of these appropriations.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. KENYON. I yield. I have agreed with the chairman that I was going to get through in a reasonable time, but I am glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. RANSDELL. I do not intend to get into any controversy.

Mr. KENYON. I am perfectly willing to get into a controversy.

Mr. RANSDELL. I merely want to ask the Senator a simple question, and it is this: In view of the very great car shortage all over the country, does not the Senator think that these two little creeks which he has named—that is to say, Contentnea Creek, with something over 9,000 tons of commerce, in other words about nine trainloads of commerce, and this other creek, Smiths Creek, with about 6,000 tons of commerce, something over six trainloads of commerce—does not the Senator think that those creeks make an important contribution to the freight carrying of this country, in view of all the car shortage we have? Fifteen trainloads are carried on these two little creeks, one of which is going to get $1,000 in this bill, and the other nothing.

Mr. KENYON. Oh, well, I do not believe—and I say this in all respect to my distinguished friend from Louisiana, for whom I have a great affection—I do not believe there is a creek in the United States but that my good friend has a notion could be improved and made navigable.

Mr. RANSDELL. That does not answer my question.

Mr. KENYON. Of course I am interested as much as the Senator is in the car-shortage proposition. It is a serious matter. I do not know but that I would vote to build cars, but there are not any railroads along a lot of these creeks. The Senator might just as well build railroads down there as to do this. It would be just the same proposition. I have a little interest in the people who will have to pay for all of this, as well as the people who are to have their freight transported, and I know the Senator always has the notion that anybody who opposes a river and harbor bill is in some way trying to help the railroads. I will join with him in any kind of a plan that will amount to anything, that will not be just a wasteful plan, to try to bring into some kind of coordination the railroads and the great rivers of the country. I am not going to join in any plan for Fishing Creek and Contentnea Creek, and affairs of that kind.

Mr. RANSDELL. Would the Senator be in favor of abandoning all these waterways, which in the aggregate carry an immense commerce? I listened with a great deal of pleasure to the Senator's very able discussion of the high price of coal and have tried to follow him in his efforts to reduce its price. He has been one of the leaders in this coal proposition. It has been suggested by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] and others that one of the greatest troubles in regard to the high price of coal is car shortage. In the aggregate an enormous volume of freight is carried on the waterways of the United States. In and around Pittsburgh there is something like 15,000,000 tons of commerce carried on those waterways—the Allegheny, Monongahela, and Ohio Rivers—and it is coal. Would the Senator favor our abandoning these waterways and forcing the freight that is now carried on them to be carried by rail? Would not that add very materially to the present car shortage?

Mr. KENYON. I have heard that argument so many times——

Mr. RANSDELL. It has not been answered by anybody.

Mr. KENYON. Oh, no; no one will ever answer it to the Senator's satisfaction. The Senator answers it by improving all the creeks of the country. I am, of course, in favor of improving the great rivers, and everybody else is, and lessening the strain on the car proposition in this country. But it is always that way—the Ohio River, the Mississippi River, and the Monongahela are linked up with these little good-for-nothing projects, and then a Senator rises and beats his breast and announces that this great commerce of the country is going to be destroyed. That is the trouble with the whole river and harbor system. You put a good proposition in and then you join onto it a lot of indefensible things, and if you are going to beat the indefensible things you have got to beat a good proposition, and you can not do it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. KENYON. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. Would it not be well for the Senator to remind the Senate that three years ago, when there were 247,000 idle cars sidetracked in the country, we were asked to make appropriations for the same little creeks and streams, and the only question then was to advance commerce. Is not that true?

Mr. KENYON. Well, we might as well be perfectly frank about these little streams. Everybody knows it. It is not for commerce, but to help elect men to Congress. What is the use of going around the corner about that proposition? A man goes home with an appropriation for Contentnea Creek or Podunk Creek, or a public building, and he is tendered a great banquet, and leading orators pronounce him the greatest statesman we have had in modern times. That is not true of all, of course. That is practically what the general I quoted yesterday announced is the trouble with the whole system.

I proceed now with a few more matters for the RECORD. We understood the other day that Fishing Creek was in the same situation that the Senator now says some of these other creeks are, but let us see. Let us see the great work that has been done for Fishing Creek. The work consisted of snagging, and so forth:

The hoister Contentnia started work on this stream on January 25, 1916, and worked until February 2, 1916——

Mr. NEW. In what State is that?

Mr. KENYON. In North Carolina.

The hoister Contentnia started work on this stream on January 25, 1916, and worked until February 2, 1916, when operations were suspended, the stream having been restored to good condition. She removed from the channel 21 logs, 4 stumps, 16 snags, 8 saw logs, and 2 trees, besides cutting and hauling back from the banks 8 trees. This work was accomplished at a cost of $726.91, which gives a unit cost of $12.31 per obstruction or threatened obstruction removed. Other expenditures were $162.15 and were in payment for district and field office expenses.

We have not expended a great deal of money on this stream—$32,750; of course, merely a driblet.

COMMERCIAL STATISTICS.

Season of navigation, 1915: Navigable for about three months in the year, during freshet stages only.

Commerce upstream, 128 tons—I do not know how many carloads that would be—downstream, 2,322 tons; a total commerce of 2,450 tons.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. KENYON. I yield.

Mr. KING. Have the engineers in these various projects given the size of the river—that is, the number of cubic feet of water per second, the depth and width, to determine whether it is navigable or nonnavigable? Have they fixed any standard, or is it not a fact that any stream 2 or 3 feet deep that dries up for 10 months in the year and may float saw logs is denominated a navigable stream?

Mr. KENYON. I think it has been defined by the courts that a navigable river is one that can float logs. I have some indistinct recollection of such a decision in Wisconsin.

Mr. KING. In reading the proceedings of the commission I would imagine the determination of the court cuts but very little figure in determining whether a stream is navigable or not for the purpose of getting money out of the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. KENYON. I will say to the Senator that if he will search back through these engineer reports he will find one report, at least, where the amount of water was one-tenth of a foot at the head of navigation.

Mr. KING. If my friend will pardon me, I remember when I was in the House reading one of the reports submitted by an engineer where the stream was denominated a navigable one, and in the report it was stated that by sinking artesian wells at a considerable expense and pumping the water from those wells into the little streams that they called navigable it might be made navigable and would float a few logs and carry a flat bottom. That was one of the streams the improvement of which was recommended.

Mr. KENYON. I think it stands as a brilliant historic fact that it was recommended by the Army engineer that the way to get water in certain streams was to sink artesian wells at the bottom. Other plans have been suggested by other people—of macadamizing some of the streams and making highways of them. A committee of Congress did visit a stream in Texas, and they were met at the depot by a local committee and asked to go up the stream in a buckboard; there was not enough water for a boat. These are extreme cases, of course.

I want to go on with this monologue:

Existing projects: The original project, adopted by Congress under the river and harbor act approved September 19, 1890 (H. Doc. No. 32 51st Cong., 1st sess., and Ann. Rep. for 1890, p. 1179), was to clear the stream of logs, snags, trees, etc., up to Bellamy's mill, about 50 miles above its mouth, so as to give a minimum low-water depth of 20 inches and a minimum width of 40 feet, at an estimated cost of $25,000.

I call the attention of the Senator from Utah to the great fact that originally the plan of this creek was to give it a minimum depth of 20 inches—not 10 inches, but 20 inches—and they spent on that $31,062.54.

Another one of this group is Pamlico River, on which there has apparently been considerable commerce, a complete commerce of 177,000 tons downstream and about 100,000 upstream, but when analyzed you discover that about 120,000 of that is timber. Now, listen to this:

From July 1 to August 11, 1915, inclusive, she—

The dredge Hercules—I do not know how the name happened to be "she"— removed a total of 43,882 cubic yards of material, 25 logs, and 43 stumps, completing the channel to the bridge. This work was done at a cost of $8,981.15, or a cost of 20.4 cents per cubic yard, including logs and stumps. In addition, $7,485.09 was paid the appropriation for Cape Fear River, N. C., at and below Wilmington for use of dredge Hercules and attendant plant.

The original project for Pamlico River as adopted by the river and harbor act of August 14, 1876, was to provide 9 feet at low water from Washington to the mouth at an estimated cost of $28,050. This was combined in 1880 with the original project for Tar River, adopted by the river and harbor act of May 3, 1879, for the removal of obstructions between Washington and Tarboro, at an estimated cost of $10,000. In 1887 the project was modified to provide a depth of 20 inches and a width of 60 feet to Tarboro, and the estimate was increased to $75,000. It was again increased in 1889 to $76,000.

What a profound joy there must be in the hearts of the American people who are saving and sacrificing to pay the enormous taxes put upon them to read of the mighty projects that there have been in the river and harbor bills of the past, for the stream that is included here in the bunch system to get 20 inches of water and a width of 60 feet. What kind of a stream is that, anyhow, 20 inches deep and 60 feet wide? It would be a good deal better, as the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] suggests to me, to turn it up on the side. It would be a good deal deeper.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I wish to assure the Senator from Iowa that in the West we have canals for irrigation purposes that will hold a great deal more water than that. Yet we have not the temerity nor the indecency to come here and ask Congress to make appropriations for them or to make them navigable streams.

Mr. KENYON. For the Senator from Utah to speak in that disrespectful way of this great war measure borders close to treason. I resent it.

Mr. RANSDELL. Will the Senator kindly read the commerce and its value on the Pamlico River?

Mr. KENYON. I did.

Mr. RANSDELL. I did not hear you. I heard you say 286,000, tons and most of that was timber, as though timber was not commerce. That was valued at $3,537,000. I did not hear you read that. That is a very considerable commerce.

Mr. KENYON. Did the Senator read the value of that. I did not read that. I read the commerce.

Mr. RANSDELL. And intimated that timber was not commerce.

Mr. KENYON. Oh, no; but I intimated that timber and logs and matters of that kind can be floated down stream without all these tremendous appropriations.

Now, Mr. President, I pass from that group, although there are other very interesting matters in it, but I am really in earnest in wanting to get through. I pass to the group on page 13 of the bill.

Northeast, Black, and Cape Fear Rivers. It requires a good deal of time to get these statistics, but I know the Senate is in no hurry, as we have nothing else to do until the bill comes out to tax the people.

Black River, volume 1, page 590:

The project was completed in 1895 and has been maintained since that time. The river is in good condition, the governing low-water depth being 5 feet to Point Caswell, 2½ feet to Hawes Narrows, 32 miles above the mouth, and 1½ feet to Clear Run. Expenditures on present project up to June 30, 1916, were: For new work, $12,358.40; for maintenance, $22,767.18; total, $35,125.58.

There is a real river with a foot and a half of water at Clear Run, or the possibilities of a foot and a half at Clear Run. The country is going dry pretty fast, and it extends to a lot of these streams.

Cape Fear above Wilmington, page 592 of the report:

During low-water season, however, numerous shoals over the upper 66 miles of the river between Wilmington and Fayetteville gave a depth of only 12 to 14 inches—

Now, listen to this—

In addition, the upper 75 miles was badly obstructed by sunken logs, overhanging trees, snags, etc. The remainder of the river was generally navigable the year round by vessels drawing about 3 feet of water, but even this section contained many snags and logs. Tidal range, 2½ feet at mouth to 1 foot at Kings Bluff, 39 miles above.

We have appropriated for the Black River $36,300. The commerce, according to these reports, for the year 1915 was 19,856 tons down the river, 2,678 tons up the river. Down the river there were 13,000 tons of timber, making a total commerce less the timber of about 10,000 tons.

Work during the year was carried on by Government plant and hired labor. The General H. G. Wright was employed a total of 19½ days snagging and clearing banks between a point 39 miles above Wilmington and a point 72 miles above. She removed from the channel 77 logs, 81 trees, and 10 stumps, and cleared from the banks 275 trees.

We have appropriated for this river above Wilmington $184,750. The commerce is not given in volume 2. I will see if it is given in volume 1. But listen to what great work has been done:

As a result of the year's work a fairly cleared natural channel at low water was maintained from Wilmington, 7 feet deep to Browns Landing, 72 miles above Wilmington, and 2 feet deep to Fayetteville, 115 miles above Wilmington. As the river runs through a wooded country, however, trees and logs are brought into the channel by each of the numerous freshets.

What a farce, and to be going on at just this particular time, with an expense this year to the Nation of $17,000,000,000 for war purposes.

On page 591 of volume 1:

When placed under governmental improvement in 1881 the river was navigable during about nine months of the year up as far as Fayetteville. During low-water season, however, numerous shoals over the upper 66 miles of the river between Wilmington and Fayetteville gave a depth of only 12 to 14 inches. In addition, the upper 75 miles was badly obstructed by sunken logs, overhanging trees, snags, etc. The remainder of the river was generally navigable the year round by vessels drawing about 3 feet of water, but even this section contained many snags and logs.

As to the Northeast River, I find in a previous Engineer's Report, that of 1913, at pages 496–497, the following:

Amount expended on present project up to June 30, 1913, was $33,738.86, of which $10,687.96 was for improvement and $32,050.90 for maintenance.

As a result of the expenditures to date, the channel has been cleared wherever needed. Six feet of water can be carried to Bannermans Bridge and 3 feet to Crooms Bridge during all stages of the water.

From Crooms Bridge to Kornegays Bridge, the head of navigation, the river is so shallow that navigation is practicable only when the water is up. This is liable to occur at any time, but during the summer low stages usually prevail.

The minimum low-water depth to Bannermans Bridge is 6 feet; to Crooms Bridge, 3 feet; to Hallsville, 0.5 foot; to Kornegays Bridge (the head of navigation), 0.1 foot.

How do you like that, you people who are going to pay the taxes? How do you like projects of that kind? Why, Mr. President, if this business goes on, I doubt if the Statue of Freedom will be left on the dome of the Capitol. There is not going to be much left to tax.

Mr. NORRIS. Not even the water in the streams.

Mr. KENYON. It would raise very little to tax the water in these streams. I am unable to find in these reports any commerce as to that stream. If the Senator from Louisiana, who knows a great deal about the commerce on these streams, can find any commerce in the reports, I should be glad to have him put it into the RECORD.

Mr. RANSDELL. About what is the Senator from Iowa asking? I thought he was speaking about the upper Cape Fear River.

Mr. KENYON. I am speaking about the Cape Fear River above Wilmington, and I say I did not find any commerce there.

Mr. RANSDELL. If the Senator will look at page 589, volume 1, of the Report of the Chief of Engineers, he will find these words:

Calendar year.	Tonnage.	Value.
1913	123,170	$1,848,558.60
1914	128,518	2,116,210.10
1915	68,116	1,263,962.10

The decrease in tonnage and value is due principally to the falling off in shipments of fertilizer material and lumber.

That indicates some commerce on the stream.

Mr. KENYON. I really thank the Senator for that. I looked for the commerce, and under the heading "Cape Fear River" its commerce is not given. I see it is given in the report to which the Senator refers. I do not know how in the world they got commerce over the river. They must have had some wagons or cars.

Now I pass from that to the Little Peedee River, which is a little brother of the Great Peedee River. The Little Peedee River is really a pretty important stream; it is included on page 13 in the group. The commerce of this river in 1913 was 1,411 tons. That commerce went up rapidly in 1914 to 1,626 tons, and it fell in 1915 to 1,442 tons. We have appropriated $46,700 for that stream, and in the notes of the Engineers it is said:

Traffic has been handled by one steamboat making 23 trips and two tugs making four trips. No regular schedule service is maintained.

Mr. FLETCHER. Before the Senator leaves that matter, I will say that there is no estimate for any appropriation for the Peedee River in this bill, and the bill carries no appropriation whatever for that river.

Mr. KENYON. I am glad to ascertain that, though I feel badly for the poor Peedee River. There is not any way of telling there is no appropriation, however, by looking at this bill, is there?

Mr. FLETCHER. There is a way of telling it by referring to the estimate of the engineers. I can tell the Senator exactly what the estimate is. The report of the Chief of Engineers made in December, 1916, shows the estimates, and the report is available to us all.

Mr. KENYON. We will not quarrel about that, but the engineers can use this fund on these rivers if they desire to do so.

Mr. FLETCHER. They must use the fund in accordance with their estimates, when they are made. There is an appropriation of $65,000 for Winyah Bay and $5,000 for the Great Peedee.

The other projects mentioned in this group are the Waccamaw and Little Peedee, and we can not use a cent of the appropriation for these unless for some emergency which might arise for the opening of a channel, which might be blocked, or something of that kind, if there was any money left out of these funds estimated for Winyah Bay and Great Peedee River.

Mr. KENYON. I do not see that we have any disagreement about that.

Mr. FLETCHER. I want to say to the Senator that the estimates——

Mr. KENYON. The engineers can use funds if, in their judgment, they are necessary for those rivers.

Mr. FLETCHER. They can only use such funds after they have completed the work according to the estimates that they have made on these other items or projects; or in case of some emergency where they might be used to prevent navigation being stopped by employing a dredge or something of that sort to open a channel.

Mr. KENYON. However that may be, I think perhaps it may be a good thing for the taxpayers at some time to read of these streams, and I put into the RECORD from volume 2, page 2246, as to the Great Peedee:

During the fiscal year the United States snag boat Wateree between July 1 and October 11, 1915, carried on snagging operations over 68 miles of this river, removing obstructions as follows:

Overhanging trees felled and cut up	444
Logs removed from river	962
Stumps removed	644
Snags removed	1,006
Total	3,056

We have appropriated for this river $340.679.03. The commerce was 15,758 tons from January 1, 1915, to December 31, 1915. I do not see that that commerce is divided into commerce up the river and down the river, so I assume it is only in one direction.

Mr. President, the next group of rivers I want to take up is the Santee, Wateree, and Congaree. These rivers have the advantage that, at least in the name of one of them there is water—the Wateree. There is no grouping together, I think, further than these three rivers, which, in fact, embrace a system.

Mr. NORRIS. There is not enough water to group; you would run out of water if you grouped them.

Mr. KENYON. From page 609 of volume 1 of the Engineers' Report for 1916 I read as to the Santee River:

Original project: This river was originally much obstructed throughout its length by snags, logs, and overhanging trees. The width ranged from 200 to 500 feet and the least depth was 3 feet. Its bar entrance was narrow, crooked, and shifting, and so situated as to be very difficult and expensive to improve. It had less than 5 feet of depth at low tide. The river was navigated by several small steamers (drawing 4 feet or less) from the sea to the junction of the rivers and thence to Columbia on the Congaree or to Camden on the Wateree River.

* * * * * * *

Some snagging was done by the U. S. snag boats Wateree and Peedee at various times, removing 136 obstructions in the Estherville-Minim Creek Canal and 1 obstruction from the bank of the river. The work was done by hired labor with Government plant. The total amount expended was $4,913.25, all of which was for maintenance.

The condition at the end of the fiscal year, I am sure, will be much sought for. Note how this mighty stream fared:

Condition at the end of fiscal year: A passage 30 feet wide and 3 feet deep at high water through Mosquito Creek to Winyah Bay was originally made, but was later abandoned in favor of the Estherville-Minim Creek Canal, which was constructed to give the project depth of 6 feet, but not to full width of 70 feet. The canal now has a controlling depth of 4 feet for a short distance at the Winyah Bay end, but 6 feet is available at all other points. The minimum width is now 20 feet. The entire river had been snagged.

That is interesting. The least average depth in the Santee River is about 3 feet at low water. The commerce in 1913 was 73,557.5 tons; in 1914, 55,000 tons; in 1915, 25,000 tons—I think those are the figures. The amount expended to June 30, 1916, was $381,392. That does not exactly jibe with the appropriations, but I assume the appropriations are more than the expenditures. Of the commerce logs constituted 18,221 tons out of a total of 25,000 short tons.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask the Senator to what he has reference now?

Mr. KENYON. To the Santee River as improved by the dredges Peedee and Wateree.

Mr. FLETCHER. From what report is the Senator reading?

Mr. KENYON. I have been reading from volume 1, page 612, and volume 2, page 2252.

Mr. FLETCHER. Of the December, 1916, report?

Mr. KENYON. Of the 1916 report.

Now, I come to the Wateree, a delightful little river. I will give the figures exactly for the RECORD; but, as I remember them, we have spent about $280,000 on that stream, which has no commerce and contains no water that amounts to anything, except in its name.

Mr. WATSON. In what State is that?

Mr. KENYON. In South Carolina. The expense of maintenance during 1915 was $7,873.81. The appropriations have been $203,584.27. Here is what the engineers say about the commerce on that stream:

The commerce on this stream is negligible. No figures could be obtained.

Volume 1 says as to the original condition:

Original condition: This stream had originally a low-water depth of from 3 to 4 feet from its mouth to Camden. The lower section of 14 miles was completely blocked at all stages of water by logs, snags, etc., and at moderate stages by the bridges of the Southern Railway and the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Cos., then without draw spans. The nominal head of navigation was Camden, and while steamboats could penetrate to this point navigation was dangerous except at high water. There was no commerce on the river in 1882, though small boats engaged in local traffic had operated on the river prior to that time.

* * * * * * *

Operations and results during the fiscal year: The work during the year consisted in snagging in the river between the mouth and Sumter Ferry, S. C., a distance of 38 miles. The progress of the work was delayed by continuous high water during the winter months. The work consisted in the removal of 5,625 obstructions from the channel and 495 overhanging trees cut from the banks. The work was carried on by hired labor with Government plant. The total amount expended was $8,240.28, all of which was for maintenance.

Here is the condition at the end of the fiscal year, which will certainly be pleasing to those of us who are interested in this great work.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHEPPARD in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. KENYON. I do.

Mr. RANSDELL. I notice the Senator dwells upon the fact that considerable appropriations have been spent upon these streams, and in this particular instance he calls attention to the fact that the total expenditures on the river have been $203,584 and the commerce negligible. Now, I will ask the Senator if he does not think it would be fair, when he states the entire expenditures made since the Government began to improve that stream—probably 40 or 50 years ago—to give also the commerce that has moved on it during the last 40 or 50 years? I know the Senator can not give that commerce, and I will tell him why he can not give it.

The Government has not been keeping, until lately, statistics as to the commerce on these streams, but it has kept statistics as to the amount expended on the various streams. In the records of the Treasury Department the books will show just how much money has been expended on each waterway project, but not until within very recent years were the engineers required to make any reports as to the commerce on the respective streams. So it is impossible to tell how much commerce was moved on these streams in the past. It is possible, with a relative degree of accuracy, to give figures for the last three or four years; but I submit that when the Senator impresses upon the Senate the fact that $203,000 have been expended on this stream, he ought to state to the Senate also that that amount was spent during the lifetime of this Republic, and no man can tell how much commerce has moved over it during all those years, but it was undoubtedly a large amount.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, that statement of the Senator almost moves me to tears.

Mr. RANSDELL. I may say that my remarks apply to all the other figures the Senator has been giving as to the total expenditures on these streams.

Mr. KENYON. I am giving these figures as they appear from the Engineer's Report. I am not reciting the figures to convince the Senator from Louisiana; I am citing these figures in the hope that some of the people of the country will read them. I will say further that no appropriations were ever made for this stream until 1881, so that I can not go back to the beginning of the history of the Republic.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, the Senator is surely too fair a man to mislead anyone. His record for honesty and fairness teaches us all that he would not mislead; but I again submit that it is unfair and misleading to quote figures on one side of a proposition and not quote them on the other. If the Senator is going to show that this amount has been expended and he has not the figures as to the total commerce, he ought, at least, to be fair enough, it seems to me, to say, "I have only partial figures; I have figures on one side of the case; that is all."

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I am exceedingly anxious to be fair, especially to my good friend from Louisiana, and I will state it just as he desires me to state it. I have not the figures for the commerce prior to three years ago. I do not know how to get them. The Senator says that he does not know how to get them. I have a very deep suspicion, however, so far as this river is concerned, that there never was any commerce prior to three years ago, and that nobody could get the figures; but I put the statement in the RECORD now just as he wishes me to do. If I could secure the figures as to the commerce for all these years, I would put them in the RECORD, but I can not do so. I take the figures as the Engineer's Report gives them, for I want to be fair with the Senator, notwithstanding the fact that he has not been fair, I think, with me on some matters to which I will refer later.

Mr. RANSDELL. I did not catch what the Senator said last. The rain is beating on the roof.

Mr. KENYON. I said I was going to be fair with the Senator, notwithstanding the fact that I felt he had not been fair to me with reference to some matters to which I will refer later; which, in short, I will say to the Senator, have relation to a letter the Senator wrote to my State, as the newspapers announced, to a commercial club as to the attitude of certain men toward the last river and harbor bill.

Mr. RANSDELL. I will be glad if the Senator will bring those matters up now. I do not know of any letter that I have ever written to the Senator's State.

Mr. KENYON. I refer to a publication in a newspaper, referring to a letter purporting to come from the Senator. I had intended to call his attention to it.

Mr. RANSDELL. I will be very glad to have it brought up. If I have been unfair to anyone, I want to know it.

Mr. KENYON. I realize the system of back fire that is started on men who oppose these bills.

Mr. President, I was diverted from my remarks. To get back to the waterless Wateree, I quote from page 613 of volume 1:

Local cooperation: None.

Effect of improvement: The project has had no effect on freight rates and has been of no benefit to commerce during recent years.

Condition at the end of fiscal year: The work on the river has consisted of snagging only, using Government plant and hired labor. No dredging has ever been done. The expenditures have not resulted in a permanent increase in depth. The stream is navigable for about 38 miles, the minimum draft that can be carried at low water being about 4 feet. It is not practicable to state the percentage of completion of the project. The work is snagging and must be continued indefinitely. * * *

There is a very interesting House document on this subject, No. 805, in which Col. Biddle, in his report, speaking of this river, said:

The river is very crooked and its banks generally low and subject to overflow. There are no towns and but few habitations visible from the river, and aside from the small amount of remaining marketable timber there is little to suggest possible commerce.

* * * * * * *

Expenditures for some years have been without adequate return, and the further prosecution of the work under these conditions is considered inadvisable. The board therefore concurs with the district officer and the division engineer, and recommends legislation authorizing the abandonment of the existing project for the improvement of Wateree River, S. C.

Maj. Youngberg, of the Corps of Engineers, on page 9 of the same document to which I refer—House Document No. 805—says——

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I will state that the bill does not carry any appropriations at all for the Wateree.

Mr. KENYON. Well, the Wateree is in with the Santee and the Congaree. Do the Santee or the Congaree carry any?

Mr. FLETCHER. The Congaree is the main stream. The estimate is for the Congaree.

Mr. KENYON. That is the same advantage, that no one can tell. Maj. Youngberg says:

The expenditures on this project, exceeding $5,700 per annum, have not sufficed to keep the channel open at all times from the mouth of the river to Camden. A shifting channel and caving banks will never permit the project to be completed, and annual maintenance will always be costly. At no time within the past 25 years has there been a pronounced disposition to utilize the river, even when it was reasonably cleared and open, and for the past five years the river has borne no commerce worthy of the name.

Then let us approach the Congaree. The appropriation is all to be for the Congaree we are told. I read from volume 1 as to this stream, page 614:

Prior to Federal improvement begun in 1886 this stream had a low-water depth of 3 to 4 feet from its mouth to the railroad bridge at Columbia; thence 1 foot low-water depth 2 miles farther to its head. Navigation of the lower 49 miles was blocked at all stages of water by the Southern Railway Co.'s bridge 5 miles from the mouth and by sunken logs, snags, and overhanging trees. Navigation of the remaining 2 miles was prevented by swift currents and numerous rock ledges and bowlders.

I want to give the commerce on this stream. I think it is considerably more.

The appropriations for the Congaree amount to $670,044.44. I am surprised at this commerce. There may be some explanation of it from the Senator from Louisiana. On this stream the commerce amounted to 4,324 short tons; so that on these three rivers in this system, on which we have expended over a million dollars, the commerce is hardly anything.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, may I ask during what period of years that expenditure has been made?

Mr. KENYON. The first appropriation was August 5, 1886. I read from page 2257.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. KENYON. I do.

Mr. STERLING. Will the Senator state specifically for which one of the three rivers that first appropriation was made and the amount?

Mr. KENYON. The first appropriation for the Santee was made September 19, 1890. The first appropriation for the Wateree was made March 3, 1881. The first appropriation for the Congaree was made August 5, 1886. These streams, as I have said, with over a million dollars expended within that period of time, now have a commerce of somewhere around 30,000 tons; not to exceed that, I think.

I think that is all I want to say about those three rivers. I pass now to three other interesting rivers in Georgia—the Altamaha, the Oconee, and the Okmulgee. I have statistics on a great many others here, but I am not going to take the time to go into them.

These are interesting streams. They carry only $40,000 in the bill, but we have appropriated for the Altamaha River $269,951.35. The Army engineers say with reference to the commerce:

There is in operation on this river one steamboat, which made during the year 64 trips from Doctortown to the forks, a distance of 77 miles. The new, self-propelled barge of the Macon-Atlantic Navigation Co. made 16 trips over the entire length of the river, 137 miles, during the last five months of the year.

The commerce for the calendar year 1915 was as follows:

Total by boats, 8,770 tons.
Lumber by rafts and lighters, 67,993 tons.

That is with an expenditure of $269,951.35.

As shown on page 2280, referring to the Oconee River:

From November 27, 1915, to February 20, 1916, the U. S. snag boat Oconee removed 707 snags and 59 stumps and cleared from the banks 366 overhanging trees and 13 logs, covering the channel for a distance of 30½ miles upstream, beginning at a point 80 miles from the mouth.

We have appropriated for that river $306,515.70. The commerce in 1915 was 19,906 tons; lumber rafted, 22,019 tons.

As to the Okmulgee, referred to on page 2281, the Engineer's Report says:

The U. S. derrick boat Sapelo has improved six rock shoals between mileage 148 and mileage 152½, removing 4,706 cubic yards of rock, 7,997 cubic yards of sand and clay, and 44 snags, in improving 3,605 linear feet of channel to a low-water depth of 4 feet with a width of 80 feet. A small amount of bank protection was constructed in the bight above one of the lower shoals. At two of the localities training walls and submerged dams for low-water control were constructed with the excavated material. This work was done at an expenditure of $8,073.34. The cost per cubic yard of material removed was $0.6355.

U. S. snag boat No. 1 was transferred from Savannah to Macon, Ga., in July, 1915, and was engaged in snagging on the upper river to May 27, 1916, except for a short period. The channel from Macon to near Hawkinsville, a distance of 60 miles, was partially covered twice, there being removed from the channel 3,569 snags and 457 stumps, and there being cleared from the bank 57 logs and 35,530 overhanging trees by cutting—and 45 by pulling back, while 2 trees were girdled. This boat was engaged for a few days in removing an old bridge pier at Macon for the Macon, Dublin & Savannah Railroad, at the expense of the railroad company.

There was a forest in this river—

The U. S. snag boat Oconee removed 36 snags and 4 stumps from the channel, and cleared 13 overhanging trees and 4 logs from the banks while on trips made on account of towing other plant.

The grand total of appropriations for this river was $524,527.26. The commerce by boats in 1915 was 19,886 tons; lumber, square, rafts, and lighters, 550 tons; lumber, round, rafts, and lighters, 13,209 tons; making a total of approximately 33,645 tons.

There are three rivers in this system. For one we appropriated $269,000, for another $306,000, and for another $524,000, with a commerce that amounts to practically nothing.

But these streams have great hopes. I want to read some of the evidence before the House committee last year on the Altamaha River. Mr. De Four, on page 7 of division 7 of the hearings, said, speaking of the Altamaha:

The shallow water made it necessary for us to get together all the information that it was possible to get, and then in addition to all the information we could get from the outside to apply a little ingenuity of our own and develop a boat, about which Mr. Long will tell you later on—a boat with which we are able to navigate the river. We can now navigate this river, which is something we were never able to do before, notwithstanding the fact that the people of Macon had spent more than $100,000 in the building of boats. This $100,000 to which I have referred was spent by the people of Macon mainly in building boats along the old lines. After spending that amount of money we saw that we were going in the wrong direction, and that in order to navigate the shallow river we would have to build boats on different lines, on different principles, on principles other than those that had been governing the construction of boats heretofore. Realizing this, we have done that. We have a boat now on the river that will carry 100 tons of freight and draw probably less than 3 feet of water. That boat is now in actual operation, Mr. Chairman. When we appeared here in 1914 we promised to build a boat and put it in operation on the river if given the necessary appropriation. We did not give up, but we have built the boat. * * * In building this first boat and operating it since July 20 last we have learned more about navigation than we knew when we undertook to build that boat. As the result of that we now have in process of construction a boat that is built on even higher scientific principles and more advanced theories than the former one.

I read now from page 8:

We desire that the committee be placed in full possession of all these facts, because when this second boat is built with the appropriation that we have had heretofore we will be enabled to get along, but we can not make the time and get the transportation or tonnage that we could if the appropriation was increased.

Mr. Long, on page 10, says:

We therefore determined to build a steel boat. That was the first thing we arrived at. The second question was, how large a boat should we build, and how should that boat be equipped, etc? That required considerable investigation, because we did not want to make a mistake, and we have not made a mistake. We finally settled upon a steel boat 120 feet long and 24 feet wide and 5 feet deep, built throughout of steel. There is not a piece of wood in this boat as big as your lead pencil except what went into the construction of the ice box.

Further, he says:

We put an electric plant on this boat.

It is a good thing to have a boat on a river.

We can blow a horn, or, rather, a whistle, by electricity, and do various other things.

There never was anybody advocating an appropriation for one of these rivers that could not blow a horn.

We have a number of conveniences, and so on. Our boat carries 83 tons on a 30-inch draft; 160 tons on 48 inches. We can load that boat down as low as 54 inches. When those photographs get back to me I will go into detail, because there are some points that are very important.

Of course, if that is so, that is an important thing.

The chairman then asked Mr. Long some questions. Speaking of how much they were drawing, he said:

I am safe in saying 29 inches. We were drawing, before we unloaded, 36 inches; but we took off 20 tons and lightened up the boat to a minimum draft of 30 inches coming over several places.

The CHAIRMAN. How long did that continue?

Mr. LONG. There was an intermission of that condition, because we had three or four days rain. On the next trip we stayed 10 days at Hawkinsville, because we could not get over some rock. We complained of those conditions to the department, and the department has now removed those rocks.

Mr. KENNEDY. As a general proposition, was it not unwise to start in a 36-inch river with a 30-inch boat?

Mr. LONG. I am very glad to answer that question.

On page 18 of the hearings Mr. KENNEDY asked:

How much water will that draw?

Mr. LONG. Twenty-four inches with 100 tons. That is what Mr. De Four referred to when he said that we had something at Macon that was going to reflect to the benefit of the whole country.

Mr. KENNEDY. How much at full capacity?

Mr. LONG. Three hundred and forty tons on 48 inches.

Mr. TREADWAY. But you haven't got 48 inches.

Mr. LONG. We have sometimes. Probably from the 1st of October to the 1st of May of every year we could carry full tonnage.

* * * * * * *

The CHAIRMAN. Suppose we appropriate $40,000; would that give you all-year-around navigation for boats now being constructed for use on the river?

Mr. LONG. I rather think it would, Mr. Chairman; but $40,000 is not going to be sufficient, if we may judge by the past, to make any permanent improvement at all, and I do not believe it will be sufficient to keep the river clean, because we found that river in a horrible condition.

Mr. Long, speaking of this wonderful boat, says:

I think, to be perfectly candid about it, that our boat can run with the water that the $40,000 will provide, provided that will give us clean water; but it won't do it.

The CHAIRMAN. That is a very important proviso.

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir; it is; and we find it very important in running a boat up and down the river. If we can keep logs out of the river, we can run the boats; but the logs and the rocks in that river will cause accidents to happen. You know the propeller in that boat runs down underneath the boat.

Mr. SMALL. The wheels are about half submerged?

Mr. LONG. The propellers are all submerged. Say, for instance, that you are going around a bend. It is practically impossible for the stern to follow the bow. This part here [indicating] comes in contact with a side obstruction, and it is this that gives us trouble. We have no trouble navigating straight runs, because the bow is of sufficient strength, if it comes in contact with an obstruction, to force it out of the way; but because the stern can not follow the bow is the cause of practically all the trouble we have with these boats.

I do not know how they are going to operate that kind of a boat. This boat needs some kind of a surgical operation.

Now, just think of all the money appropriated by Congress for these rivers, and then think of having a witness come before the House committee and asking for more appropriations and telling them that that is a river where the stern of the boat will not follow the bow. Why, unless we get that river in shape so that the stern will follow the bow, how can we hope to use it for submarine destroyers or torpedo boats? How can there be any great naval contests on this mighty stream unless they bring the boats in on wheels?

Here is another gentleman who makes a suggestion as to this stream. Writing to a Member of Congress, on page 33, he says:

I am herewith submitting to you a specification of work that is absolutely necesary to take care of our boat business at this place. I am starting at the upper end of the river, near Balls Ferry, and will describe each obstruction to the mouth of the Oconee River:

First. Remove leaning trees at Toms Point. Stop up old suck with a jetty 100 feet long Second. Snag the river from this point to Parsons Shoals.

Third. Remove rocks on east side of river in the gap at this point.

Fourth. Snag from this point to Deep Creek; remove the rock on the point and clean out the gap at this point.

Fifth. Clean out the bight at Gum Spring; also, Dry Creek bight and the one bight below Gum Spring; and snag from this point to the boat yard.

Sixth. Clean out the gaps above the boat yard and one below; also, clean old Blackshears Ferry Gap.

Seventh. Remove rock at upper end of Car Shoals and clean out all the gaps in the shoals to Dublin.

Eighth. Clean out the river at Dublin.

Ninth. Complete the unfinished job of removing rock at Rattle Snake Shoals.

Tenth. Build a jetty at Buzzard Bar 400 feet long.

Eleventh. Extend the jutty at Fish Trap Cut and snag to Troup Spring Lake.

Twelfth. Take the rock out of the middle of the river at this point.

It does not take much to make a river out of this. If we have not enough money, let us issue bonds.

Mr. STERLING. I wish to ask the Senator if the main point is not to get water in the river?

Mr. KENYON. They are trusting in Providence for water.

Thirteenth. Snag from this point to just below Ann Smith Landing. Build a jetty 400 feet long at this point.

Fourteenth. Snag the river from this point to B. C. Bluff; fill up jetties at this point.

Fifteenth. Snag River from this point to Rassie Jack; then put a jetty across Old River.

Sixteenth. Build a jetty at Troups Ferry.

Seventeenth. Build a jetty at the bight just below Loose Bluff.

Eighteenth. Clean the snags to the bight just above Silver Bluff; build a jetty at this bight.

Nineteenth. Clean snags from this point to the mouth of Old River; stop up Old River with jetties; then snag to Stalings Bluff, and some snagging to be done between this point and Frying Pan.

Twentieth. Build a jetty across the suck at this point.

Twenty-first. Build a petty across Old River and snag to Bells Ferry; fill up the old jetties at this point.

Estimated cost of this work $50,000.

That is all there is to it to make a good river out of this river. Why does anybody hesitate? In the name of war preparedness it must be done. It is a farce of farces.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. KENYON. I do.

Mr. KING. I hope it will not be irreverent for me to state at this point that a man once said that hell would be a very desirable place in which to live if it had water and an abundance of good society. It would seem that we might have a river if they had a river bed and banks and water.

Mr. KENYON. Does the Senator mean this river or hell? [Laughter.]

Mr. KING. The river that is provided for in the river and harbor bill, of course.

Mr. KENYON. We have blown up Hell Gate in this bill, and we may get some relief for this place.

I really feel that I should not take up so much time, and I am going to lay aside the figures I intended to use in relation to some of these projects in Florida. I refer to only one or two of them grouped together on page 16—the Kissimmee, the Caloosahatchee, the Orange, and the Crystal.

Mr. FLETCHER. Before the Senator takes that up, if he will allow me to state, as to the Altamaha, the Oconee, and the Okmulgee, that some portions of some of the streams the Senator has been reading about are not applicable to the whole of the projects. The Altamaha River has a length of 137 miles, the Oconee of 145 miles, and the Okmulgee of 205 miles, making a total of navigable waterway in that group of 487 miles, for which this maintenance item is intended. There are some portions of the streams, of course, that are somewhat amenable to the criticism the Senator has suggested, but the navigable portions of these streams cover a length of 487 miles, and I submit that this maintenance item is not a very large item.

Mr. KENYON. It is not a large item. I agree with the Senator about that.

Orange River, Fla., is one of the group. I put this in the RECORD in reference to it:

Before improvement the river was obstructed by snags and overhanging trees and by nine shoals, consisting of sand and mud, with some bowlders and loose rock. The limiting depth over the shoals was 2½ feet. The usable width of the channel was about 30 feet. The head of navigation is the iron bridge at Buckingham, 5.7 miles above the mouth. The length of the navigable portion of the river is 5.7 miles. The range of tide is a little less than 1 foot.

The commerce in 1913 was 13,196 tons; in 1914, 4,100 tons; in 1915, 3,490 tons. The appropriations have been very small for that stream. I assume it is not really regarded as a stream on which very much commerce is carried.

Mr. FLETCHER. I will state, if the Senator will allow me, that it is not included in this bill. There is not any of the appropriation that will go to Orange River, according to the provisions of the bill.

Mr. KENYON. To just what ones of that group?

Mr. FLETCHER. The Kissimmee has $4,000 of the appropriation, as estimated; the Caloosahatchee, $4,000; and the Anclote $3,000, making a total of $11,000 for all those rivers.

Mr. KENYON. The Caloosahatchee has $4,000?

Mr. FLETCHER. It has $4,000; the Kissimmee, $4,000; and the Anclote, $3,000, making a total of $11,000 for the entire group mentioned in the bill.

Mr. KENYON. I will put in as to the Caloosahatchee the commerce. The commerce of this river seems to be quite considerable. In 1913 it was 112,500 and odd tons; in 1914, 79,107 tons; in 1915, 69,340 tons. We have appropriated for the Caloosahatchee $194,974.05. On page 2311, volume 2, the engineers state:

Effect of improvement on freight rates, none.

On page 2310:

A total of 1,938 snags and 1,451 overhanging trees were removed at a cost of $4,554.03.

I will ask the Senator if there is any appropriation for the Crystal River?

Mr. FLETCHER. No; there is no appropriation for the Crystal River.

Mr. KENYON. We have appropriated in the past $39,225 for Crystal River. The commerce in 1914 was 2,140 tons, according to the engineers.

Mr. FLETCHER. That improvement has all been completed, and I understand it is not provided for in this bill at all.

Mr. KENYON. There is $4,000 for the Withlacoochee.

Mr. FLETCHER. There is nothing for the Withlacoochee, nothing for the Suanee, nothing for Charlotte Harbor, nothing for Sarasota Bay, nothing for Clear Water Harbor, and Boca Ceiga Bay. They are mentioned in the group here in pursuance of the idea, as I said some time ago, that if something should happen, an accident or something of that kind, the engineers would have the right to remove an obstruction, but they are not estimated for at all.

Mr. KENYON. I merely place in the RECORD from page 2327 total of appropriations for the Withlacoochee River, $335,269.54. Commerce last year, 20,879 tons, of which 3,750 tons were logs.

I will pass that list for the present and put in the RECORD just a figure or two as to another group at the bottom of page 16.

Mr. FLETCHER. I did not quite understand the Senator. Did he give the figures with reference to the commerce on the Caloosahatchee?

Mr. KENYON. No; not the Caloosahatchee, the Withlacoochee.

Mr. FLETCHER. That has no appropriation in this bill.

Mr. KENYON. I understand. I put in the RECORD the commerce as to the Choctawhatchee in the group at the bottom of page 16. For 1913, 73,877 tons; for 1914, 25,440 tons; for 1915, 30,466 tons. We have appropriated for this river $298,202.12. Of the commerce cited for the last year, cypress logs and pine logs comprise 13,000 tons, which were rafted on the river, leaving a commerce of very diminutive proportions.

Mr. FLETCHER. Will the Senator allow me to suggest that perhaps the figures he has given do not correspond with those given in the report on pages 209 and 210? There is given the total amount expended on all projects from 1883 to June 30, 1916, $171,884.50; maintenance, $105,288.13. The estimate of maintenance for the next year is $6,000. The tonnage last year was 30,466 short tons, valued at $1,019,627, consisting principally of cotton, fertilizer, grain, logs, naval stores, crossties, and miscellaneous merchandise.

Mr. KENYON. What were the Senator's figures, thirty thousand and odd?

Mr. FLETCHER. Thirty thousand four hundred and sixty-six short tons, valued at $1,019,627.

Mr. KENYON. That is correct; and of that, 13,850 tons are logs rafted on the river.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not know where the Senator gets those figures.

Mr. KENYON. If the Senator will turn to page 2353 of volume 2 of the engineers' reports for 1916 he will find them.

Mr. FLETCHER. I see in the report a statement, under the head of commercial statistics, just as I quoted. It gives the tonnage and the value, and then says it consisted principally of cotton, fertilizer, grain, logs, naval stores, crossties, and miscellaneous merchandise.

Mr. KENYON. I can not believe that our figures are not in accord, because I am reading from volume 2 of the Engineer's Report for 1916, at page 2353.

In this grouping I now refer to the Escambia and Conecuh Rivers. We have appropriated $203,500 for those rivers. The freight traffic for the last year was 85,000 tons, an increase of 14,000 tons over the year before; but I will say that all that commerce is lumber barged on the river. In the engineers' notes they say—

There is no upstream freight on this river.

There is an expenditure of over $200,000 and merely some barging of logs on the river.

The item of Mobile Harbor and bar I am not going to stop at this time to discuss. I trust we shall have some explanation of the amendment which is included as to pilotage and terminal facilities.

The Alabama River is rather an interesting stream for which we have appropriated $1,389,328.85. Commerce last year—upstream, 22,000 tons; downstream, 54,000 tons, of which 12,000 tons was rafted, leaving of commerce as it is usually estimated about 64,000 tons. We have spent on this river nearly a million and a half dollars.

The Tombigbee I will not stop to refer to, although it is a very questionable proposition, in my judgment.

Mr. RANSDELL. May I ask the Senator if that expenditure has not been made on the river since the beginning of the Government, or was it all spent last year, when 64,000 tons of commerce were carried?

Mr. KENYON. The Senator asks if the million dollars was all spent last year?

Mr. RANSDELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. KENYON. That is a very intelligent question, of course.

Mr. RANSDELL. I think it is warranted by the Senator's statement. I have a very intelligent Senator sitting on my left who asked me if it could be possible that all that money was spent on that river with only that very small commerce. If the Senator had been fair, as I have asked him several times to be, and had stated that that expenditure was made since the Government began to make improvements on this river, and that he was giving the commerce for only one year and not the commerce on the river since we began to make the improvement, the friend on my left would not have asked that question.

Mr. KENYON. I regret very much that the Senator's friend on his left was misled at all by that statement.

Mr. RANSDELL. Anyone is bound to be misled, I will say to the Senator, and anyone who reads his speech will be misled by that statement. The Senator baldly says we spent a million and some two or three hundred thousand dollars on the river and that we have a commerce of 84,000 tons. It is not a fair way of stating it, I submit again to my friend from Iowa.

Mr. KENYON. Of course, the Senator has a habit of stating a matter of that kind in that way and closing discussion. I should think it would have been a very easy matter if the Senator from Louisiana had whispered to the Senator from Arizona, if he did not want to disturb the orderly proceeding here, and told him that the appropriation ran over a considerable term of years and was not just for one year.

Mr. RANSDELL. It would have been much fairer for the Senator from Iowa to have made that statement. He made a misleading statement. I did not make a misleading one.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator from Iowa made a misleading statement?

Mr. RANSDELL. I say the Senator from Iowa made a statement which caused my friend from Arizona to misunderstand him, and it is therefore the duty of the Senator from Iowa to correct that misleading statement.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I had just come into the Chamber, if the Senator will permit me, and I heard the Senator state the amount of money that had been expended and the amount of freight carried. I did not investigate and knew nothing about it, and I merely asked my friend from Louisiana if it were possible that that great expenditure had been made to accomplish so small an amount of commerce on the river.

Mr. KENYON. I am very sorry about this unfortunate incident.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I had heard nothing the Senator from Iowa had previously said.

Mr. KENYON. I am sorry the Senator from Arizona had been so misled. I wish he would stay in the Chamber a minute that I may explain it to him.

Mr. RANSDELL. If I may be permitted at this time——

Mr. KENYON. I want to straighten this out so that the Senator from Arizona will not be laboring under a misapprehension.

Mr. RANSDELL. All right; I thank the Senator very much.

Mr. KENYON. I wish the Senator from Arizona would read, on page 2366 of volume 2. He will find that this project was commenced March 3, 1905. That was the first appropriation, and it is termed——

Mr. RANSDELL. Does the Senator mean that the first appropriation on the Alabama was made March 3, 1905.

Mr. KENYON. I am reading on page 2366.

Mr. RANSDELL. May I get it?

Mr. KENYON. I am well pleased to have the Senator look at it.

Mr. RANSDELL. The river had been improved for a great many years before 1905.

Mr. KENYON. There was a previous project set forth in House Document No. 1491. The Senator is correct. That was $419,000.

Mr. RANSDELL. That is a very small item, $419,000.

Mr. KENYON. I know. Twenty-seven million dollars is a small item according to the Senator yesterday, and, of course, it is too trivial for discussion.

Mr. RANSDELL. For the whole Nation of 100,000,000 people $27,000,000 is a small amount; all the appropriations for this year aggregate $11,000,000,000, according to the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], and the $27,000,000 carried in this bill for rivers and harbors is only one-fourth of 1 per cent of the total. That seems to be a rather small amount for all this work.

Mr. KENYON. Of course, if we increase our appropriations to $100,000,000,000, this will only be about one-sixtieth of 1 per cent.

Mr. RANSDELL. We are not going to increase our appropriations to $100,000,000. We have never done so.

Mr. KENYON. I said $100,000,000,000. We do not talk of millions.

Mr. RANSDELL. I understood the Senator to say $100,000,000.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator is out of order in talking about millions.

Mr. RANSDELL. I can not imagine that we would have to appropriate $100,000,000,000. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] spoke yesterday about spending $11,000,000,000, and to-day I see he has put it up several billion. By to-morrow it may be four or five billion more, and before we get through it may be $100,000,000,000.

Mr. KENYON. I would not be surprised if we improve all the creeks and streams of the country.

Mr. RANSDELL. The creeks and streams are getting, according to the $27,000,000 basis, one-quarter of 1 per cent. Let me say to the Senator right here that very little of that goes into the creeks. Most of it goes into the big harbors and big rivers. Most of it goes to projects which the War Department says are a very essential part of our national defense. There are some small appropriations here for small streams, but the great majority of the appropriations go into big harbors like Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Norfolk, Charleston, Mobile, and New Orleans and other big harbors of that kind. Some of it goes to improve great streams like the Ohio River and the Mississippi River.

Mr. BORAH. I wish to ask the Senator from Louisiana a question.

Mr. RANSDELL. I will yield, with the permission of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. KENYON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator from Louisiana dispute the figures which the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] put in the RECORD?

Mr. RANSDELL. I am not on the Finance Committee, and I have had no chance to examine them. I assume that they are correct, and that before we close this session we may have expended $11,000,000,000. I do not know; I neither dispute nor admit their correctness. I am in a position of not knowing. I merely stated that if he was correct, and if the expenditures amounted to $11,000,000,000, the amount we are asking to have expended for rivers and harbors would be about one-quarter of 1 per cent of that sum. That was the effect of my statement.

Mr. BORAH. It is not a question, it seems to me, as to the percentage we are putting into rivers and harbors but whether or not it is necessary to put anything at all in them at this time.

Mr. RANSDELL. I think it is wise and necessary. Not only do I think so but a great many others do. The Secretary of War strongly advocates the appropriations that are being made now. The President of the United States is decidedly in favor of this bill, so I am informed. It is strongly urged by the Chief of Engineers. I know there are a number of Senators who desire other improvements, and expensive ones, but they were not put in this bill. The bill is held strictly according to the recommendations of the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War, and the vast percentage of it is for measures which are so closely connected with the national defense that you can not separate them from it. Most of them, I will say, are either emergency appropriations connected with war, or small sums for maintenance of existing projects, or for the continuation of great projects like the Ohio River, for instance, and the mouth of the Mississippi River.

The bill carries $1,825,000 to maintain and enlarge the channel at the mouth of the Mississippi. A very large commerce, important to the whole Nation, flows through the Mississippi. That is an old project; it has been going on for some time; and the national defense requires that that river be kept open and that great commerce be permitted to move through it to the Gulf.

The national defense requires that the Delaware River be kept open and the expenditure for its improvement in this bill of something over a million dollars to carry big ships up to Philadelphia is a part now of the national defense. The appropriations in this bill for the harbor of New York, especially for East River and Hell Gate, are absolutely essential, and a great many items in this bill are essential.

The criticisms against the bill so far have been directed to insignificant things, to comparatively small creeks and streams, where there is not a very large commerce. The Senator from Iowa devoted considerable time this morning to criticizing Contentnea Creek. When he analyzed it, it was shown that it carried over 9,000 tons of commerce, valued at $146,000. It is getting in this bill the colossal appropriation of $1,000.

Now, I want to ask the Senator from Idaho, in view of the very great car shortage which exists in the country at this time, and in view of the fact that Mr. Daniel Willard, chairman of the committee of the Council of National Defense, has said that the railroads can not carry the freight, that they are way behind, that they have an enormous volume which it is impossible for them to move—does the Senator think it would be wise to neglect even a little creek like Contentnea, which in its humble way has been carrying a load of 9,000 tons and upward, 9,000 tons being more than nine trainloads, for which we are appropriating $1,000? Does the Senator think we ought to abandon Contentnea Creek, to let the mud fill it up and prevent the movement of boats, so that the 9,000 tons can not be carried? Would that be wise in this emergency?

Mr. BORAH. I understood the Senator to say that he was informed the President had indorsed this bill, or was anxious to see it passed, and the Secretary of War had approved it. I take it that that was stated for the purpose of accentuating the fact that it is a war measure. Would the Senator be willing to accept an amendment to the bill to the effect that the President shall be permitted to withhold any of these expenditures except those which he regards as necessary for the war?

Mr. RANSDELL. Will the Senator please state that again?

Mr. BORAH. Would the Senator be willing to accept an amendment to the bill to the effect that no amount should be expended under the bill except those amounts which the President thought were necessary for carrying on the war?

Mr. RANSDELL. I do not know that any such amendment as that is necessary. We are loading the President down all the time. The bill was worked out under the advice of the Chief of Engineers, acting under the authority conferred upon him by the War Department. It seems to me it would be ridiculous to adopt any such amendment as that.

I say this to the Senator: If there is anything wrong in this bill and the Secretary of War or the Chief of Engineers will point out to us that it is wrong, I for one will be glad to let it go out; but it would be very unusual legislation to submit the items in a measure of this kind to the President. I do not know that it has ever been done before, and I do not know why it should be done now.

Mr. KENYON. I wish to say to the Senator from Idaho along that line that there is a proviso in the bill on page 41——

Mr. RANSDELL. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. KENYON. Let me read the proviso in the bill as it came from the House:

Provided, That no examination or survey herein provided—

The Senator from Idaho realizes that these surveys are in the nature of consolation prizes—for shall be made until after the close of the war with Germany except such as the Secretary of War shall direct.

The committee struck out the words "recommend as associated with the prosecution of the war" and inserted the word "direct," showing clearly that the committee does not regard the bill entirely as a war measure.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I will say that the Senate committee had the idea that if those measures were not connected with the national defense the Secretary of War would not permit the surveys to be made. Let me add that I heartily approve of the idea, and if it is not conveyed in regard to the surveys, I should be glad, so far as I am concerned, speaking as one member of the committee, to have the language made more specific; but that relates to future surveys, to the bringing into existence of something which has no existence at the present time. The main items of this bill, however, are on completed surveys, the adoption of new projects to carry on things that have been thoroughly worked out in every way; to maintain existing projects; to carry on and maintain the great harbors along the lakes, the two oceans, and the Gulf, which are so necessary for the commerce of this country; and to some extent to continue the work on great projects like the Ohio, the Missouri, and the upper Mississippi Rivers—unfinished work that has been going on for a long time.

Senators, let me remind you that as to the Ohio River this Government undertook to improve that stream in 1876.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I am willing for a reasonable time to yield, but I assure the chairman of the committee that I want to get through.

Mr. RANSDELL. Will the Senator yield for just two or three minutes for me to finish this statement in reply to something that was said by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]? I will not press the matter, however, if he does not wish.

Mr. KENYON. Go ahead; it is very interesting, though I have heard it a number of times.

Mr. RANSDELL. I was going to say that I am trying to explain the matter. Since 1876 we have spent considerable money trying to improve the Ohio River, and we have not half finished the work. We have much work going on there now, and we are trying to finish it. There is a considerable portion of the work finished at the upper end. If the Senator will permit me to read a very interesting letter from the engineer in charge there, I think he would enjoy it. I will show the Senator something about what actually has been accomplished by the work on the upper end of the river.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator from Louisiana that I do not want to take up the time of the Senator from Iowa, but what I should like to know is this, as it will have much to do with my attitude in regard to this bill: Will the Senators in charge of the bill and those who are advocating it here be willing to accept such amendments to the bill as will truly make it a war measure? Will they put into the bill that discretion in the President which we have put into all other measures which have passed here, permitting the President to exercise his judgment as to expenditures upon the basis of the necessity for carrying on the war? If Senators will reduce this bill to that basis and will incorporate such amendments in the bill as to provide for that principle, so far as I am concerned I shall be willing to leave the discretion there.

Mr. RANSDELL. I should like to say to the Senator from Idaho that we have a considerable amount of commerce carried on a number of the smaller streams of this country, and I do not know whether or not the Senator would say that the maintenance of those streams is a war measure. I do not know whether the Senator would say the maintenance of the great railroad systems of this country is a war measure. If he will admit that to maintain the transportation systems of the United States over the railroads, over the highways, and over the waterways is a war measure, then I will say that I am perfectly willing, so far as I am concerned, to have such an amendment put into the bill.

I conceive, sir, that it is a war measure to maintain our transportation facilities to the very highest degree. I believe it essential in order properly to conduct this war to have first-class transportation by road, by rail, and by river; and if you will make that limitation I will agree with you.

Mr. BORAH. Of course, that is a generalization with which I agree in a large measure; but what I asked the Senator was this: Will he for the purposes of the appropriations in this bill reduce his faith to practical effect by putting into the bill such amendments as will make it a war measure?

Mr. RANSDELL. I can say, if it be done with the limitation that "war measures" mean keeping up our transportation facilities, yes.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] is rather asking, I think, a superfluous question, because the bill itself shows that when it came to the point as to surveys, the committee inserted the word "direct." I will say that I will join the Senator from Idaho, if it shall be left to the President of the United States to say what shall be a war measure, and that he shall be given the right to stop any of these appropriations that are not strictly for war purposes, and I will end all my opposition to this bill. I am willing to trust the President of the United States on that proposition. If the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] or the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] will say here that the President of the United States and the Secretary of War believe that this bill is a war measure and should be passed now, so far as I am concerned, we can vote on the bill this afternoon.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, that is my understanding of it. The Secretary of War and the President of the United States were conferred with before this bill was taken up, and it was presented with their approval.

Mr. BORAH. Who conferred with the President of the United States upon the subject?

Mr. RANSDELL. The chairman of the Committee on Commerce of the Senate of the United States, the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors of the House of Representatives, and myself.

Mr. BORAH. Then, the Senator being present, does the Senator convey to the Senate the information that the President regards this bill as it is now framed as a war measure?

Mr. RANSDELL. That is the understanding that I had, sir, that it was a necessary piece of legislation; that many phases of it were absolutely war emergency measures, connected with the Navy and the Army, with the proper movement of freight and the proper movement of our troops, and that certain features of it were so essential to the proper movement of commerce that it was just as necessary a piece of legislation, with the limitations placed upon it, as anything that is being passed at this session of Congress.

I say to the Senator that a number of us wanted to pass a rather liberal river and harbor bill, carrying appropriations for a number of new projects. The Senator will recall that we had a bill here at the last session, which was presented to the Senate some time, I think, in February, which carried appropriations for nearly 90 new projects. This bill carries only 34 new projects. Almost all such projects were stricken from the bill. A number of Senators were greatly disappointed because they could not get appropriations for their projects, but they did not come within the understanding which we had in preparing the bill, which was to include emergency war measures in the way of new projects, the prosecution of existing projects which are necessary to carry on the commerce of the country, and the maintenance of waterways which now move a very considerable portion of the commerce of the country.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. KENYON. How long does the Senator want to speak?

Mr. JONES of Washington. For about half a minute.

Mr. KENYON. Very well.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] has stated that the President considers the items of this bill as very important, and his understanding is that he considers the items are necessary from the war standpoint. I have understood from Senators in the consideration of this bill that the President thought so little of items in the bill that he would veto it unless the provision for a commission was contained in the bill.

Mr. KENYON. That has been the newspaper talk.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, if the Senator from Iowa will allow me at this point—I take it that is entirely newspaper talk, as the Senator has suggested—I desire to state that the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors of the House of Representatives made a statement at the time of presenting the bill, which is in line with what the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] has stated, and which I think will satisfy the Senator from Idaho as to the character of the bill. The chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors of the House of Representatives stated:

> I do not hesitate to say that at the beginning of this session it was my opinion that we should pass a river and harbor bill similar to the bill which passed at the last session of Congress, subject only to such modifications as might have been made necessary by the lapse of time or by war emergencies. But it seemed to be the opinion of the House upon both sides that this bill should be confined to such items as could be considered emergencies, so that the River and Harbor Committee at its first meeting, after full discussion, directed the chairman to confer with the Secretary of War and ask him to make specific recommendations within those limitations. And it is not improper to state that the Secretary called upon the Chief of Engineers and directed him to make specific recommendations covering, first, the necessary maintenance items; second, such items for the further improvement of projects as have been heretofore adopted where great loss would ensue if there was a lapse of a river and harbor bill, or were connected with national defense; and, third, such new projects as might be necessary as war emergencies or connected directly or indirectly with the successful prosecution of the war.

This is the bill that was prepared under those limitations.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I am not at all questioning the statement of the Senators. I do not think they make it very clear, but if a letter shall be presented here from the President of the United States that he regards this bill as a war measure, and that its prompt passage is necessary, so far as I am concerned, the bill can pass. It will, of course, pass any way; the delay does not make any difference. These bills are so nicely arranged that they are sure to pass.

I want to go back to the Pearl River below Rockport, Miss. The snagging operations on that river were pretty general in the year 1915.

Mr. RANSDELL. I can not hear the Senator from Iowa. Will he kindly tell me what item he is now reading?

Mr. KENYON. I am reading as to Pearl River, on page 406, volume 2 of the Engineers Report.

Mr. RANSDELL. It is found on page 18 of the bill.

Mr. KENYON. Yes; at the top of page 18 of the bill.

Mr. RANSDELL. I thank the Senator.

Mr. KENYON. The report of the Board of Engineers states:

SNAGGING OPERATIONS.

Overhanging trees felled and cut up	4,248
Overhanging trees felled and pulled back	1,945
Overhanging trees trimmed	22
Logs cut up or stumps leveled on bank	592
Logs removed from drift piles	73
Stumps removed from river	100
Snags removed from river	1,740
Logs removed from river	210
Total	8,930
Total distance worked over ——miles	158
Cost of snagging	$13,596.11
Cost of repairs to snag boat	234.56
Total amount of expenditures	13,830.67
Cost of removal per obstruction, exclusive of repairs to snag boat	1,523

The project has been about 43 per cent completed. A maximum channel 2.1 feet deep and 50 feet wide at mean low water now exists from the mouth to Leightons Bluff, a distance of 104 miles, and thence to Columbia, 51 miles; the controlling low-water depth is 1.2 feet.

The appropriations for this stream have amounted to $346,461.39, commencing June 14, 1880. The tonnage last year, all of which seems to have been logs and lumber, amounted to 30,000. To the grouping on page 20, lines 14 to 22, I call attention briefly. I refer now especially to the Red River.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to say in passing that there is no appropriation made in this bill for the Pearl River?

Mr. KENYON. Well, the Pearl River is grouped with the other rivers, and I have no way of knowing just what appropriations are carried. That is one of the great advantages of this system.

Mr. RANSDELL. I will say to the Senator that if he will read the Report of the Chief of Engineers of the Army, on page 843, he will see that they make no recommendations for appropriations for Pearl River to be carried in this bill. That is where we get that information.

Mr. KENYON. Now, answer me this question. We have had this matter up here a number of times, and one question will settle it.

Mr. RANSDELL. I will be glad to do so, if I can.

Mr. KENYON. Can the Chief of Engineers, or can he not, use any part of the fund appropriated for those five rivers and one harbor for any one of those streams if he thinks it is necessary?

Mr. RANSDELL. My understanding is, as the Senator from Florida has stated several times, that those proposed appropriations are based upon the engineers' report. In the particular grouping referred to there is an item of $5,000 for the Pascagoula and $5,000 for East Pearl River—not for Pearl River, but for East Pearl River, a very different stream.

Mr. KENYON. If section 2, on page 31, which I ask the Senator to examine, does not absolutely settle that question, I do not know how it can be settled.

Mr. RANSDELL. I was going to answer, if the Senator will permit me, and to tell him what I understand. My understanding is that the appropriations are made in the manner indicated; but if in the judgment of the engineer he thinks the money ought to be expended on some other one of these projects, he has the right to do so. That is my understanding, and that is the understanding the Senator from Florida has.

Mr. KENYON. Then we do not differ a particle.

Mr. RANSDELL. There is no difference at all; but the appropriations are made for the particular project, and it is not expected that the engineer will spend it anywhere else unless some emergency arises. Changed conditions might cause him to spend it somewhere else, and he has that authority, in my judgment.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. KENYON. Yes.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The engineer is not compelled to make an expenditure at all. Unless it is necessary to carry on the work to remove impediments in the stream which interfere with navigation, not a dollar of the money will be used. The matter is left entirely to the wisdom and honesty and efficiency of the nonpartisan engineer who is commissioned to do that work.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I place in the RECORD from volume 2, pages 2534 and 2535, some facts as to the Red River from Fulton, Ark., to the mouth of the Washita River, Okla., showing appropriations of $570,759.20; a commerce in 1915 of 812 short tons. On the Red River below Fulton the appropriations have amounted to $2,907,920.30. The appropriations prior to 1892 amounted to $1,553,877.50. I do not know how far back they extend. The commercial statistics for 1915 show that there was carried on the river 27,325 tons, of which timber rafted amounted to 7,350 tons, sand and gravel rafted 4,000 tons, leaving the commerce on the Red River of almost nothing, although there has been an enormous expenditure of money upon it.

Now, as to the Ouachita River——

Mr. RANSDELL. Will the Senator permit me to say that the appropriations for the Red River, to which he has referred, comprise all that have been made during the entire history of the improvement? To my positive knowledge, as I happen to have been born and reared on that stream, there was a very large commerce there in the early days, and for a great many years. Finally, railroads were built, and now two fine railroads run on either bank of that river, so that practically all the commerce has left the river. The large sums which the Senator says were spent on it doubtless were expended; but, among other things, they had to remove a big raft of logs in the river above the city of Shreveport. In the early days the commerce over that river extended all the way up into Texas. It was diverted above Shreveport and passed out through Cypress Bayou to Jefferson, Tex., and the commerce of all northeastern Texas passed over Red River. At that time considerable money was expended, but recently we have had only very moderate appropriations for it, and its commerce is small.

I will also say to the Senator that it has had a wonderful regulating effect on the freight rates. I know that last year, before the railroad commission of my State, the railroads asked permission to increase their rates to Red River points, in one instance 300 per cent. They asked to increase the rates because they said, "The boats have left the river; there is no longer any commerce on the Red River—no longer any water competition—and therefore we would like to increase our rates." But for a long time there was a big commerce on the river, while the great sum of which the Senator speaks was being spent.

Mr. KENYON. I am glad that it has accomplished some good along the line the Senator indicates.

Mr. RANSDELL. It has accomplished a very good purpose in the past.

Mr. KENYON. I hesitate to say anything about the Red River, and I pass it over very hurriedly, because I realize that it is distinguished as the birthplace of the Senator from Louisiana; but I observe in the hearings, in document No. 947, that the Senator from Louisiana, at the time of the unfavorable report, appeared before the board at Shreveport, I think it was, and stated to them, as appears on page 45 of that document:

> Gentlemen of the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, you have come here to examine one of the great rivers of the country, not only of our State, but of our Nation. The Red River is one of the longest rivers on the continent.

Then the Senator goes ahead to say, advising the board:

> If I thought the Congress of the United States was seriously inimical to the restoration of the improvement of the Red River, I would think long and well before I would go in opposition to the opinion of the United States Congress; but I tell you it is not the engineers; it is the act of one man, who practically took Congress by the throat and forced the legislation on us.

There is a firm impression in the country that if Congress could be taken by the throat oftener it might be better off. I assume that reference was to ex-Senator Burton.

So the Senator had sufficient interest in the Red River improvement—a commendable interest, of course—to appear before the board and with his powers of persuasion try to have them look at it in a different light. I am surprised they did not do so, because the Senator is always persuasive.

Mr. RANSDELL. That certainly is a striking testimonial to the high character of this Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors when the Senator from Louisiana could not persuade them to do something wrong, if it was wrong. If that is the impression the Senator would convey, I think it a great tribute to them.

Mr. KENYON. To me it is perfectly marvelous that the Senator did not convince them.

Mr. RANSDELL. I think it is very remarkable.

Mr. KENYON. I am sure there must have been enough tears shed over that river that, if properly diverted, they would have put more water in it.

Now, I pass to another project in which the Senator from Louisiana is particularly interested.

Mr. RANSDELL. What is that?

Mr. KENYON. That is the Ouachita. I think the Senator appeared before the board several times with reference to their report on that stream. The Ouachita, I am inclined to think even the Senator from Louisiana will agree, has been a most wasteful proposition. It has cost the Government millions of dollars. We have appropriated $4,231,623.65 for the Ouachita, for a system of locks and dams, and I notice this bill provides:

> The balance of appropriations heretofore made for the construction of Lock and Dam No. 7, Ouachita River, Ark. and La., is hereby made available, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, for the construction of Lock and Dam No. 5.

I have understood there is something over $300,000 which can be used in that way. I do not know whether or not the Senator from Louisiana can make that clear to us.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, will the Senator kindly quote the figures as to cost again? I think perhaps I misunderstood him.

Mr. KENYON. I said the appropriations have amounted to $4,231,623.65, as appears on page 2544 of volume 2.

Mr. RANSDELL. I think the Senator must be mistaken. I have before me volume 1 of the Report of the Chief of Engineers, and I read from page 1022——

Mr. KENYON. Has not the Senator volume 2 of the Report of the Chief of Engineers?

Mr. RANSDELL. I think I can find it.

Mr. KENYON. Will he not turn to page 2544? If I am wrong about the figures, I will be glad to be corrected.

Mr. RANSDELL. I was going to read from the same book at another place. The Senator, I think, has inadvertently stated the figures incorrectly. I know he has not done so intentionally.

Mr. KENYON. I certainly have not; and I do not think I stated the figures incorrectly.

Mr. RANSDELL. I think the Senator has given the figures as to what the locks will cost, not what they have cost. From where did the Senator read?

Mr. KENYON. I read from page 2544, giving the total appropriations, volume 2, at the top of the page.

Mr. RANSDELL. I was reading from this very book, and I see here the expenditures under the existing project to the end of the fiscal year have been $2,833,438.

Mr. KENYON. There may be a difference between the expenditures and the appropriations. The money may not have been all used.

Mr. RANSDELL. The Senator is probably correct. I will not say he is not. I was reading from the other book.

Mr. KENYON. I am correct if the engineers' figures are correct. I desire to put in the RECORD just a few facts about this river. The Senator from Louisiana is distinguished by having a snag boat used on that river named after him, as appears from page 2540, a very active snag boat, which in the last fiscal year pulled on this river 2,229 snags. There were also pulled and destroyed 1,113 stumps, 76 shore snags, and other good work was done, including the removal of people from overflowed districts. U. S. steam derrick boat No. 2 also pulled 963 snags on the raging Ouachita.

The commercial statistics, as given on page 2545, show that for the last fiscal year there were 97,451 tons, of which timber barged amounted to 36,000 tons; timber rafted, 30,000 tons; and sand and gravel rafted 8,775 tons, leaving a pretty poor showing of commerce after all the expenditures the Government has made.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me a brief statement?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. KENYON. I really am trying to get through, but I desire to be courteous to the Senator.

Mr. RANSDELL. I do not desire to make a speech. I simply want to say that we have expended a good deal of money on that river to create a lock-and-dam system. There are eight locks and dams. The smallest number starts at the lower end of the river. From the lower end of the river the Locks Nos. 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, and 9. No. 1 being stricken out. We have finished only one of those locks absolutely so that it can be used, and that is No. 4. Nos. 6 and 8 are practically finished, and Nos. 2 and 3 are partially completed. We hope to have them finished some time this year. Now, the Senator and other Senators know that a stream can not be used to advantage if there are locks and dams in it until all the locks and dams are completed. Lock No. 5 has not yet been located. Lock No. 7 has been authorized, but no money has been spent on it, and there is a provision in this bill to divert the appropriation from Lock No. 7 to Lock No. 5. Not a dollar has been spent on Lock No. 9. Until this system is completed, I insist it is not fair to say that we have no commerce on the river. This large expenditure is to provide a lock-and-dam system, and when it is completed there will probably be developed a good commerce on the river.

Mr. KENYON. Has Lock and Dam No. 7 been constructed?

Mr. RANSDELL. No, sir.

Mr. KENYON. The proposition is to turn the money that was appropriated for Lock No. 7 to Lock No. 5?

Mr. RANSDELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. KENYON. How much does that amount to, if the Senator can say?

Mr. RANSDELL. It is something over $300,000, as I recall. I do not remember exactly. I will try to give the figures to the Senator. The reason for the diversion is that Lock No. 6 is relatively complete, Lock No. 4 is completed, and if Lock No. 5 can be put in between we will have completed the river from the lower end up to the head of the mouth of Lock No. 6, when we get the intervening locks finished.

Mr. KENYON. Well, that will help, of course, in making the river.

Mr. RANSDELL. That will be a little help.

Mr. KENYON. Then, if we can get some water in it, it may get to be quite a river.

The Engineer's Report, on page 2547, along the line suggested by the Senator, says:

As the pools formed by the dams are not continuous, through traffic was not practicable. The vessels which passed through the locks were, in the general case, small fishing boats and similar craft, which carried no freight. Each pool was used by local sawmills for floating logs and to some extent by other navigation interests, but as these boats and rafts did not pass through the locks the commerce is not reported here, but has been included in the statement of freight traffic in the preceding report.

As to the Ouachita River above Camden to Arkadelphia, the report says:

There was no commerce reported for this portion of Ouachita River during the fiscal year.

Now, I want to call attention to the document concerning the reexamination of this river which we secured in the river and harbor contest some years ago. A reexamination was made of the river, and an unfavorable report given. Gen. Black says on page 2 of Document No. 979:

After due consideration of the above-mentioned reports, I concur in the views of the division engineer and the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, and therefore report that it is deemed advisable to discontinue the project for improvement of Ouachita River between Camden and Arkadelphia, and to modify the project for improvement below Camden to provide for the completion of Locks and Dams Nos. 2 and 3, and their operation when completed, and continuing the operation of Nos. 4, 6, and 8, together with such snagging as may be necessary to facilitate navigation up to Camden. An appropriation of $234,000 should be provided in one sum for completion of Lock and Dam No. 3.

As I understand it, this practically amounts to a recommendation of the Chief of the Army Engineers and the board against completing and undertaking more locks until they try out the locks that are there. I may be in error as to that, but that is my understanding.

The Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, speaking of the river from Camden to Arkadelphia, says:

No commerce has been reported on this section of the river for the past three years, and there is no evidence that any is in prospect.

* * * * * * *

The total expenditures under this project to June 30, 1915, were $2,715,057.99, and the unexpended balance $411,755.97.

Speaking of the commerce, the board says:

Of 70,619 tons in 1915, over 35,000 tons were timber products and 8,768 tons were sand and gravel. Local interests claim that commercial developments would justify the completion of the project. Moreover, it has been stated that the United States is under moral obligations to complete the work on account of private investments made under this expectation.

* * * * * * *

At the request of interested parties a hearing was given at the office of the board on March 7, 1916, at which Senator J. E. RANSDELL, Hon. W. S. GOODWIN, M. C.; Hon. R. J. WILSON, M. C.; and a delegation from the locality appeared in favor of the continuation of the lock-and-dam project.

But they seem to have been unable to persuade the board. The opinion of the board is given on page 5:

In the opinion of the board there is not sufficient commerce present and prospective to justify the expenditure of this amount. The board therefore concurs with the division engineer and reports that, in its opinion, it is advisable in the interests of general commerce and navigation to modify the existing projects for the improvement of the Ouachita River, Ark. and La., so as to provide only for the completion of Locks and Dams Nos. 2 and 3, and the operation of these when completed, and of Nos. 4, 6, and 8, together with such snagging as may be necessary to facilitate navigation up to Camden. The advisability of further lock-and-dam construction (Nos. 5, 7, and 9) should be investigated again after there has been an opportunity to note the results of the complete canalization below Monroe.

That is what I had in mind. So we have the report here, as I understand it, of the board of Army engineers against doing what this bill seeks to do as to No. 5; and it would be just as well at this time, apparently, to leave that $300,000 in the Treasury.

I want to call attention to just one more thing in this document.

A number of hearings were held. The energetic Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] seems to have been present at most of these hearings. The first one was at Monroe, and the Senator there gave a history of this project and insisted upon fair play. Ex-Senator Lorimer and Members of Congress also spoke. The Felthensal hearing, I see, was attended by the distinguished Senator now in the chair [Mr. ROBINSON]. It was held in a church at 1 p. m. on September 16, 1915. The report speaks in such highly complimentary terms of the argument of the distinguished Senator from Arkansas, who is now in the chair, that I will not embarrass him by reading it.

The Columbia hearing was held on the snag boat Ransdell. That boat seems to have been adapted to snagging and also to hearings.

In reply to the district officer's usual questions, it was stated that 7,000 head of hogs and cattle and about 10,000 bales of hay were shipped from Columbia annually.

Another hearing was held at Camden; and so it goes.

Then on pages 33 and 34 of that document is the address of the Senator from Louisiana at one of these hearings. It does not seem clear as to just where it was. He says, referring to the board:

You gentlemen are probably aware of the fact that the first estimate for this project was a fraction under $2,000,000, and now the estimated cost is considerably over $4,000,000, under the revisions which have been made from time to time. It has been one of the very difficult projects in the Union, one on which the engineers themselves have differed quite materially and have discovered that mistakes were made.

* * * * * * *

Where does this trouble come from? It is a matter of common knowledge that Congress was practically held by the throat and forced, in the dying hours of a session, to ask for this reinvestigation and examination of the Ouachita River and several other rivers in this country.

This holding Congress by the throat may become a popular pastime and expedite legislation.

You gentleman, perhaps, are not obliged to take special cognizance of that fact, but we are all human beings; we are all justified in looking at matters in a common sense, practical way, and you have had other projects before you, the result of that same reinvestigation ordered, as I repeat, in the closing hours of a session of Congress, without any consideration whatsoever, without a word of debate, simply to permit us to pass a law carrying some money for the great river and harbor projects in this country.

And the Senator says that this project at the other end has no more merit than it has at this end. That is true.

So we have here in this bill a project to turn over the building of one of these locks and dams, No. 5, without any recommendation from the Army engineers, and in fact against the recommendation of the Army engineers.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an explanation there?

Mr. KENYON. Certainly.

Mr. RANSDELL. The lock-and-dam project on the Ouachita River has been under way for some time. It was strongly recommended by the Army engineers. We proceeded to make appropriations for it. We adopted Locks 2, 3, 4, 6, 7, and 8 and made appropriations for all of them. There was a practical recommendation made later on, as said by the Senator from Iowa, that the stream be thoroughly improved up to the city of Monroe, which would mean Locks 2, 3, and 4, and that no further improvement be made above there until we had first tried out the river below that point. Congress had already expended a large amount of money in practically completing Locks 6 and 8. The appropriation had been made for Lock 7, but the money had not been expended, and both the House and the Senate Commerce Committees thought it wiser to carry on this work at least to the upper end of Lock No. 6, which was finished, and for that reason we made the diversion of this money from 7 to 5. The engineers had approved the project in every particular. They did in substance recommend that it would be preferable, in their judgment, to try it out from Monroe down.

I simply wished that explanation to go into the RECORD in conjunction with what the Senator has said.

Mr. KENYON. I am very glad to have it.

Mr. President, I pass from that to the Arkansas River—a river on which we have expended over $3,500,000. It is just as good a river as a lot of these other rivers. The commerce in 1913, excluding timber and sand, was almost nothing. When this project was resurveyed there were many hearings. I want to put in the RECORD, without taking the time to read it, the opinion of Col. Townsend on this river in connection with the other river projects.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, leave will be granted. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

2. Not only has the commerce of western rivers rapidly declined in recent years, as stated by the district officer, but the character of the boats carrying the traffic has radically changed. In 1900 the average sized boat that navigated the Arkansas River was one of 174 registered tons, while in 1913 it was only of 46 tons. In 1900 the larger vessels made trips from Little Rock and Pine Bluff to Memphis and Vicksburg, while in 1913 the average distance traveled was only 34 miles, indicating that the boat has entirely ceased competing with the railroad in carrying through traffic and is only used to collect the products of a farm distant from a railroad and transport them to the nearest rail connection. A similar condition is found on all the western rivers, with the exception of the transportation of coal on the Ohio River and a small movement of freight on the Missouri River between Kansas City and St. Louis. Such transportation has no effect on rail freight rates and can be most profitably carried by motor boats and barges of light draft.

3. Whatever may be the causes of this decline of river traffic, they are of general application to all the western rivers, and the density of traffic on the Arkansas River is so small that there is no probability that the improvement of its channel will counteract this general law, particularly since the radical improvement of the Mississippi River from St. Louis to New Orleans, which has existed for the past 10 years, has had no appreciable effect upon it.

4. Should a revival of river commerce occur, it will first be observed between large centers of population, such as Chicago, Pittsburgh, St. Louis, and New Orleans, where there are large amounts of manufactured articles to be moved. The agricultural products that are directly tributary to a river do not furnish a sufficient volume of freight to justify at present its permanent improvement as a route for through traffic, but a revival of commerce commencing at large centers of population along the trunk stream may gradually extend to the tributaries.

5. It is therefore recommended that the improvement of the Arkansas River be at present confined to snagging, which is warranted by the existing commerce, and that all attempts to permanently improve the river channel be deferred until there is an appreciable revival of commerce on the Mississippi River. The dredging proposed by the district officer is considered a waste of public funds. It can have no effect on the permanent improvement of the river. It is insufficient even to maintain a temporary channel from the river mouth to Pine Bluff. The transfer of the dredges built for the Arkansas River to the Ohio is suggested, where they would be of some practical use.

Mr. KENYON. Then, when this hearing was held at some point in Arkansas, the distinguished Senator from Arkansas, Mr. Clarke, who was then chairman of the Commerce Committee of the Senate, and who, to the sorrow of us all, was called away before his time—one of the most courageous and able men who ever occupied a seat in this Chamber or any other chamber—appeared before the board, and he said some things there that were prophetic. I knew him well enough, I think, to know how he felt about some of these appropriations. He said this, among other things, on page 82 of Document No. 461:

There are millions of dollars scattered over the United States not doing any good except to improve the political prospects of some party.

And those who knew Senator Clarke knew just how he could say that—

I have been aware that, whether from oversight or whatever it is, there comes up to our committee recommendations that seem to me to be discriminatory. Some things that are not half so worthy as other things are recommended where other things are not recommended. If it is the policy of this administration and of this board to adopt a more rational, businesslike system, I shall aid them in their efforts to do so, and if, after a fair test, the Arkansas River falls under the condemnation of any rule that has been adopted and will be uniformly applied, I will stand as religiously for that as any other; but when I am backed by such reports as the two I have called your attention to—and the policy was reasonable of digging out this stretch of 173 miles of river from here to the Mississippi River—I believe I am justified in showing some earnestness and protesting with some emphasis against the report made, and which is now under consideration by you.

Farther down on page 83 he says, referring to the bill:

The two boats are here; they are paid for; they are at work; $193,000 was set aside last year for their operation, and that was done by the engineers and not by Congress. The filibusters defeated the appropriations. The bill was passed by the committees, but it was impossible to get it out under the "pork-barrel" system. If the shaking up that that business has gotten in the last two years, or in the last two Congresses, will result in a more careful discrimination in these objects, I think a very substantial result has come from it.

I believe that a very substantial result has come from the fights which Senator Burton made against river and harbor bills, and that these appropriations are scanned more closely by committees and will be scanned more closely by committees and will be scanned more closely by the country.

Mr. President, I might tarry to speak of the St. Francis River. I will only refer to it in a word. That is one of the rivers where in the testimony before the House it appears in the hearings had here that the witnesses said you did not know when you got to the river. You would cross it before you knew it. That is one of the streams for which we are appropriating money.

The Cumberland River in Tennessee and Kentucky has cost this country millions of dollars.

The Tennessee River, on which one could dwell for some time, has cost the Government over $11,000,000, and there is a very small commerce on it when it is analyzed.

Mr. President, I have said to the chairman of the committee that so far as I was concerned I wanted to argue this bill, and intended not to spend as much time as this upon it. I am not trying, and I do not think anyone is trying, to delay the passage of this bill, because they realize that it is perfectly useless to try it. I am frank to say that I would stand on my feet and talk for a week if I felt that I could be at all instrumental in getting rid of some of the things in this bill that a good many Senators feel ought not to be here. It is one of those things that can not be done, however.

I believe that this bill is not as bad as many bills that have been passed by Congress, or that have been before the Congress for discussion, but it is bad enough. The grouping system, that seemed to me to warrant the statement on the first day that this was the worst river and harbor bill ever presented to Congress, is a system that is not entirely satisfactory. I am sorry it has been adopted; but I took occasion to say the next day, after listening to the remarks of the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], that that statement was perhaps too harsh an indictment. It would be a pretty hard thing to say of any river and harbor bill that it is the worst one that has ever been here. That would be almost impossible.

Section 4 of this bill provides for a number of surveys. That, it seems to me, is absolutely indefensible in this condition of our national finance. Here is $200,000 for surveys. The only argument that is produced to refute some of these statements, when they are made, is that the amount is so infinitesimal, and that is true; $200,000, the way we are appropriating money, is a small amount. These surveys are given to practically anybody in the bill. At least, it is my experience on the Commerce Committee that anybody who comes along and asks for a survey is given the survey. It makes him feel good, and he can tell the folks at home what a great statesman he is; he got a survey.

Look at some of them! Here is this same old Smiths Creek that we have been talking about. What in the world does that need any more surveying for? Here are Broad Creek and Queens Creek, Onslow County. Just as a matter of interest, I have looked through a book on North Carolina and its resources, issued by the State board of agriculture, and the streams and canals and rivers of Onslow County, in a search for Queens Creek. I have here the Rand-McNally maps. If anybody can find anything to show the location of Queens Creek in the history of North Carolina or the history of any of these counties, I shall be glad to see it.

Little River, N. C.: Lynch River, N. C.; Broad and Congaree Rivers, at or near Columbia, S. C.; Church and Bohicket Creeks, and Church Flats, S. C.; Ashley River, S. C.; Banana Creek, Fla. It has been stated here that the President wanted this bill as a war measure. I wonder if he thought that a survey of Banana Creek was necessary? What a farce! This bill ought to slip up on Banana Creek!

Braden River, Manatee County, Fla.: I have gone through a history of Manatee County, Fla., setting forth the wonderful resources and the rivers and the creeks of Manatee County, but nobody can find the Braden River in it. I wonder if the President thought that the improvement of that stream was essential to carry on the war? We have said to you that we would put it right straight to the President, and, if he said this was an essential war measure, that was the end of the fight. We trust your President better than some of you seem willing to trust him.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. KENYON. I do.

Mr. RANSDELL. I suggest to the Senator that the proviso on page 41 of the bill, after the close of these surveys, reads:

Provided, That no examination or survey herein provided for shall be made until after the close of the war with Germany except such as the Secretary of War shall direct.

Mr. KENYON. Yes; exactly. Why was not the proviso left exactly as the House sent it here, which then would have connected all of these surveys with the war? That was crossed out.

Mr. RANSDELL. Simply because we felt that it would be a very much better plan to leave it discretionary with the Secretary of War, because during the prosecution of the war something might come up in the shape of a very important matter connected with commerce, but not necessarily associated with the prosecution of the war; the idea, however, being that pending the war it should be entirely discretionary with the Secretary of War to say whether or not any of these surveys should be made.

Mr. KENYON. Well, then, let us be perfectly frank, and not say that the President asked for this bill as a war measure, when the Senator himself says that commerce is to be involved, unless of course you say that all commerce is a war measure.

Old River, Chambers County, Tex.—another survey. You can take the maps of Texas, and I defy anybody to find on these maps Old River. Perhaps that is why we need a survey.

Channel connecting the Houston Ship Channel with the Goose Creek oil field; Missouri River, between Yankton and Vermilion, S. Dak. So it goes on; I do not know how many surveys are provided for.

Mr. President, here are any number of Army engineers engaged in this work. Here are thousands of men engaged in this work. Here is a time when the country needs every Army engineer for war purposes. Here is a time when no men should be engaged in useless work. They are needed in the factories and in the fields, and the Army engineers are needed in the Army and not out attending to Banana Creek and a few things of that character.

Now, I want to speak of one thing that I referred to a moment ago. A bill that has merit in it, that is all merit, does not need any back fires to have it pass Congress. I have been deluged with letters from automobile dealers in my State, from people along the Mississippi River in my State—it flows the whole width of the State—automobile dealers, Ford car dealers, calling on farmers to write letters—I think I have a hundred of them here—insisting that I shall support the river and harbor bill in the interest of the farmers of my State.

How does that arise? It is a little intricate; a little labyrinthine. The Rouge River is in this bill. I imagine it may be a good project. I think it was put in here by the Army engineers at the time when the object was to get up to the Ford factory. The Ford factory in some way got out the impression through their dealers that if the Rouge River was improved up to the Ford factory, then they could make farmers' tractors cheaper. So we get the back fire from the farmers who think that this bill must pass, some who do not see the colored gentleman sitting in the woodpile.

Mr. BORAH. May I ask the Senator how much is the appropriation for Rouge River?

Mr. KENYON. I think it is four hundred and some thousand dollars. Under this grouping system it is hard to find what you are looking for.

Mr. RANSDELL. I will state to the Senator that he will find the item at page 23, line 15, and the amount is $490,000.

Mr. KENYON. I thank the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. Do I understand that that is one of the streams by which the Ford factory is reached?

Mr. KENYON. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. The Ford factory for making what?

Mr. KENYON. Automobiles, I suppose, and the Ford factory is going to make farm tractors—very splendid farm tractors—which the farmers are very anxious to get.

Mr. BORAH. Where is Rouge River with reference to the factory? Is the factory situated on the river?

Mr. KENYON. I understand so. I have the report here somewhere, but I merely used it to illustrate this back-fire proposition.

Mr. FLETCHER. I wish to state to the Senator not only that, but they undertake to remove certain bridges and acquire certain lands which will about equal in value the expenditure the Government makes.

Mr. KENYON. This is a sample of letters that are coming to me:

DEAR SIR: We note from the newspapers that the river and harbor bill is about to be brought up, which includes the deepening and widening of River Rouge, which would be very beneficial in the way of handling material for Henry Ford's tractors and factory.

While this would be a help to Henry Ford, it would also be a help to his dealers and customers.

I kindly ask you to favor me by doing what you can to urge the passage of this bill.

Some of these letters are in the nature of a peremptory demand; but not very many of them. That is simply the way these things are done. There has been placed in the RECORD heretofore the proceedings of dredgers' associations where money was voted to banquet Members of Congress, and I send to the desk and ask to have read what I suggested to the Senator from Louisiana. I will submit it to him first. If he did not write the letter, I do not want to have it read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection the Secretary will read the letter.

Mr. KENYON. I think there is nothing offensive in it to the Senator from Louisiana or I would not present it.

Mr. RANSDELL. Does the Senator send the letter to me?

Mr. KENYON. Yes. I think there is nothing offensive to the Senator in it.

Mr. RANSDELL. Does the Senator mean for me to read it, or for the Secretary to read it?

Mr. KENYON. I should like to have the Secretary read it if the Senator has no objection. I thought it might be courteous to the Senator to submit it to him.

Mr. RANSDELL. I am satisfied to have it go in the RECORD. I believe it is correct. I think I gave such an interview as that to the papers.

Mr. KENYON. I ask the Secretary to read the article.

The Secretary read as follows:

SAY GOOD BILL ON RIVERS MAY MEET DEFEAT—ACTION OF SENATOR KENYON IS BLOW TO DEVELOPMENT OF WATER FREIGHT.

The best rivers and harbors bill placed before Congress in many years is in serious danger of defeat according to information received by Secretary Norwood, of the greater Davenport committee, from Senator RANSDELL, of Louisiana.

"This constructive piece of waterway legislation," says Senator RANSDELL in his letter to Secretary Norwood, "eliminates a number of projects which have been sharply criticized and provides for beginning work on 90 new projects, every one of which is of undoubted merit and importance, and has received the unqualified approval of the Army engineers. Moreover, provision is made to prosecute and maintain every worthy waterway project in the land which is already under way.

"Notwithstanding the great merit of this measure, which carries an appropriation of about $39,000,000 for the next fiscal year, a minority report has been filed by Senators KENYON, JONES, SHERMAN, HARDING, and WATSON, which proposes to substitute a lump-sum appropriation of $25,000,000 to carry on existing projects, and also authorizes 11 new projects of more or less importance.

"If this substitution is adopted, it will be the hardest blow ever received by river and harbor legislation. I earnestly appeal to every friend of waterways to do his utmost to defeat this substitute and secure the adoption of the bill as reported by the majority of the Committee on Commerce."

Mr. KENYON. I will state that that is from a Davenport paper, in my State.

Mr. RANSDELL. Give the date of it, please.

The SECRETARY. February 20, 1917.

Mr. KENYON. That is merely a sample of what I have suggested as to a back-fire attack upon men who oppose this legislation.

Mr. RANSDELL. I will say to the Senator that was in regard to the bill which failed in the last Congress?

Mr. KENYON. Yes; but it is the same thing. It resulted, of course, in bringing a great deal of correspondence to me from along the Mississippi River, finding serious fault with my attitude. There are people, of course, in every State who expect their Members of Congress to get everything they can out of the Public Treasury. There are not many such people, I am thankful to say, in my State. If the people of my State felt that it was my business down here to try and get what I could out of the Public Treasury for the Mississippi River, or for any other river in Iowa; if they want that kind of a person here, I am ready to quit and go home. I will not do it. I do not care how many letters I get from my State. The Senator can send all the letters he wants to my State; he can come out and talk about it and make that an issue, if it is desired to be done. Along the same line is the work of one of the gentlemen on the advisory council of waterways of which Gen. Black was a member, Capt. J. S. Ellyson, who in a speech before the Rivers and Harbors Congress, I think it was—anyway some national waterway lobby—said what has never been denied and it has been put in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

We need Congressmen here to legislate for the Nation theoretically, but actually to get all he can for us; and if he does not get our share, and then some, we do our best to replace him.

This letter is evidently to carry out the same line of work. That is the conception of one of the gentlemen on the advisory council as to what Members of Congress are here for—to get what they can; to get our share. They think nothing about the Nation, but get our share, whether you get it at a time when the Nation is in peril trying to raise every dollar it can. The orders are get it or we will start a back fire on you. Go ahead and start it.

Mr. RANSDELL. Will the Senator kindly give the date of the publication he was reading from?

Mr. KENYON. I am reading from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD from a speech by Mr. FREAR, Saturday, June 16, 1917, in which he placed that statement in the RECORD, and it has never been denied. Does the Senator deny it?

Mr. RANSDELL. Where did Mr. FREAR get the statement? I do not know anything about it.

Mr. KENYON. It is taken from the lobby official 1911 report. The lobby he refers to is the Rivers and Harbors Congress, I think.

Mr. RANSDELL. I should like to make it clear where it came from. I do not know anything about it. I am not responsible for it at all.

Mr. KENYON. Let him deny it if he did not say it. It was in connection also with this that appeared in what we call the lobby official 1911 report—I will find out what that is before we get through with this debate—which they sent out. It is the National Rivers and Harbors Congress. They set out the amount subscribed to the support of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress by States from 1906 to 1911, inclusive, and then in parallel columns give the amount of appropriation received by the States in the river and harbor bill, showing apparently the intimate relation between the amount contributed by the State and the amount they get in appropriations. For instance, Pennsylvania, four thousand two hundred and some odd dollars. Amount of appropriation $4,637,741. Florida does not seem to have fared so well. Florida contributed $1,600 and received in appropriations $5,185,000.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. KENYON. I yield.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Will the Senator yield to me for a suggestion just in line with this particular phase of the discussion? I wish to say that last year, after the minority report was filed on the river and harbor bill, an effort was made in my State to create what the Senator terms a back fire. This was done through or by the secretary of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress. I hope and believe that the Senator from Louisiana, who is the president of that congress, had nothing to do with it and would not approve of any action of that sort, but nevertheless the secretary of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress did secure letters from my State and tried to enlist the newspapers to make a campaign against me because of my joining in the minority report on the river and harbor bill.

Mr. RANSDELL. I wish to say to the Senator that I knew nothing in the world about that. If I had known it, I would have done everything in my power to prevent it. In the interview referred to in the letter to the gentleman from Davenport, Iowa, I simply stated a matter of record in Congress, that a minority report had been filed signed by certain Senators, and calling the attention of this gentleman from Davenport, who was, I think, one of the directors of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress, to that fact, and urging him to do all he could with his friends to support the bill. But I had nothing on earth to do with any opposition to the Senator from Washington, and am quite sure that the secretary of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress did not do anything in opposition to him. I have always esteemed him highly. I regard him as one of the very best men in the Senate. I feel that I have been honored in having his friendship since we served in the House of Representatives together, and nothing would be further from me than to do such a contemptible thing as to try to stir up opposition to the Senator in a matter of that kind.

I have tried, and will continue to try, to mold public opinion in favor of this legislation, which I have advocated for many years. I did that in an open, honorable way, writing letters through the office of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress to the directors and officers of that association. If those directors and officers did in their own way try to defeat the Senator, it certainly was without my approval or without any suggestion from me or the secretary of the organization. I thank the Senator for saying that he did not think I had anything to do with it. I never heard of it before.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I tried to make it plain that I was satisfied the Senator did not have anything to do with it. I do not want to be misunderstood. There was not an attempt made to defeat me, because I was not up for reelection, but it was pressure being brought on me to support the river and harbor bill, notwithstanding the minority report. As I said, this was done through the secretary of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress.

I wish to repeat I am sure the Senator from Louisiana never thought of countenancing anything of the kind, and that he would not countenance it at all; but I did think it was but fair that I should call attention to this action upon the part of the secretary of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. KENYON. I yield.

Mr. KING. I have heard for a number of years about the activities of an organization the object of which, as I was informed, was to promote legislation for rivers and harbors. Is that the organization to which the Senator is now referring?

Mr. KENYON. That is what is known as the National Rivers and Harbors Congress, which carried, I understand, on its letterhead "Second only in importance to the Congress of the United States."

Mr. KING. Is that the organization over which Secretary Redfield presided at one of the meetings?

Mr. KENYON. The Senator from Louisiana can tell better.

Mr. RANSDELL. I have never known Secretary Redfield to preside at a meeting of that organization. He spoke at one of the meetings.

Mr. KING. Or spoke.

Mr. RANSDELL. He also spoke at a meeting of the Atlantic Coast Deep Waterways Association. I rather think he has spoken at meetings of the Ohio Waterways Association. I know they have had meetings of the Mississippi River Association, and they used to have big meetings of the Lake Carriers' Association. There are a great many waterways associations throughout the country, and Mr. Redfield may have spoken at a number of them. He spoke at one of the meetings of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress, of which I have the honor to be president.

Mr. KING. If the Senator from Iowa will permit me, I wish to make a further inquiry. Is not the object, or one of the chief objects, of the organization to coerce Congress into making appropriations for rivers and harbors?

Mr. RANSDELL. No, sir; that is not one of the objects of the organization. The objects of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress are, in every proper way by publicity, to overcome the remarkable ignorance which seems to possess the American people and many Senators in regard to waterway transportation and, having overcome that ignorance, to try to induce Congress to make proper and reasonable appropriations for every worthy watercourse in this land. Under no circumstances has the organization ever advocated the improvement of any particular project. It has advocated a broad, liberal, comprehensive policy looking to the proper improvement along the best and wisest lines of all the worthy watercourses in this Union in order that transportation may be facilitated and cheapened.

Mr. KING. But the object of the organization, if the Senator will pardon me for a moment, was to secure as great appropriations as possible from the Congress of the United States.

Mr. RANSDELL. Not at all; not as great as possible, but to secure appropriations enough to finish the worthy waterways of this Nation, the improvement of which had been advocated and approved by the Engineer Corps of the Army, and to do that along wise, proper, and businesslike lines.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Louisiana if the organization did not pass a resolution a few years ago that $50,000,000 was about the sum that should be asked at every session of Congress?

Mr. RANSDELL. I will say that we did advocate the expenditure of $50,000,000 a year until the waterways were improved. In line with that, let me say that one of the great waterway projects of this country is the Ohio River. In 1910 Congress undertook to finish the improvement of the Ohio River. It was to cost, I think, some $63,000,000 and to be finished within 12 years, at the rate of about $5,000,000 per year. This organization took the ground that Congress had not been pursuing a businesslike method toward the Ohio. It said in arguing it, "Here is a great river, the Ohio, the improvement of which Congress undertook in 1876 so as to get a minimum depth by canalization of 6 feet from Pittsburgh to Cairo, and from 1876 to 1910 less than 40 per cent of the project has been completed. We contend that is unbusinesslike. We say Congress should go ahead and finish these great projects when once undertaken, and we advocate the expenditure of at least $50,000,000 per annum until all the wise, really deserving water courses have been finished."

Mr. KING. If I may submit one observation to my friend just there, I know that the Democratic Party, of which I am an humble member, have frequently denounced the manufacturers of the United States who form organizations for the purpose of coming to Congress in order to obtain tariff legislation. I do not see very much difference between organizations of that character, which we have denounced so vehemently and so often, and other organizations, whether they denominated themselves organizations for rivers or harbors or not, the object of which in part is to come to Congress and try to secure money out of the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, just a word. I hope the Senator from Iowa will yield.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. RANSDELL. The organization of which I have the honor to be president is attacked.

Mr. KENYON. I do not want to yield any time for the Senator to go into a defense of that organization.

Mr. RANSDELL. It will take only a very few minutes, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. KENYON. It will take a good while.

Mr. RANSDELL. I will say to the Senator from Utah there is a vast difference between the organizations to which he refers and a great public organization like the National Rivers and Harbors Congress, composed of people from every State in the Union where there are any waterways worthy of improvement, the officers and members of commercial bodies, boards of trade, and many waterway associations. This organization has offices in this city, carries on openly and aboveboard a campaign of publicity and education through the press and otherwise, tries to convey information to the American people, and does not do any lobbying. You have never heard of anybody connected with the Rivers and Harbors Congress doing any lobbying. If the manufacturers' associations which were denounced for coming to Congress had used the press of the country, had held conventions, and tried to convey their ideas to the American people through the agency of the press, no man could have legitimately objected to that; and that is all the National Rivers and Harbors Congress has done. It has held its conventions in the city of Washington in the month of December every year since the first was held in 1906, open, public conventions, with prominent speakers from all over the Nation. A number of leading railroad men have been invited to speak before it; many Senators and governors of States have addressed its meetings. Quite a number of Members of Congress and two Presidents of the United States have appeared before this organization. It is not in any sense an illegitimate lobby. I am sorry that the Senator from Utah can not see the distinction between an illegitimate lobby such as he has referred to and a great national organization trying to promote the objects for which it stands in an open, honorable, high-toned way.

I thank the Senator from Iowa for yielding.

Mr. KENYON. The action of the secretary of that organization in building up a back fire has been shown by the Senator from Washington in his State. It is hardly a very honorable occupation. The Senator from Utah, however, ought to bear this in mind: This organization in a way is to relieve the duties of Congress by taking over all these questions of rivers and harbors. The whole thing is a part of this general booster proposition which goes on all over the country.

From the Engineer's Report I read as to Crystal River on this booster proposition where the board of trade of one of the towns there said:

> Our people are alive to their interests, and mean to forge onward. They mean to have deep water. If 100 by 6 feet will not answer the purpose, they propose to have sufficient dimensions.
> You will recall that Capt. Spalding, on his visit here with you, without reserve favored the project. We feel that when Capt. Slattery goes over the route with you, as he indicates his willingness to do, he will also favor the scheme. We will at least try to not let him regret having come among us.

This is a letter to a Member of Congress. Now, listen to it:

> Kind Providence has endowed us with almost inexhaustible beds of phospate, timber, valuable hard rock, sea food, fertile lands, beautiful waters, and landscape scenery—every natural advantage except a sufficient channel. We can not get on the pension list nor profit by the public buildings appropriation.

The booster meetings Senator Burton has described, where at 9 o'clock at night they were in favor of a 10-foot channel, at 10 o'clock at night they were in favor of a 20-foot channel, at 11 o'clock they were for a 30-foot channel, and by midnight anything they could get, even to 50 feet deep, held not always in dry communities. It is a constant boosting that goes on for these things and back fires created for the men who dare to oppose them.

Mr. RANSDELL. Will the Senator permit me to say that Senator Burton was an enthusiastic advocate of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress, was present at its birth on the Ohio River, and addressed every one of its conventions for several years?

Mr. KENYON. I understand that; he was present at the birth, of course; and from what I have heard him say in recent years I am sure he was rather sorry that the birth was so successful.

Take Public Document No. 1469, on Freeport, Tex., another booster proposition. The commercial clubs all over that part of the country passed resolutions so much alike that it is quite apparent they were prepared by the same people, sending out three or four pages, and the resolution with reference to Congress is exactly the same.

As to the back-fire campaign of the Rivers and Harbors Congress, as far as I am concerned, I do not care the snap of my finger about it. If the price of staying in the Senate and holding a seat is to vote for these river and harbor bills—if my people are going to insist on that—I will leave the Senate. They are not all that way; very few of them, I think, are that way. I ask to have read an editorial from the Sioux City Tribune, a fearless paper of my State, of September 14, 1914, in reference to the same kind of business that was going on then.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

[From the Sioux City Tribune.]

> The Tribune acknowledges the receipt of an urgent appeal from the lobby that is working for the passage of the river and harbor bill, with its millions of "pork." The letter announces that unless "pressure of public opinion" is exerted at once the "pork barrel" is doomed to defeat this session.
> The letter states this would work untold hardships upon contractors, upon supply companies that furnish steel, iron, lumber, cement, wood, and other material used in improving rivers and harbors. Worse than all, states the letter, is the paralysis of water transportation lines which will not be able to operate because the channels are not completed.
> As an especial inducement to the Tribune the letter contains a supplement which shows the share of "pork" which is apportioned to the upper reaches of the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers aggregates $13,420,000.
> It certainly would be disastrous if the river traffic on the Missouri River from its mouth to Fort Benton is paralyzed. The Tribune realizes the consternation, approaching panic, that will sieze the shippers of this vicinity when they learn they can no longer send their products by river boats or get their supplies via the same route, because Congress has adjourned without voting $13,000,000 to a lot of contractors and supply men to "improve" the Missouri River Channel from its mouth to Fort Benton.
> But at a time when a world-wide war is making such demands upon the world's supply of wealth that this great country has had to issue emergency currency, underwrite bonded warehouse receipts, prepare to pass a special revenue bill that will create special taxes of at least $100,000,000 with which to run the Government, when good securities are selling far below par, and strong corporations are passing dividends in order to conserve their finances—at such a time the Tribune believes it is a good thing to save the $13,000,000 that would go into "improving" the Missouri channel and the other $40,000,000 of equally unnecessary "pork" that is in the river and harbor bill.
> The farmers and shippers of this section will try to worry along another year without the competition that would be afforded by the water transportation lines that would ply the "improved" Missouri after the contractors spent the $13,000,000.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I have tried to review in a hasty way the provisions of this bill. I think I owe the chairman of the committee an apology for taking so much time, but I have been interrupted until at least nearly half of my time, I think, this afternoon has been taken up by interruptions. I conclude with this statement: The balance on hand for these purposes July 1 amounts to $19,838,000. There is another million dollars, as I showed from the record, which was set aside some years ago, which is available, making $20,838,000. I do not want to see any of the meritorious projects suffer. I have offered a substitute providing for a lump sum of $10,000,000, to be used just as the Secretary of War, under the direction of the President, may feel is necessary. That would make, as I understand it, $30,838,000 to be used for rivers and harbors for the next year. If that is correct——

Mr. FLETCHER. May I interrupt the Senator for just a moment?

Mr. KENYON. Yes.

Mr. FLETCHER. I desire to say that the balance on hand July 1, 1917, aggregating $19,838,472.33, to which the Senator has referred, is a balance that is not available for the purposes of this bill at all. None of that money could be used for the projects mentioned and provided for in the bill. A good portion of that money represents appropriations to be made for projects which are pending, awaiting certain precedent conditions to be performed by the localities; a good portion of it is for projects that are all together, and the balance of it is for projects outside of this bill. So you can not state that any of that available balance, so called, would reach any of the projects and items which are mentioned in the bill.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I always defer to the knowledge of the Senator from Florida on these questions; but if that is the aggregate, then I have a misunderstanding about the matter. I want to go into that further, and if I am mistaken I shall withdraw my remarks as to that. I had understood they could be transferred to some of the other projects in this bill; certainly they are available balances as set forth in the engineers' sheets which I have used. Anyway, a $10,000,000 or $15,000,000 lump-sum appropriation would certainly cover all necessary work for this war year. Go on and pass your bill. I predict the men from some States who vote for it will some day hear from the people.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator yield to me for the purpose of moving an executive session?

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield; certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour spent in executive session, the doors were reopened.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, July 25, 1917.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty and ever-living God, source of all things, we most fervently and devoutly pray for light to guide, strength to sustain, hope to cheer and encourage us as we try to fulfill our destiny upon the earth, that our lives may be fruitful and the harvest abundant to the glory and honor of Thy Holy Name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 2667. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Pritchard-Wheeler Lumber Co., of Wisner, La., to construct a bridge across Bayou Macon, in Louisiana, at a point east of the town of Wisner, La.; and

S. 2666. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Sebastian bridge district to construct a bridge across the Arkansas River at the foot of Garrison Avenue, at Fort Smith, Ark.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 4892. An act authorizing the President to take possession, on behalf of the United States, for use as sites for permanent aviation stations for the Army and Navy and for aviation-school purposes, of the whole of North Island, in the harbor of San Diego, Cal., and for other purposes.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate joint resolution of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. J. Res. 73. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to invest Indian funds in Government bonds; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE OF HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. HILL rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Connecticut rise?

Mr. HILL. I rise to a question of privilege involving the rights of the House of Representatives. I would like five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut rises to a question of privilege touching the rights of the House of Representatives and desires five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me, as a Republican member of the Committee on Ways and Means, that the prerogatives of this body are being invaded. I recognize under the Constitution that the power of issuing bonds and incurring indebtedness must originate in the House of Representatives. Two weeks ago, four weeks ago, eight weeks ago, we sent from this House a tax bill. It was derided and denounced all over the country, and in two days was to be re-formed and reconstructed and made perfect. Many things in it I did not approve, but it had one saving grace. It raised the money which the party in power said they needed. Eight weeks have gone by, and no report has come yet from the other body. And now in the press of to-day I find that the Secretary of the Treasury appeared before the Finance Committee of the Senate yesterday and proposed $5,000,000,000 of additional funds, part to be raised by bonds, the function of this House to originate; part to be raised by certificates of indebtedness, the function of this House to originate; the balance to be raised by taxation, which they have a perfect right to do, as an amendment to the tax bill which was sent to them. The bond issue—that has been made, the certificates of indebtedness, authorized under a prior bill, passed weeks before that by this House of Representatives, have been issued, the bonds have been sold in part, and now, ignoring the law and ignoring the Constitution of the United States, it is proposed to more than double those things under the guise of an amendment to the tax bill, and the House of Representatives is absolutely ignored under the proposition, under the plea that it is an emergency.

I feel it my duty, Mr. Speaker, to call the attention of the House of Representatives to this invasion of its prerogatives, so that in the future, when such a bill comes to us for consideration, if nobody else does it, I will move to send it back, as Mr. Sereno E. Payne once did under similar circumstances, and the House refused to consider it. I think we ought to stand on our rights and have this business attended to more promptly than it has been attended to. If I am not mistaken, I have the support of the Republican Members of this House in standing by the administration during the war, but we want to do it legally, fairly, and squarely, and I therefore call the attention of the House to this invasion of our prerogatives. [Applause.]

BRIDGE ACROSS THE ARKANSAS RIVER.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to call up Senate bill 2666, a bridge bill, there being a House bill of similar tenor on the calendar.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 2666) granting the consent of Congress to the Sebastian bridge district to construct a bridge across the Arkansas River, at the foot of Garrison Avenue, at Fort Smith, Ark.

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the Sebastian bridge district, created by the Legislature of Arkansas, its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Arkansas River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation at the foot of Garrison Avenue, at Fort Smith, in the county of Sebastian, in the State of Arkansas, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

Mr. MEEKER rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Missouri rise?

Mr. MEEKER. To object.

The SPEAKER. You can not.

Mr. WINGO. I ask for a vote, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the House bill 5147 of similar tenor will be laid on the table.

There was no objection.

On motion of Mr. ADAMSON, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the Senate bill was passed was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS BAYOU MACON, IN LOUISIANA.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up Senate bill 2667 and ask for its consideration.

The SPEAKER. Is there a House bill of similar tenor on the calendar?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House Senate bill 2667, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 2667) granting the consent of Congress to the Pritchard-Wheeler Lumber Co., of Wisner, La., to construct a bridge across Bayou Macon, in Louisiana, at a point east of the town of Wisner, La.

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the Pritchard-Wheeler Lumber Co., of Wisner, La., and to its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Bayou Macon at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near a point east of the town of Wisner, La., in the parish of Franklin, in the State of Louisiana, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the House bill 5250 of similar tenor will be laid on the table.

There was no objection.

On motion of Mr. WILSON of Louisiana, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the Senate bill was passed was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE WABASH RIVER, IND.

Mr. KRAUS rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Indiana rise?

Mr. KRAUS. To call up Senate bill 2106.

The SPEAKER. Is there a House bill of similar tenor?

Mr. KRAUS. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 2106) to authorize the county of Cass, in the State of Indiana, to construct a bridge across the Wabash River east of the city of Logansport, at a point known as Cedar or Rock Island, in said Wabash River.

Be it enacted, etc., That the county of Cass, State of Indiana, is hereby authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Wabash River, at a point suitable to the interest of navigation, at a place east of the city of Logansport, at a point known as Cedar or Rock Island, in said Wabash River, in the State of Indiana, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

Mr. MANN. Are you going to pass it by unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend the bill in line 6, page 1, by striking out the word "interest" and inserting the word "interests."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MANN moves to amend, page 1, line 6, by striking out the word "interest" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "interests."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

By unanimous consent the corresponding House bill 3641 was ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. KRAUS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

REQUEST TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects.

FOOD AND FUEL CONTROL.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 4961) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel, with Senate amendments, and to disagree to all the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill, H. R. 4961, disagree to all the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, while I am heartily in favor of sending this bill to conference, I think it would be fair for the House to have an opportunity to vote on Senate amendment No. 70, especially as the President has directed the Democratic conferees never to agree to it; and if the gentleman will make his request to take the bill from the Speaker's table and disagree to all the Senate amendments except No. 70, I will not object. Otherwise, I shall be compelled to object, and let the majority use its power to bring in the rule that it has already prepared.

Mr. LEVER. In response to the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois, I would like to direct his attention to what occurred yesterday on the floor of the House, when numerous requests were made for separate votes on numerous propositions, to which I had to make objection. But, repeating what I said yesterday, I do not feel that in fairness to other gentlemen I can afford to agree to this proposition.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LEVER. I will.

Mr. LENROOT. The gentleman in his statement places this amendment in the same category as others. I ask the gentleman whether he does not think that Senate amendment 70 is in an entirely different category from others? If he did not think so, why did he ask the opinion of the President upon it and why should he ask the opinion of the President and not be willing to take the opinion of the House, whose servant he is?

Mr. LEVER. Well, my response to the suggestion of the gentleman from Wisconsin is this: I did not feel myself that an amendment of that character had any place on a food-control bill, but I was not sure but that the President of the United States might want such a committee; therefore, I desired his opinion upon the proposition, and asked for it and got it.

Mr. MANN. Now, Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, he stated that yesterday there were numerous requests for votes on different amendments. The gentleman may be correct. He usually is very accurate. I do not recall any request yesterday for a separate vote on any amendment, except the request which I made for a separate vote on amendment 70.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Oh, yes!

Mr. MANN. There were various gentlemen on the Democratic side seeking to hold up the gentleman from South Carolina by threats of objecting to sending the bill to conference unless he agreed that there might be separate votes hereafter, or that he would take such and such a position in conference; but I protected the gentleman from South Carolina by stating that if he made any promise as to any amendment I would insist upon the promise of separate votes upon other amendments.

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman's protection, I will say, consisted in his taking me by the nape of the neck and throwing me out of the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. Who wanted a separate vote on any other amendment?

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is that the gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table H. R. 4961 and disagree to all the Senate amendments and agree to the conference asked by the Senate. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects, and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] is recognized.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I submit a privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 123 (H. Rept. No. 110).

Resolved, That the bill H. R. 4961, entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel" be, and hereby is, taken from the Speaker's table, with the Senate amendments thereto, to the end that the said amendments be, and hereby are, disagreed to; and the conference requested by the Senate on the disagreeing votes on said amendments be, and hereby is, agreed to and the Speaker shall immediately appoint the conferees.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, every individual here and elsewhere, familiar with legislative procedure and cognizant of the situation which now exists, knows quite well that the so-called food-control bill must necessarily be the subject of conference between representatives of the two legislative bodies. There are two methods whereby this bill in its present situation can be gotten to conference; one by unanimous consent, the other by a special resolution reported from the Committee on Rules. The first method has been tried upon two successive days and has failed. Therefore the Committee on Rules present this resolution to accomplish that which, sooner or later, must be accomplished, namely the bringing about of a conference, to the end that disagreements may be settled. The purpose of the rule is to respond to the demand of this country for the expediting of this measure. [Applause.] The sooner it goes to conference the sooner it can become a law. If there are any gentlemen here present who have the slightest doubt that the public is extremely impatient—I am almost tempted to say extremely disgusted—with the delay which has marked the progress of this important measure, they need only to go for a few days among the people of this country and talk to them, and they can ascertain for themselves what the condition of public sentiment is. Necessity demands it, the public demands it, the interests of this country demand it at once. Gentlemen of the House, this is no time for the play of petty politics or of puny personal passions. [Applause.] We are engaged in the vastest struggle of the ages. For the winning of that contest the sickle must be used as well as the saber. Who has not looked with alarm within the last few days upon the advance being made by the armies of the foe toward the wheat fields of Russia? Every demand of necessity, every demand of patriotism, every demand of public thought is that this important measure may be passed into law, and passed speedily. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question upon the resolution.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Regular order!

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Is it the purpose of the gentleman from Tennessee to cut off all debate on this resolution?

The SPEAKER. If the previous question is ordered, it cuts off debate.

Mr. RANDALL. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to inquire whether this resolution precludes the offering of a motion to instruct the conferees?

The SPEAKER. It undoubtedly does. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MANN) there were—ayes 169, noes 101.

So the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

The Speaker appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. LEVER, Mr. LEE of Georgia, Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi, Mr. HEFLIN, Mr. HAUGEN, Mr. MCLAUGHLIN of Michigan, and Mr. ANDERSON.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman upon what subject?

Mr. LENROOT. On the subject of the action just taken by the House.

Mr. HEFLIN. I do not care to speak at this time, but if the gentleman from Wisconsin is given 10 minutes I shall ask for 10 minutes in which to reply to him.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I object.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, July 26, 1917, at 12 o'clock noon.

NATION-WIDE PROHIBITION.

Mr. FERNALD. I present resolutions adopted by the Maine and New Hampshire Woman's Christian Temperance Union, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the UNITED STATES SENATE, care of Senator FERNALD:

The Maine and the New Hampshire Woman's Christian Temperance Union, representing a membership of 8,000, in joint meeting assembled at Portsmouth, N. H., July 20, 1917, passed the following resolution:

"Resolved, That we protest against the manufacture of foodstuffs into alcoholic beverages.

"Resolved, That we urge the prohibition of the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors during the war period."

ALTHEA G. QUIMBY,
President of Maine Woman's Christian Temperance Union.
ELLEN R. RICHARDSON,
President of New Hampshire Woman's Christian Temperance Union.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, referred as follows:

By Mr. WOLCOTT:

A bill (S. 2692) to render possible the return of the bodies of our soldier dead to their home burial grounds in a sanitary and recognizable condition; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. CHAMBERLAIN:

A bill (S. 2693) granting an increase of pension to Oliver P. Lane; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. KNOX:

A bill (S. 2694) for the relief of Jacob Swartz (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. ROBINSON:

A bill (S. 2695) to authorize the construction, maintenance, and operation of a bridge across Little River, at or near the foot of the gar hole about one-half mile south of the Jonesboro, Lake City & Eastern Railway bridge across Little River, Ark.; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. CURTIS (by request):

A bill (S. 2696) creating a Board of Administration to develop a practical standard for rural colonies and to establish the same for dependent families of soldiers of the United States and to make a national colonization survey; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

By Mr. WEEKS:

A bill (S. 2697) placing Henry E. Rhoades, assistant engineer, United States Navy, on the retired list with advance of one grade; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

SELECTIVE DRAFT.

Mr. NELSON. I desire at this time to offer a resolution and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Printing. It merely provides for the printing of a document.

The resolution (S. Res. 107) was referred to the Committee on Printing, as follows:

Whereas the President of the United States, under date of July 19, 1917, issued certain rules and regulations for determining the order in which the persons whose registration cards are within the jurisdiction of the respective local boards are liable to be called for military service by the respective local boards; and

Whereas a schedule has been prepared by the Provost Marshal General which shall control and determine the exact order in which the persons whose registration cards are in the possession of the respective local boards and which have been given a "serial" number are liable to be called for military service by the local board, said schedule being combined in pamphlet form, together with certain rules and regulations as above mentioned; and

Whereas only one such publication has been placed at the disposal of each newspaper and certain metropolitan newspapers require numerous copies in rendering a public service by disseminating intelligence in respect of such publication: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the publication above mentioned be printed as a Senate document in sufficient number to meet demands which can not be supplied by the Provost Marshal General's office as subsequently determined.

PRICE OF STEEL.

Mr. GRONNA. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter from the American Institute of Architects, the Minnesota Chapter, which gives the increase in the cost of steel.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE AMERICAN INSTITUTE OF ARCHITECTS,
MINNESOTA CHAPTER,
Minnesota, Minn., July 18, 1917.

Hon. A. J. GRONNA,
United States Senate Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The Minnesota Chapter of the American Institute of Architects, whose territory embraces the States of Minnesota, North and South Dakota, and Montana, is seriously concerned regarding the building situation at present and in the future during the period of this war and the reconstruction period that will inevitably follow.

The Minnesota Chapter is addressing you with this appeal hoping to gain your support and influence in the inauguration of an investigation that we believe will correct this abnormal condition. We wish, therefore, to call your attention to the excessive and unwarranted price of building materials, some of which are listed in this letter. These prices seriously interfere with the building business and the allied trades; in fact, they make building practically prohibitive. It is evident to us that combinations have entered into the manufacture of building products, thereby eliminating competition, and if this condition of affairs is allowed to continue nothing more serious could happen to our profession. It will mean that all building will cease and millions of men will be out of employment.

The prices of materials entering into the cost of building operations of all kinds have been systematically advancing since 1914, but in the period since the breaking of diplomatic relations with Germany the advance has been sensational, as will be apparent from the prices herein mentioned. Wages have not been correspondingly advanced, though, as we are all aware, the cost of living has advanced tremendously.

It has been plain to us who have noted the rise in prices from time to time and have also seen the diminishing volume of business and building that there has been a most extraordinary "profiteering" in the items to which we call attention, as well as in many others.

Now comes the skyrocket advance caused by our entrance into the war. Were we—architects, engineers, and contractors—the only sufferers, we might perhaps hold our peace but if this sort of thing goes on unchecked it is evident the building industry will be crushed, and the large class of workers dependent upon it will be out of work.

In many of the items herein quoted it is apparent that our Government and our allies, as well as the vast army of consumers, have been exploited without shame.

In view of these facts, we therefore are requesting of the Federal Trade Relation Commission an investigation, and that such means as are legally possible and economically correct be taken in the premises to correct abuses which are so obvious to everyone.

Items, approximate advances on which are appended, illustrate the situations:

Portland cement advanced 17 per cent since March. We do not so seriously complain of the steady advance before, but it is still being pushed up.

Reinforcing rods: September, 1914, $1.37; September, 1915, $1.75; September, 1916, $1.95; January, 1917, $4.43 ($4.78 two days later).

I beams: September, 1914, $1.45; September, 1915, $1.75; September, 1916, $1.95; January, 1917, $4.78.

Plates: June 18, 1917, $8.32 per hundredweight.

Castings advanced from 2 to 4 cents in six months.

Builders' hardware advanced 75 per cent to 95 per cent in one year on top of previous advances.

Galvanized sheet steel, $4.25, $11.25 since September, 1916.
Sheet steel, $9.20 since September, 1916.
As an interesting corollary—arbitrary price of steel common stock in 1914 at close of stock exchange (it was probably worth fairly more):
September, 1915, $73 to $79.
September, 1916, $97 to $112.
June, 1917, $134.
It is interesting to note that it has advanced $20 since May 15, and principally, we suppose, on the fact that the Government had let contracts at about $100 per ton to build some steel ships to keep our allies from starving. (We note the future price to be $56, if Chairman Denman can put it across, whereupon Steel common dropped about $4.)
Our city purchasing agent states:
"Contract let in 1915 for 6-inch, 8-inch, and cast-iron pipe, $18.75 per hundredweight.
"Contract let June 15, 1917, for 6-inch, 8-inch, and cast-iron pipe, $57.35 per hundredweight."
The above is written with no animus against the steel companies. In copper, zinc, plumbing goods, and many other items the same rise, in more or less degree, has occurred.
The Minnesota chapter therefore ardently protests against this situation and do hereby appeal to you to exert your best endeavor to bring about a thorough investigation of the situation and provide a correction to these abuses.
We will be very glad to hear from you relative to this matter and assist you in all ways possible in accomplishing this most needed and desired correction.
Yours, very truly, CECIL CHAPMAN, Secretary.

PRICE OF WHEAT IN CANADA.

Mr. GRONNA. I also ask to have a newspaper clipping printed in the RECORD, in order to give the committee of conference some information as to what the Canadian Government has done relative to fixing the price of wheat. It was fixed last Saturday at $2.40 a bushel.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHEAT PRICE FIXED—CANADIANS SET MAXIMUM FIGURE FOR THIS YEAR'S GRAIN.

WINNIPEG, MANITOBA, July 21, 1917.

The Canadian board of grain supervisors to-day fixed $2.40 a bushel as the maximum price of wheat beginning August 1.
Fort William will be the basis for this price, transportation cost at Fort William being deducted from the maximum.
Announcement of price caused little comment on the floor of the grain exchange here.

TRUST THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, I have here an article taken from the Washington Post of July 26, 1917, which I ask to have inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TRUST THE PRESIDENT.

Any move by Congress to establish a joint congressional committee on war expenditures will be open to misconstruction by the public. With a congressional committee investigating war contracts and expenditures delay and confusion would be inevitable, and even though the blame for this were not fixed definitely upon Congress, bad feeling would be aroused.
There is sufficient division of responsibility and authority already. The public has been demanding the cutting of red tape rather than the unwinding of more of it. While the proposed committee would not attempt to exercise executive powers or encroach upon the executive departments, its inquiries would be a source of friction and annoyance.
At best Congress would merely obtain reports from the committee which any Senator or Representative could obtain by making inquiries at the departments. If the committee held hearings, it would take department heads and bureau chiefs away from their desks, where they are needed for executive business.
The fact that Congress during the Civil War appointed a committee to "cooperate" with Lincoln is no justification for appointing a similar committee now. The Civil War lasted four years. It might have been shortened had there been less friction at the Capitol.
Congress on the whole has performed its functions well and has given great aid to the President. There has been an absence of political manipulation up to date and the record should not be broken. What the President has asked has been given, and this real cooperation should not be replaced with anything that might resemble encroachment or interference.
The President already is heavily burdened. His whole time is devoted to conferences with the officials who are charged under the Constitution with carrying out the will of Congress. Some one must be trusted. Even the congressional committee would have to be trusted by Congress. Why, then, should Congress not trust the Executive elected by the people to enforce the laws of the land?

LEAVE OF ABSENCE TO SENATOR THOMAS.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I ask that leave of absence be granted my colleague, the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], for six weeks. His doctors have forbidden him to attend the sessions of the Senate until the expiration of that time, and he has left for Colorado.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). Is there objection to granting the request for a leave of absence for the senior Senator from Colorado? There being no objection, that order will be entered.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4285) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, if the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] desires to take up any other feature of the bill I am not particular about going on to-night, but I will do so if there is nothing else that the chairman of the committee desires to consider.

I do not expect to add anything novel to the discussion of this bill. We have been over it many times in past sessions. The discussion is principally one of details. In the committee I confess quite candidly that I was not a good member. I felt that as far as the $27,000,000 finally reported out might be affected no discussion in the committee would change the combination of interests that would result in the reporting of the bill. I feel that most of those matters are grown to be perfunctory. There is not much change in the recommendations that are made by the department or the Board of Engineers that in the first instance make up these estimates and furnish the basis for the different paragraphs of the bill, so I did not feel very much like going into the matter in the committee as we often do in other discussions where there is a bona fide expectation of changing some of the items.

Very largely out in the western country our streams are tributary to and a part of the watershed of the Mississippi River and its branches. The Ohio and Wabash Rivers on the east and southeast comprise our waterways, and on the west the Mississippi River. The Mississippi has been, I think, properly treated within the last year, by being segregated from the river and harbor bill proper and placed in legislation by itself. The Mississippi River and the Missouri River, counting it as a mere tributary, make the largest inland river in the world. It is the best navigable inland waterway there is in the Western Hemisphere. It excels anything in Europe, and if there were any possibility of developing the river-borne traffic in the United States this is the place where it could be done.

The flood-control bill that passed this body some months ago appealed to me favorably because it put improvements of this kind on a sound basis. I realize that such appropriations are technically hung on the improvement of interstate commerce. On that basis it is often a false pretense. We are compelled very largely to employ that pretense in order to give some legal standing to these appropriations. Outside of the connecting ways between the great inland lakes and those that connect arms of the sea, where they can become links between the domestic commerce and our foreign commerce, and our tidewater coast carriage, there is no interstate commerce at all worthy of the expenditures that have been made. The canals connecting the Great Lakes—the Soo in Michigan and similar connecting links—have justification, in the commerce that passes through them, for the expenditures made. The Mississippi River ought, in the flood-control bill, to be put on the right basis, and it is in that appropriation bill for the first time. The $6,000,000 that ordinarily would be found in the river and harbor bill, connected with the improvement of the Mississippi River, has been transferred to the flood-control feature of these appropriations. I think that is where it ought to go. It is not properly in the company in which so many of these meritorious measures are found. There is merit in the river and harbor bill. I am not condemning the whole bill; but because there are some features in the bill that are wholly without merit one is compelled to oppose the whole bill. It is idle to think that we could strike out these measures that are objectionable. It could not be done, because the local interests are so combined that the united vote will resist striking out any of these items, however objectionable they may be.

In the case of the flood-control bill, which is an entirely different question, I can bring myself to its support. It may be that a great deal of land reclamation will result; levees must be built; banks and the underlying substructure will be strengthened and improved. The improvements will be made in such a way that the flood waters of the Mississippi River and its tributaries will be restrained from spreading over a great area of country where in their natural state they do a great deal of damage, and have hindered the development of much of the fertile land.

In the delta proper of the Mississippi River lies some of the best soil there is in North America. As a land reclamation feature, I do not support the flood-control measure. I support it primarily as an improvement of the channel of the Mississippi River and a great sanitary and life-saving improvement. A great volume of water that formerly spread over many thousands of acres of bottom land is gathered into a channel which necessarily at times, during very high flood water, backs up and destroys or endangers many of the levees that have been built by private assessment or by levee districts formed at various points along the Mississippi River and taxed on private property. If the water is concentrated in one channel it improves navigation, of course.

The vicinity of the Ohio River where it joins the Mississippi River is a good illustration. The city of Cairo, a city of some 15,000 or 20,000 people, is found there. Some improvements, some cities on the Missouri, the Kentucky, and the Arkansas side, are found in this immediate neighborhood. The people have taxed themselves by forming levee districts in Cairo along both the Ohio and the Mississippi Rivers. They have taxed themselves to the limit. They can go no further for current-tax levies, nor can they go beyond the bond issues that are now out on the levee districts that have been formed. Below Cairo, on the Mississippi River, there have been some improvements made by the Government. Levees have been built; the water has been collected that formerly spread over a portion of the river bottoms. As the water has been collected inside of the channel created by the building of the levees, during the high water the concentration has been so great that the back-water from the current alone, unable to secure a passage between the walls created in this way, has thrown it back up the Mississippi River to Cairo and rendered the high water much greater there than it was when it was left in its natural state below. With the levee built to its present point, as I remember, there is only about 18 inches of safety. The increased height of the flood waters, the crest of the wave caused by the water backing up from below, together with a vastly increased volume of water coming down from above caused by the increased drainage, by the clearing of timber, by straightening the tributary rivers, by draining the morasses and the swamps and the lagoons along the Mississippi River country, collecting the volume of water and discharging it in a very short period compared with the old method of nature's drainage—all of these things have combined to make the crest of the flood wave reach the danger point at many of the river cities in Illinois, Kentucky, Indiana, Ohio, Arkansas, and the States below.

Under those conditions the improvement of the Mississippi River, deepening the channel, and getting such a flow of water as to make it cleanse itself and relieve the Government of a large expenditure for the annual dredging required, with other well-known causes, combine to bring the accumulation of water during the floods to a danger point for the existing levees that have been built by assessments on private property. Such levees were built before high water attained the present volume. This is only indirectly connected with the question of interstate commerce, it is true; but changing the method of drainage and increasing the accumulation of water was primarily for the purpose of improving the channel, deepening it, and thereby improving the interstate commerce; but the necessary effect of this was to endanger all of the property as well as the lives of those who dwelt in the area affected. So, multiplying this instance by the whole length of the Mississippi River below Cairo, it became a proper question for Congress to consider in connection with the matter of flood control. It culminated finally in the last bill that passed the Senate on that question. It put aside a very large sum of money to be expended under the control of the engineers for the twofold purpose of increasing interstate commerce and improving it, and at the same time making it safer for those who dwelt along the valley. Those purposes are supplemental to each other. If the improvement of the land by the levees that are built comes as an indirect result of it, I have no complaint to make. It is possible that those who own the land will profit. Some hundreds of thousands of acres within the area of several States may receive the greater benefit of it, but ultimately it must rest upon the improvement of interstate commerce by the deepening of the channel and incidentally the profits to the property owners will result.

The items in this bill are, some of them, I suggested, unobjectionable. There are others that I can not connect either with preparedness or with any scheme of interstate commerce or navigation. I might begin with the great Father of Waters, the Mississippi River. The Mississippi River ought to be a fair instance of what could be done in the improvement of our inland waterways. It is the best chance of all. I have had before me the commerce of the Mississippi River for many years. The lower Mississippi traffic could begin at St. Louis and from thence to its mouth. If anything could be done in improving the freight to be carried on inland waterways it ought to be from St. Louis to the Gulf. Along the Mississippi River between those points are some of the principal river cities of the United States. It begins with St. Louis, an important commercial point, the center of a great manufacturing, agricultural, and transportation country. It is a collecting and distributing point. There is a great manufacturing and jobbing trade in St. Louis. There are collected there the agricultural resources of a great grain and food-producing area. Going on south it has its southern terminus at New Orleans.

If there is any river in the United States that could furnish a development of river-borne commerce, it is the Mississippi River between those points. Before the war broke out it was a great center for the river steamboats. Immediately after the war ended railway development began. The railway development has not only been in the Mississippi Valley but every place else; but in the Mississippi Valley, especially from St. Louis down, was the great object lesson.

If the railroads could successfully go into such a territory and wrest from the steamboats alone the carrying of freight and passengers, it is useless to try to resurrect it. The commerce centering at St. Louis, both the incoming and the outgoing commerce, since 1880 shows a uniform course. It reached its high-water point sometime, say, in 1880 for river freight. Since that time it has steadily declined. If you run through all the trade in St. Louis on the river you find a steady shrinkage of its volume. Of the entire traffic in St. Louis, everything requiring transportation, there is about 5 per cent of it that is water borne at the present time. There is no greater inland center, there is no fairer illustration of the inland traffic by water than this point I am considering. It has given up its trade steadily to the railroads.

In that time the Mississippi River has been paralleled from St. Paul to New Orleans by railroads. If I go from St. Louis north, on both sides of the river I can travel by rail until I strike the Canada line. I can take it from St. Louis north on the old Long Line of the Burlington, as we used to call it, go north to Burlington, Iowa, and I can continue on the original line of the old Chicago, Burlington & Quincy road until I reach Quincy. I can go north from that on one side of the river or the other on the Burlington road until I reach St. Paul, Minn. Practically that is the end of the Mississippi River. It has its source in that State.

I can go south from St. Louis on both sides of the river by rail. Steam transportation has taken away from the river of the days before the war when Mark Twain was a steamboat pilot every ton of its profitable traffic that is worth considering as a matter to justify public expenditure. We need not expect to resurrect it.

I speak of this as an illustration for all of the inland rivers. I am not offering it for any of these intercoastal canals that are proposed, such as appear on the map. That is a different question and to be taken up and considered apart from the inland-waterways system when we reach them.

From St. Louis down, as I said, there are from one to three lines of road, until the Mexican Gulf country is reached.

The first development of steam transportation by land that took away the trade of the Mississippi River was the Illinois Central. The charter line began in Chicago, went south to Cairo. By subsequent development, from the time the first shovel of earth was thrown in 1850 to begin the road, it has developed into the present system that reaches from Chicago to New Orleans. It has been built along the Mississippi River in competition with the freight carried by steamboat, by tug, by barges, by every known species of transportation by river. This has been done while $120,000,000 appropriations have been expended on the river to make it a waterway.

At this point and along the bank of this river the steam railroads have built themselves up by competition during the years and have steadily absorbed the water-borne traffic of the Mississippi until to-day a bare 5 per cent remains on the last tabulations made.

It is said now that they have self-propelled barges that can be used in river traffic, something of the same that the Rhine and many of the improved European rivers have used. There may be some possible improvement in that.

I was so impressed by it that at the last session of Congress, in the winter of 1917, I endeavored to get authority not to spend money, but a mere authority by an affirmative act of Congress for my own State to spend $5,000,000 of its own money in a 42-mile link that would have connected the Atlantic Ocean with the Mexican Gulf by way of Chicago. The Board of Engineers had refused its permission. It was denied, too, by Congress. It was so unusual for anybody to ask legislation here for a public improvement that did not demand an appropriation from the United States Treasury at the same time that it stupefied the authorities—not those in Congress, and I am not referring to them—but it was such an unusual thing that no river engineer could grasp the idea that somebody was wanting to spend his own money and not go to the Treasury and ask for some millions. So before they recovered their equanimity they denied permission.

There is a number of river engineers I would be perfectly willing to furnish work to outside of taking care of the improvements of the interior waterways. Nearly all of them are West Point graduates. They have had the training that the Government can give them to fit them for military service. They are not privates in the ranks; they are beyond that age; but they do know something of the engineering that belongs to the military branch of the Government.

We need thousands of those men. Some of them have been in Washington ever since I have been here—four years at least—and many of them I know by common repute have been here for many years. They have not passed the age of telling younger men how to work and of using their services to the best possible advantage.

We are in a war. We are told by many wise men how to conserve our energies and our resources. We are told how to live; that we must eat so many slices of bread per day and so many ounces of sugar per family. All this advice is given us with the idea of strengthening ourselves for the coming struggle. We have been told repeatedly that if we do not save our resources and utilize them to nearly 100 per cent of value possibly we will enter on this struggle facing an enemy on unequal terms.

The river engineers serve at the present time no useful public purpose except that of expending money. They ought to be relieved of their civil duties, after having been educated at West Point at public expense, sent into the military branch of the Government, and used for the manifold military engineering problems that are presenting themselves at this time and which will be multiplied greatly in the near future. If this should be done, we would gain by so much all of those resources. They, however, are occupied in improving the inland waterways, such as the Mississippi River. I am taking that as the type, because if the Mississippi River could not successfully be improved so as to be worth while in interstate commerce of the expenditure made, it is no use to try the rivers in the interior—Missouri or Wisconsin or any of the States that lie in the Mississippi Valley or elsewhere away from the tidewater.

In the barge traffic, that I hear many words of commendation for now, it is proposed to get a tow of barges. The propelling power will be a tug. It will have a very wide, flat bottom, built a good deal like a scow and having a considerable tonnage. They can carry many times more than a box car, and it is proposed by this method to make a profitable water-borne freight. Or it may be by a self-propelled barge.

Carrying out that idea we proposed to put this link in the Illinois River. It was finally eliminated in Congress on the advice of the river engineers. I know what is the matter with the river engineer. The river engineer is opposed to anything that will sap the strength that belongs to the job he is holding. The river engineers are doing two things. The one is to spend the appropriation furnished by Congress and the other is to keep ever-present the necessity of the place he holds. If the States were jointly to start a system of improving themselves at their own expense, all the Mississippi Valley States from Minnesota to the Gulf, you would find it would be opposed by the river engineers for the same reason that they opposed the expenditure of $5,000,000 by the State of Illinois.

Wednesday, July 25, 1917.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I wish to say to the chairman of the Committee on Commerce and to others interested in this bill and other pending legislation, that those who take the same view which I do of the river and harbor bill are not engaged in any mere effort to delay. I shall say what I think proper on the pending measure without any desire to delay the final roll call, or to indulge in a filibuster or any undue consumption of time. I shall be very glad, if I can, to conclude what I have to say by, say, 5 o'clock, leaving time for an executive session, if it is desired by the Senate, as I understand there are some nominations which have been made which might properly be confirmed either this evening or at some early date.

On last evening when I ceased commenting on the bill I was referring to river traffic, of which St. Louis is the northern limit, of what is commonly known as the lower stretches of the Mississippi River, including in that territory the Ohio River. There is a very extensive literature on the lower Mississippi River traffic. The Chief of Engineers, Gen. Kingman, in 1915 used this language:

> To-day the Mississippi from St. Louis to its mouth affords a channel which is the best to be found in any stream in the world * * * and see its emptiness. An 8-foot channel is all that the most efficient service requires. The Government works unremittingly to develop waterways only to see the water-borne traffic grow less as the years go by.
> Still the average riverman will insist the poor condition of the channels keeps our inland waters idle. This is preposterous; the Rhine could never compare with the Mississippi in its advantages for transportation; its channel is narrower and shallower, more changeable, the current is swifter, and ice is known in the winter over its entire navigable length, yet in 1913 more than 97,000 vessels passed the Dutch and German frontier on the Rhine.

Whatever improvements may be contemplated in the Mississippi River, whether the upper or lower stretches, for the future, it can not be denied now that there is an 8-foot channel from St. Louis to the Mexican Gulf. There is every opportunity to develop the water-borne freight. The self-propelled barge, by gasoline or some convenient power under modern applied inventions in mechanics, can give as cheap motive power as any water transportation has ever known. The 8-foot channel from St. Louis below measures the possibilities. That is open now; that does not require an expenditure of any future millions of appropriations. It was because of this 8-foot depth now maintained in the Mississippi River that I was finally converted to the idea of my own State expending $5,000,000, referred to yesterday evening. That would have opened up a forty-odd mile stretch of waterway which would have connected Chicago with the Mississippi Valley below St. Louis and between St. Louis and Chicago.

It would have given water freight between New Orleans and the Gulf and Chicago and all intermediate points. That was denied by the gentlemen who have final authority to settle these questions; so this link has not yet been filled in. It was opposed in my own State by what is known as the deep-waterway men; it was opposed by some of the States north of Chicago; and it was opposed by the Canadian authorities. The Dominion of Canada has long had a nightmare about the loss of considerable of their water transportation that now goes by way of the St. Lawrence River. As a matter of fact, it is the railways taking the traffic away from the St. Lawrence Valley. What used to reach the Atlantic Ocean by way of the St. Lawrence River, coming from the Great Lakes area and from the Canadian Provinces, has ceased to go that way because of the development of the steam railways, both in Canada and the United States.

Whatever may be said by the Canadian authorities—and there is a very copious literature from Quebec—whatever may be said of the condition of the States on the Great Lakes of the United States that belong to this same scale of transportation, the indisputable facts are that the steam railways have taken away the freight which used to go up the St. Lawrence River, just as they have taken it from the Mississippi River. So the combination of interests converged their influence upon the Board of Engineers here and the Secretary of War, and they were disposed to think that there would be an increased volume of water taken out of Lake Michigan for the purpose of giving the necessary depth between Chicago and the Mississippi River by way of the Illinois and the 42-mile link that would be filled in by the canal. As a matter of fact, it would not have taken a gallon more out of Lake Michigan by way of the Chicago River than is now diverted. All that is taken out now is by the consent of the War Department, under whose direction all of the water from the lake is sent into the sanitary district channel and then into the Illinois and Mississippi Rivers.

All of this change that has been made by the sanitary district channel was for health purposes primarily. It was because Chicago had no way of draining herself; her sewage was undisposed of, and the waters of Lake Michigan were polluted. As an escape from the conditions that faced that municipality, in 1887 the initial legislation was given by State authority for the construction of the sanitary district channel. Many millions of dollars have been expended in the work.

Geographically the Chicago River flows east into Lake Michigan. It is formed by the junction of the north and the south branches of the Chicago River at a point some way west of what we know in Chicago as the Rush Street Bridge. The natural flow of the Chicago River has been changed by the sanitary district channel. As stated, geographically the Chicago River flows east. As a matter of fact, as an engineering change, the water in the Chicago River flows west and southwest. The engineers cut through the limestone bench, which separated Lake Michigan from the Illinois River Valley, and diverted the flow, taking a certain volume out of Lake Michigan by consent of the War Department and adding it to the volume of the Illinois River, and so furnishing the required relief for the city of Chicago. Many river engineers were consulted. The complaint was made that, taking out an additional quantity of water—which was an erroneous statement—would interfere with the navigation of the upper lake region. At any rate, the influences were sufficient, coupled with the natural indisposition of the river engineers to defeat the required authority before the $5,000,000 could be expended. So all hope of opening up a waterway to improve the Mississippi River chances of developing freight were gone.

If the Mississippi River from St. Louis south has an 8-foot channel, it is twice the depth of the River Rhine for a portion of its length. It is deeper than many others of the European rivers that carry a considerable freight on their surface every 12 months. It has the advantage of not being ice locked during a greater part of the year, and a portion of it during no part of the year. At any rate, during the open season in the stretch of the river from St. Louis down to Cairo there is an 8-foot channel at least, and all that remained was to put an 8-foot channel above St. Louis to connect it with Chicago. That could have been done by the expenditure of the $5,000,000 to which I have referred, but that project was denied. It would have been now under course of construction if it had been allowed. The experiment made with the Mississippi River would be a finality; it would have passed beyond the realms of conjecture, and it would have approached the region of actual demonstration if it had been undertaken.

There is something, however, of value connected with the lower Mississippi River from St. Louis south—and that is what I mean when I refer generally to the lower river—that is capable of demonstration. It is that the traffic by barge, whether self-propelled or tow drawn by a tug, where the 8-foot channel now exists, has not developed in sufficient volume to justify the predictions made by promoters of this bill and other bills of a like kind.

The Mississippi River has been open all these years. In St. Louis business men have undertaken to revive the river traffic. Mr. Kavanaugh and his associates, a number of responsible men, have undertaken to interest in river transportation those who have freight to ship. So far their efforts have not met with marked success.

There seems to be a universal feeling that the Mississippi River has lost its freight because some better means of transportation has been offered to the commerce of the country. If, during the time the Mississippi River with its 8-foot channel has been open, nothing has been done by the shippers or by those furnishing the common carriers by water to avail themselves of it, there is more than a well-founded suspicion that it is based on a good cause. Eight feet will furnish all the transportation that any profitable barge service need desire. A flat-bottom barge built to float on 8 feet of water can be profitably used if there is any profit in inland-water transportation. The barges can be built of varying sizes. A single barge line constructed to float on 8 feet of water will carry as much freight as will the average well-equipped freight train drawn by an engine, with the limit of pulling capacity, on a modern heavy steel rail, ballasted railroad.

With this advantage that is manifest now, every opportunity has been given since the river traffic began to decline, to develop the barge transportation, but it has not been developed. Advantages of this kind which an 8-foot channel offers have not led to the development of the barge system, except as to the coal that comes down from the upper Ohio River. In the main, the entire profitable transportation of the Ohio River is made up of coal that floats down the river in barges, distributing itself to points as far south as New Orleans.

Including the allowance in this bill, more than $60,000,000 has been spent on the Ohio River. Within its banks there is afforded a fair test of water transportation. Next to the Mississippi River it gives the amplest opportunity for water freight. With over $60,000,000 spent on the Ohio when this bill is considered, with more than $120,000,000 spent on the Mississippi River, with more than $900,000,000 spent, including the appropriations in this bill, on the waterways and rivers and harbors of the United States, it is certainly time that Congress pause and take stock of the results obtained from these astounding expendtures of the public funds.

Col. Townsend, who was connected with the Mississippi River Commission and whose offices are at St. Louis, delivered a most remarkable address in September, 1915, before river and harbor bill supporters at their meeting for that year. Supporters of river and harbor bills are referred to as "the river and harbor lobby." I will not use that term because to some of them it is offensive, and I desire to divest myself of all personalities in discussing this question. Before I read what Col. Townsend said on the subject, I will preface my remarks by saying that the supporters of river and harbor bills outside of Congress are quite persistent in urging the support of this bill by Members of Congress. I have in my office files voluminous correspondence with friends of this and similar measures. The correspondence runs all the way from sober argument, based upon the supposed benefits of such appropriations as these, to threats of political extinction. None of them shed any light upon the intrinsic merit of the river and harbor bill as a means of supplying this country with inland freight facilities.

I limit the statement to the inland possibilities. With relation to the harbors on tidewater, the inlets or necks that cover larger bodies, coastal in character, I reserve any present criticism. If anything can be said against them, I will say it at some future time. Except as they may be incidentally connected with the appropriations carried by this bill, it is not my main purpose this afternoon to take up these measures, as to many of which there is considerable merit. The waterways that connect, as I remarked yesterday evening, the Great Lakes are proper subjects of appropriation, because the Great Lakes furnish considerable transportation. Projects that are connected with the deepening of the great harbors of the country, where either the Navy or merchant shipping can cast anchor and receive and discharge freight, are not subject properly to criticism. The only thing we might ask at this time is that large sums which seem to be appropriated in this bill unnecessarily shall be delayed until the improvement is needed in due course of time.

Criticisms made in the same spirit in which they were directed against the junior Senator from Iowa, so far as my friends and myself are concerned, will not deflect us from our purpose of opposing such measures. Like the junior Senator from Iowa, if my seat in this body is dependent upon my support of measures of this kind, I would prefer to be a private citizen and retain my own self-respect. That exceeds, as I look at it, the commission to any office I know of in this country.

I know that along the Mississippi River are many levee districts. The land has been taxed and the levees partially completed, but are yet insufficient. When they are finished, so as to furnish a complete defense to the flood waters of the Mississippi River, the land inside of these districts will be worth ultimately $250 an acre the instant the levees are known to be flood proof. Every acre of upland in that country, where land now sells for $300 an acre, will ultimately be worth $500 an acre. I once heard the testimony of a soil chemist connected with the Illinois University before a legislative committee. It was in the infancy of soil improvement, before even the farmer was taking a casual interest in restoring the fertility of the soil; when it was not a fad, as it is now with a good many; when we had not heard of food-control bills; when we had not heard of wise men who told us to curtail our gastronomic propensities and to live upon one slice of bread and a radish and a turnip, and that it would be much better to thin our blood by sassafras tea and a vegetable diet. We had not heard of these alluring schemes at that time, Mr. President; but this soil chemist was telling us how people who were raising crops from the soil must put something back in the soil—what Mr. Hill, of railroad fame, told us in later years—that where we took away we must put back, or ultimately we would impoverish our country, and we would go back to the condition of central Asia, where the country was denuded of forests, where vegetation had ceased to flourish, where rainfalls had diminished, and where the soil was impoverished.

At that time he was asked the question what he thought land would be worth in the corn belt. He replied that men then in the committee room would live to see land worth $500 an acre. An irrepressible, audible wave of laughter went around through the room. They regarded him as a visionary. Land was selling then at about $125 an acre. That was regarded as a good price. Much of it was selling lower, and not a great deal of it was selling above that figure. We who were in the committee room at that time have lived to see land sell for $300 an acre. If I live to the allotted threescore and ten, I expect to see land in that locality sell for $500 an acre.

Among the localities where $500-an-acre land will be is that included inside of the walls of the Mississippi levees. It is the most fertile soil in the world. There is the bottom soil of the Mississippi River that has been cultivated within historic knowledge of men in that country now for 175 years, and it is still fertile soil. In old Kaskaskie, now in Randolph County, Ill., the French who left La Salle in his early explorations, coming down by way of Quebec, deserted from his command, amalgamated themselves with the Indians, and remained there and formed the earliest white man's settlement in the Mississippi River country.

That land is still fertile. I have had translated for my edification the old French records kept in that tongue, and they show the arpents of land—which was their measurement—all of them running down to the Mississippi River, because everybody then wanted a shore frontage on his land for water, for transportation, and for various other purposes. These lands are still fertile, and to-day can raise from 20 to 40 bushels of wheat per acre.

With those improvements, I have no quarrel. I wish, as ardently as my friends of the lower Mississippi River, for the floods to be kept off the land. There is in that some real economy, some real preparation for the test of national strength. Because, however, it is a very great benefit to those who own the land, I am disposed to think that there is considerable merit in the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH], which provides, as an amendment to this bill—

That each of the appropriations herein made shall become available only in the event States, counties, cities, corporations, copartnerships, associations, or individuals shall pay into the Treasury as part of the same one-third of the amount thereof: Provided, however, That the provisions of this section shall not apply to those items requiring contributions from other sources.

If this should be voted in as an amendment to this bill, it would apply one of the tests that ordinarily, in business matters, we regard as a touchstone of good faith. The test of putting the community's own money into an enterprise of this kind is a severe test, but a searching one, upon the merits of the undertaking. If that test were applied in any of the enterprises that are now under way, and that, I think, are good examples of the folly of such measure, many of them never would have been undertaken. If they had been obliged to put up in the State of Texas, on the Brazos and Trinity Rivers, some of the millions that have been poured into those improvements, they would not have been made. They would not, at least, have seen their present proportions. If some one in the State of Missouri had been required to put up one-third of the amount, a like result would have followed.

There is not a single great inlet or harbor, not a Great Lakes port from whose shores goes commerce in any considerable amount, that would not equal by one-third, or even duplicate with an equal amount, the sums of money appropriated by Congress, if they had been called on, in all the country with which I am acquainted in the Lake region. Every place that possesses merit, that has an actual commerce developed by the agriculture, banking, manufacturing, and all of the Lake transportation, coupled with the steam roads, and has been called on to put in one-third of the amount of the appropriation, would have responded promptly by appropriating through the local authorities the amount required. Not only that, but in my judgment they would have gone away beyond that. All of the country of northern Indiana, Calumet, Indiana Harbor, Gary, and all that great semicircle of the south and southwestern end of Lake Michigan that runs from Indiana Harbor clear around above Chicago to Waukegan, would put more money into harbor improvements, dredging, deepening, and improving the natural facilities given by the Lake shore, many times over, than it would ever receive from appropriations in Congress.

These are points where there naturally gathers, by the course of trade, a vast commerce. It seeks an ingress and egress. The commerce coming in, some of it, can reach the city of Chicago in that way. The Lakes commerce, when the closed season is not on, can go by way of Lake Michigan and the other Great Lakes through these connecting bodies of water that run from one lake to another lake, those at Detroit and other points, and there reach at last eastern points, furnishing an outlet for a tremendous volume of merchandise. All of those points have merit and all of them would hesitate not a moment, if the amendment of the junior Senator from Colorado were adopted, by proper appropriations by the city, county, or State, or by the levee districts, to place alongside the Government appropriations an amount equal to one-third as the local contribution.

There are two things here, Mr. President, that are becoming parasitical in nature. One is this perennial river and harbor bill, and the other is the public-buildings bill. These two, combined, are a greater menace to the strength of the United States than a German submarine or the helmet of Prussia that the poets talk about. They grow continually. The public-buildings bill is of the same kind with the river and harbor appropriation bill. Somebody wants to go home a conquering hero, wearing the garlands of an immense Government appropriation. He sees the red fire; he hears the applause of the multitude; he attends a banquet and hears himself described as a statesman. He goes back imbued with the notion that he has discovered a method of statecraft that will result in a permanent seat in Congress.

I regard these methods with a certain degree of contempt. I never have made any personal criticisms of those who adopt them, but I feel like stripping off the coat of humbuggery that hangs upon the shoulders of every such pretense. It is a reprehensible method of making the public pay for the nomination and election of Members of Congress. The acid of ultimate analysis must be applied to these pretenses.

When Barnum was exhibiting his woolly colt and the mermaid that was composed of the outer integument of a monkey sewed together with some representative of the finny tribe and exhibited as a mermaid, it drew large crowds, along with the colt I have described. The colt in infancy was raised in my neighborhood. Barnum came around with his show and in the side show was the woolly colt. I was a lad at that time, and some of the grown-up people went in to see it. Every fellow that paid half a dollar to see it came out and was immediately anxious to see that the other fellow was victimized, and township after township gave up its half dollars. They all got together after the show was over and compared notes, and each fellow acknowledged that he had helped rope in the other fellow. Barnum, soon after that, gave utterance to a great psychological truth that sank into my boyhood memory. I think it describes a river and harbor bill. He said the American people like to be humbugged. The appetite now is just as strong as it ever was, and I think they are getting it handed to them, about 24 karats fine. I regard a large part of the river and harbor bill as illustrating Barnum's maxim, because it is, legislatively speaking, an arrant humbug.

Twenty-seven million dollars! When it comes to speaking of millions, as Senators have suggested, the figures trip over the speaker's tongue as lightly as if he were tossing coppers out in a hayfield. Millions mean nothing now. Hundreds of millions mean nothing now. Why, even billions mean nothing. We are mounting up to fifteen, seventeen, twenty billions. The total national wealth, all private ownership of wealth, that constitutes the source of taxable property in this country, in 1910 was estimated to be $187,000,000,000; and counting the increase that has come with such prosperity as the war brought prior to 1917, counting the increase in values of all tangible property, the franchises, good will, patents, and the like, we have at this time, fairly estimated, no more than $250,000,000,000 as a total, making allowance for the additions since 1910, seven years. When we reach $20,000,000,000 of taxes or of indebtedness, we will have 8 per cent of the total. That means, if we keep it up, that in 12½ years we would, by the taxing power, reach every dollar that is in private ownership in the United States—12½ years! This is a lawful exercise of the taxing power, but it is a practical confiscation of all the industrious, thrifty people of our country. It ought to sober us in spending money to reflect on where at last all this may end.

The Napoleonic wars lasted more than 12 years. The press reports from across the ocean are not especially reassuring for early peace, however ardently we desire it.

For my part, I have a great deal of sympathy with Mr. Hoover in that particular. He is anxious that we begin early and save as much as possible of all our food supplies. I am equally anxious to do it. I differ from him only as to the method. I think we can not save anything that we do not have. We can not have foodstuffs that we do not produce. The producer is in the garden, on the farm, and he must be encouraged. He can not be driven. He will not take orders, because he is like the mountaineers of all the countries in the world. The farmer out on the plain, on the prairies, wherever you find him, the cotton planter of the South and the corn and wheat raiser in the North, is the same way. He can be persuaded and attracted, but he can not be ordered and driven. So I think we ought to begin in Congress to save on the matter of taxation.

We are assuming tremendous burdens. No one knows where they will end. If Russia should remain in her present chaotic condition, it will take her as many years to evolve stable government out of the 30 languages and 40 nationalities within her limits as it did in the French Revolution beginning in 1789. It was nearly 10 years before France developed, from her reign of terror, her committee of one hundred, a stable government, and then only to find it in the hands of an autocrat. When the artillery officer left the streets of Paris and began to produce order out of French chaos, he developed the great military power that at last made Napoleon the leader of the French, created a stable government, and fought the Napoleonic wars of Europe.

If it should take 10 years for Russia to do so, it would be no more than history repeating itself. From the Caucasian member of the Greek Catholic Church in western Russia to the Mohammedan on the eastern end of her wide domain, to those of Slavic and of Tartar blood, with an infinite number of nationalities within her border, with many strange tongues that jangle when they meet to consider the common welfare, it would be no more than historic to suppose that they will not create stable government in Russia until they have spent the time that the French—a highly civilized and homogenous people—spent to frame a stable government, at last to lodge it in the hands of Napoleon.

Suppose that happens. Suppose, before peace and stability and strength come to Russia, that 10 years shall have passed away, what does it mean to us? It means that during that time we must either conquer the nations with which we are at war or we must engage in a continual warfare for that period, because it is unthinkable that we will permit them to conquer us and our allies. So, instead of tripping serenely along with appropriations of this kind, Mr. President, it seems to me that we might consider saving five million or ten million out of the $27,000,000 that are specifically appropriated in this bill. We might even hesitate on the new surveys that are ordered; and, as I remember the bill now, the new surveys in the aggregate provide $200,000. If it stopped with the $200,000, no one probably could complain. It is coming to such small figures that to mention it almost exposes one to criticism. It makes him a subject of satire to get down to hundreds of thousands after dealing with such immense figures as are customary in revenue and appropriation bills here. But we might save amounts running into some millions of dollars by halting the new enterprises contemplated by the surveys to be made under this $200,000 appropriation. The surveys are the prolific mother of millions of appropriations in future years.

These new enterprises are not now connected with the national defense. As I have taken occasion to remark on several occasions here, unless government moves faster than most Government enterprises do, the war will have ended before the blue prints are made, even, on which any of these improvements could be started.

I see a map hanging on the walls of the Senate Chamber of the coastal waterway improvements, and I look at it in view of the inscriptions that are printed on it. It is like everything else I have seen—"inland waterways and national defense." Yes; it is just like it always is on the Fourth of July. Everybody can enthuse and yell himself hoarse and rupture his vocal cords, Mr. President, supporting the Old Flag and liberal appropriations, especially when he is a candidate for another term. The two always go together. The scheme is something before which the corrupt-practices act becomes a palsied imbecile.

About what time will we defend ourselves by any scheme of intercoastal canals or waterways provided in this map? How will we take the helmet off of a single Prussian officer by any of these waterway appropriations? What spendthrift folly! It will be five years, I repeat, before even the blue prints of those improvements are ready for a contractor or for Government operations.

I never saw as many things under the guise of national defense in my life. If it were not a sober subject, I would treat it with some levity. I must restrain my natural tendency to see the ridiculous side of things, because this is too grave a matter to provoke a smile upon.

I have received in my correspondence a number of communications from Cincinnati, from the Joseph Fels Foundation. Mr. Fels was the gentleman who discovered Fels-Naphtha soap, which carried out the scriptural injunction of becoming godly by being cleanly. The soap found a ready sale. He became quite opulent before he passed across the Great Divide. He left a very large fund mostly devoted to a crusade known as the single tax. Converts can always be found when there is a pay roll attached to a fund of that kind, and it is not surprising that a number of eminent gentlemen have become impressed with the solidity of the single-tax principle. They are always visible about any belief that is able to "pay the freight" on the lecture platform. Right now is the opportunity of those distinguished gentlemen who are drawing their daily bread from the Joseph Fels Foundation to urge single tax as their particular method of public defense. So there are letters coming out day after day and week after week about the beauties of the single tax.

"Why," they say, "there is so much unoccupied land. If we are going to raise food, we must cultivate the land. As long as land is held for speculation, either in the city limits or outside, there will be no cultivation; and so the right way to conserve our resources and increase the food supply is to enforce the single tax. Tax the land and then you will drive it into some kind of use."

This is, in brief, the entire backbone of Henry George. It is a principle that was first developed in metropolitan districts. It came from European cities. It came to New York. Its greatest living exponent in America in his lifetime was Henry George. The principle applied to the ground rents and the 999-year leases in New York and Chicago seems to promise relief; so they have found listeners. It will break up, it is claimed, all the concentrated value in the "Loop" in Chicago and in the congested business portions of New York City. It will nationalize the land titles by imposing all of the burdens of taxation upon the land. It is a principle born of the miasma of a great city.

The men who never see daylight except the filtered, bleached-out ray of sunshine in the great canyons of the office buildings, who breathe sewer gas, live on prepared, predigested foods, and do not know what a corn pone tastes like are the men, naturally, that obtain a lopsided, unhealthy view of life, and consequently they embrace the single tax. They do not think the laws of nature have anything to do with people. Everything is artificial with them. They live on the curbstone. They are cliff dwellers in the large office buildings; they travel to and from their homes by artificial vehicles and have so little leg and lung power they could not run half a mile or climb a tree without dropping exhausted, and naturally they forget that old Mother Nature's laws are of eternal operation. It is well to remember that those laws will be in operation after the streets of New York and Chicago are crumbling dust and their mighty trade palaces have been swept to the four corners of the earth by its winds. They forget all that, and they run after these artificial ideas of the single tax, by which they will cure everything; and they have gotten down to the point now where they propose to join with Mr. Hoover and conquer Germany with the single tax.

The single tax is just what we need not only to conserve our present food supply but to produce a great deal more of it, and that is one of the fads that come along as a part of our preparedness program. We have with it more schemes for Government ownership than I ever saw before—Government ownership of steam railways, of traction companies, of street cars, of gas, electric lights, hydroelectric plants, steamship lines, steamboats, manufactured products, everything that can contribute to food, clothing, or shelter for the human family and supply the three great primary wants of our people. All those come along, and I have at different intervals received communications advocating Government ownership of all the various enterprises I have suggested.

Not only these Government-ownership plans, but I have from my friends the scheme known as the socialistic state. It has been stated that we are engaged in a great war and we must utilize all our resources, we must be unanimous, our people must not divide, the middleman is a source of weakness, he produces nothing, he adds extortion to the ultimate consumer, he ought to go to something else that is more productive in character. I have heard all that. I have read it all in the correspondence that comes to me. So they argue that the socialistic state is the ideal state of society to put us in a proper war condition.

Then we have up here on the map these inland waterways, and national defense the same way. Everything is masquerading under the plea that it is needed for national defense. All we need to do is to adopt it and we will instantly grow strong and reach the stature of giants, and other nations will walk about under our huge legs and inquire what meat we feed on that we have grown so great, if we just adopt any one of these things.

The singular thing that inspires some doubt in my mind is that each one of the disciples believes in his fad, says that his is the only one that will produce the result, and when I compare notes on the various propaganda presented to me I have made up my mind that some one or all of them must be mistaken. They can not all be right. The situation is enough almost to resurrect Mulberry Sellers. A man can not have fifty-odd kinds of salvation; there is only one kind for him, and then when he finds that kind he does not need any more. The problem for us is to single out that particular salvation. It is not in the river and harbor bill. Running through the river and harbor bill is a sort of undercurrent, every once in a while a sort of claim, that in this condition created in the latter part of the bill, the new section of it by the Senate committee, that all of it is connected with the national defense. The indefensible parts of this bill are no more connected with the national defense than the last doctor bill I paid.

It may all be very remotely connected with the national defense. The healthier I can keep my person and my family the better off we are and the stronger we are and the more taxes I can afford to pay to the Government. Everything of that character is connected with the national defense, but it is so remote and inconsequential that it can not properly be made the subject matter of legislation.

Col. Townsend made a statement before the supporters of the river and harbor bill in 1916 in November, which I shall read. It was to that that I was directing my remarks awhile ago and what I have said is preliminary and introductory to his statement. I first read the following:

> The chief topic under discussion was a plan to obtain Government aid in completing levees between Rock Island and Cairo. This can be done, according to statements made at the meeting, with $4,690,000. It was pointed out that $60,000,000 has been appropriated by the Government for work south of Cairo and a very small amount for the river north of Cairo. It was decided to ask the next session of Congress to appropriate $1,000,000 a year for this work.

This is from the proceedings of the supporters of the river and harbor bill in November, 1916. Against this I now read the statement of Col. Townsend. He says:

Specifically the writer would not abandon any navigable stream in the Mississippi Valley that nas been partially improved, but would leave 58 of them in their statu quo, confining operations to snagging and the maintenance of existing works and would concentrate appropriations on opening up a channel of the capacity of that existing on the lower and middle Mississippi to Chicago and Pittsburgh * * *.

If the facilities thus afforded by the Government are utilized, the upper Mississippi and the Missouri Rivers should then receive attention.

Here are some of the tables of the upper Mississippi showing their traffic. For the year 1915 there is a table; amount in tons 1,883,608, of a value of $52,000,000. That embraces everything from brick and brush for the Government, sand and dredging, down to wood and miscellaneous. For instance, in this is 3,186 tons of hay. The average haul on a ton of hay was 4.95 miles, less than 5 miles. Live stock, 39,968 tons. The total average of the haul was 1.4 miles, a very short haul. It shows that the transportation is little. The live-stock freight, an average of 1.4 miles, indicates that there is no general traffic, nothing that opens up the stretches of the river to any considerable length.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. KENYON. The traffic the Senator speaks of as being for a mile and a quarter is practically just across the river, is it not?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. KENYON. They put that in to make a showing of commerce.

Mr. SHERMAN. That, in 1915, included ferriage.

Mr. KENYON. Just as in another case they put in cargoes in freight yards that are transported across one of the rivers to make a good showing in commerce.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; such practices are inexcusable. In later tables the ferry traffic, for instance, at one point, I think it is the Ohio River, is half a mile, on an average. All the ferry traffic carried in ferryboats on the different parts of the Ohio is included in the earlier tables. In the later tables the traffic by ferryboats is separated and put in a different tabulation, but this one of 1915 includes all the ferryboat traffic. So it seems to me that the traffic is of that inconsequential kind that does not justify an appropriation of these sums of money. Ferryboats do not need any appropriation. They are run by private enterprise all the way up and down the Mississippi and Ohio Rivers. It is a local travel and a local transportation of freight. Necessarily, unless a ferryboat plies between points where there is a great ebb and flow of trade, their business is confined to nothing more than local travel, with an occasional through travel as it comes along going to some distant point.

The Chief of Engineers in a table which he gives of the season of navigation of 1913, opened March 15 and closed November 30, says:

Deducting from the above table sand and 11,159 tons of ties and wood barged about 10 miles, leaves 24,000 tons of questionable commerce for which the Chief of Engineers gives $1,000,000 in 1915, or over $40 per ton 1913 expense for the waterway, including maintenance and interest on prior expenditures.

I want to quote here what Senator Burton said in March, 1915, in which opposition was made to a like bill by Senator Burton and his colleagues. He said:

You may spend $20,000,000—yes, $30,000,000—on this project, and in spite of that enormous amount the traffic will diminish, because you are facing a condition that no policy of river improvement can reverse—the loss of that class of river traffic and the utilization of other agencies for the carrying of freight. I wish it were not so, * * * but I am tired of "rainbow chasing," and that is what this is. It is much worse than "rainbow chasing"; it is pure, bald, unmitigated waste.

There are other tables, but I do not care to insert them in my remarks, because I want to be as economical of time as I can. We are reminded many times that Congress is delaying everything; that we are consuming a great deal of time talking. I gathered from much reading of the press last night and this morning that the best way to govern this country would be for Congress to pass a general act turning over all governmental functions, other than the Supreme Court possibly, to the President and the editors of the country. That would so simplify these processes. I doubt very much whether Senators can spend more time talking than editors do writing editorials. I would pit the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD against the average editorial columns of the country for composition, for sense, and for general utility on governmental questions.

I would take my chances on being annihilated by offended editors. I know something of their craft; and, really, Mr. President, they breathe the same air and eat the same food and have exactly the same kind of gray matter inside their pericraniums that we do. The only thing is they own a newspaper in which they can be heard every day. You can hear an editor every morning. If some of them only wrote three editorials a year and condensed what they say and meditated much in their closets about what they were going to say, it would improve the editorials mightily, because it is diluted so until, like many other things, it loses its savor.

We are told here that we are wasting a great deal of time. What would we be doing if we were not talking about the river and harbor bill to-day? I just ask all who are present—out of the 96 potential Senators who are here, constructively, and usefully absent, only a few of whom ever stay—what we would be doing if we were not talking about the river and harbor bill.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. KENYON. Could we not be meditating on the methods of raising more taxes to cover such bills as this?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes.

Mr. KENYON. Would not that be a good thing?

Mr. SHERMAN. That is a very pertinent inquiry and one that will be very practical before we march much further in the procession of things, because the Secretary of the Treasury has told us that with the new army we must raise he must have five billion more dollars. The five billion must come from some place. It will not drop down from above, but it must be drawn from below, from the visible resources of the taxpayer. We shall have to get into his pocket some way.

While angry gentlemen outside, some of whom are private citizens and some of whom are editors, will to-morrow and in the near future tell us that we are wasting time to-day in talking about the river and harbor bill, I anticipate that about all the river and harbor bill has been yesterday and to-day is a wind shield for the revenue bill. Nobody knows how to write a revenue bill yet, because every time the men begin to touch their toes on the bottom of the financial deeps along comes the department and says "Give us a few more billions, please." It is easy, of course, when we know how much they want, but nobody can tell yet how much we must raise.

I had a letter the other day from a high-class gentleman living in New York City. He said if we prohibitionists went on just a little further we would bankrupt and ruin the country. He said you can not expect people to fight without a little stimulant. The Germans are beer drinkers, and just see how they fight. The moral of it is, get drunk and conquer the world. Somehow it does not produce on me the effect it ought. I believe, all things being equal, if I had to engage in a combat I would rather fight with a drunken man than a sober one. I think when the fire in the furnace went out he would weaken. We are told on all these matters that we are delaying, that it has held up the food bill, that it may hinder in the revenue bill.

If the river and harbor bill had not been before the Senate yesterday and to-day there would have been no revenue bill to consider. What would we have done? All we could have furnished to the country would have been a horrible example of an idle Senate. Or we might talk about a corrupt-practices act. We could regulate people who run for office with a barrel, but after it all is summed up, whether it be the corrupt-practices act or whether it be the revenue act in contemplation here, the revenue act is not out and the other matters are not ones of pressing importance. Reforming the election laws could not be, because there are no elections until 1918 of a national character and the local ones we have nothing to do with.

So this clamor about the delay of Congress fills the public press. Opening my letters, I find the same thing this morning—some from my constituents and some from other States—saying "Quit consuming time in Congress by your eternal talk." The President could telephone the leaders what to do in a few minutes.

If the chairman of the Committee on Finance were here I would be moved to inquire whether he knows to-day just how, if he could write a revenue bill, he would report it in this body for sober deliberation. This is in the last days of July and by the 1st of September we might, if we had the bill out, in the ordinary course of forensic dispute get some kind of legislation if we knew how much we wanted. But if the gentlemen on the Russian front are not fortunate in rallying the broken lines, and the German drive goes on, England will likely ask for from two and a half to three billion dollars more money. We shall conscript more soldiers; we shall levy new taxes; we shall have to make good what has been lost on the Russian front. Nobody can yet tell just how much money we must raise by the revenue bill. It is possible that there will be other commissions from other lands here before the snow flies asking for additional loans. We all hope that on Germany's east front there will be better news, but the hope may be fallacious. It is better for us in the long run to prepare for the struggle. When the revenue bill comes out on the floor of the Senate, I anticipate all other legislation will stand aside. We shall take it up and we shall prepare ourselves for a reasonable discussion.

On the subject of delay, I wish to comment on the House of Representatives, in which originates all money bills. Anything in the nature of the exercise of a taxing power must come from the House. I am not saying this in a critical mood at all; I am saying it in reply to the statement that the Senate delays legislation. There has not been a solitary piece of legislation come here to the Senate from the House that has not been improved by the deliberations in the Senate. The House hews it in the rough—and sometimes it is tolerably rough—they send it over here; they expect us to modify it, to perfect it. I do not blame them; they have to pass through the alembic of an election every two years. I would not serve in the other House myself—I have not time. I would not be continually engaged in primary fights, for nobody in Illinois ever gets a nomination without a primary fight. It is worse than the election.

The House is disposed to take the easy side of legislation. They send these bills over here with the expectation that the Senate can spend more time on them than they can, because only one-third of us go out every two years; the other two-thirds have some four and some six years to serve, and naturally they can stand in front of an agitation that may look threatening to-day and which a year from now is forgotten in the light of experience. So we in our deliberations here attend to the perfecting of some of the legislation which would never pass the other House in that form if they knew that it would be final and was to go into the statutes of the country. That much we know; that much we have learned to expect, and that much we are doing here in these deliberations.

I have not forgotten even our good President—whom we all revere, though in domestic affairs we criticize him, as we have a right to do, but whom we all respect in his handling of the momentous foreign problems that are now falling to his lot—even he said, as I have quoted here, I think, once before, that the discussions in the Senate and the long deliberations there were a very great benefit in the legislation of the country. In substance, that is found on a page of his book called "The New Freedom," and it recognizes the fact that the Senate is a council of revision. It is what it was intended to be. It may be less of that under the direct election of Senators than it was under the old way. It may be that we think about our constituents, with the direct election, with a little keener understanding than if we were relegated to the legislatures, as in the old days, but it is recognized that the delays in the Senate, such as debating the river and harbor bill, debating the food-control bill, debating revenue bills, are all of them in the nature of a deliberation that promises revision and improvement. Having that in mind, it seems to me, we are following out our legitimate functions here, what our forefathers intended when they created this body.

There are things in this bill that if I were engaged in a filibuster, Mr. President, I would take up in turn—some 400 items, I believe, altogether—and I would be moved to analyze them as they deserve. Some of them are meritorious; some are matters of indifference, involving comparatively small sums, some are ridiculous, and some are contemptible; so small that if it were in private life, without this solemnizing process of legislation, they would remind one of petit larceny, almost, because it is money thrown away without any possible good accomplished and the evil example remains.

There is a place, which has been referred to by the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], where there was not even water enough to promise navigation, where there was a 10-inch depth in a state of nature and a 20-inch depth after improvement; some place where facetiously, in some hearing before the Committee on Commerce or some other place, I have read where the suggestion was made that artesian wells be dug at the source of the river so as to increase the flow of water. Well, that will be improved. There will come a dry year. This year there is a reasonably good rainfall throughout the United States; all of the watersheds are giving up copiously that desired element; but some time a dry season will come along, and we shall have to have a sprinkling cart at some of these rivers to sprinkle the river bed in order to put down the dust when an investigating committee goes out to look at them. Otherwise, it will be very disagreeable.

There are some of these places as to which I am moved to read from an abstract that it seemed to me the statement of what they do ordinarily would be enough, but it is like old John Barleycorn, it survives year after year; "the wrecks of matter, and the crush of worlds," to use the poet's language, have no effect on them; they flourish in immortal youth. They may be down this year, but they will be up next year; and they will always come back. I intend to read now, not from somebody's statement but from the sober hearings before committees of Congress, which is set forth in public documents. I shall read now as to a place known as Toms River, in the neighboring State of New Jersey:

> Toms River is located on one of the principal automobile lines of travel. Suitable depth to the river would increase this traffic owing to the ease with which owners could communicate with their yachts at this point.

If I were inclined to be demagogical——

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KIRBY in the chair). Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. May I ask from what the Senator from Illinois is reading?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will give the Senator the number of the document. It is Document No. 346 of the Sixtieth Congress, first session, and I am reading from page 4 of Engineer Flagler's statement.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. As I understand, that is with reference to the Toms River improvement?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Again reading from Flagler's testimony in document 388, page 5, which is another hearing, referring to Cold Spring Inlet, he says:

> A good harbor would permit a resumption of the yacht races that were at one time sailed at Cape May and formed the most attractive event of the season.

Nearly a million dollars have been spent there, including what would be spent if the item of this bill should be allowed. Those are two subjects that are worthy of consideration, especially to the men who are not accessible by automobile road to their yachts and those who can not go and put up a friendly wager by way of interest on the yacht races.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I would be perfectly willing that Cold Spring Harbor should be used as an example, provided the statements made by the Senator from Illinois and those made yesterday by the Senator from Iowa were accurate. Cold Spring Harbor is now being used by the United States Government as a harbor to shelter some of its war vessels. At the present time the cruiser Chicago is there. The harbor is as large as New York Harbor from the Battery to Twenty-first Street; has a depth of 30 feet; and the channel has a depth of from 18 to 20 feet.

There are there now, I believe, a thousand or more men of the Naval Reserve, and the Government contemplates using that harbor as a submarine base and the shores around it as an aviation station. In addition to that, Mr. Ford has purchased a large tract of land on the opposite side of the harbor for the purpose of building a factory and using the harbor as an avenue of transportation for the manufactured articles to be made in that factory. I think the Senator is somewhat inaccurate when he ridicules the project for the improvement of that harbor as not being an advantageous development for the Government.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator says the channel now has a depth of 18 feet. An ocean-going ship draws about 28 feet as a minimum, and may draw more. It will take, then, at least 10 feet additional to make the harbor available. Besides, I am merely reading what some engineer says about it.

Thursday, July 26, 1917.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I hope to bring my remarks to a very speedy conclusion. I was making some comments about certain of the improvements upon the New Jersey coast at the time of the recess last night. The junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] spoke of the Cold Spring Inlet as being a point in which contemplated improvements relating to the public defense were to be made. I had no information of that kind, and it will be in order when the Senator has the floor to explain it in detail. If, as he has stated, it is to be made the base of a submarine station, I would be very glad to withdraw any criticism of this item. He stated that the depth is now 18 feet. It would require a considerable increase of depth to be utilized for that or similar purposes or to permit ocean-going ships to use it as a harbor.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President——
Mr. SHERMAN. I yield to the Senator.
Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The Senator is referring to the Cold Spring Harbor at the lower end of New Jersey?
Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.
Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I understand that the basis of his remarks is a criticism of the depth of the channel at the present time. Repeating what I said yesterday regarding the harbor, I wish to say, in addition, that I find the channel leading into this harbor at present has a depth at high tide of 24 to 28 feet; that it is now being used by the Navy as a base for the cruisers and small boats used by the naval reserves; that they consider this harbor of great advantage at this time to protect Philadelphia; that they are contemplating building an aviation field there, and using this harbor as a submarine base; and that it is available for all cruisers now used in coast defense.

The statement of the Assistant Secretary of the Navy to me this morning was that there are at the present time some 2,000 naval reserves there, and that they consider it of great value as one of the means of defense of Philadelphia and Delaware Bay, because it is essential that the submarines and cruisers defending the coast should be at the mouth of the bay and not within the bay.

I feel that, while possibly in the past the use of this harbor for merchant-marine purposes might be questionable, at this time, when the whole system of naval warfare has changed, when the battleship has been abandoned and the small submarine chaser and the submarine have come into use as an effective means of coast defense, this harbor development at the lower end of New Jersey, the only harbor for 150 miles along the coast, the only harbor between New York Bay and Delaware Bay, is of great value to the Navy and to the defense of that section of the eastern coast. At the present time they are building cantonments and they are considering the location of from five to ten thousand naval reserves and marines in that section.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President——
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Idaho?
Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.
Mr. BRADY. May I ask the Senator from New Jersey if there has been any late report made by the engineers in reference to the harbor he speaks of?
Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Within the past three months, and I have a bill pending at the present time appropriating money for the purchase of an aviation field there which the Navy desires very much. Two Senators in this body as a subcommittee of the Naval Affairs Committee have investigated that location, and the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] told me that he considers the harbor to be one of great value.
Mr. SHERMAN. I am glad the Senator has added to the record of what he said on this the information. On page 7, lines 14 to 16, are the items in which this harbor is contained:

Cold Spring and Absecon Inlets, Absecon and Tuckerton Creeks, and Toms River, N. J.: For maintenance, $35,000.

How much of it will be devoted to increasing the depth of Cold Spring Inlet would be in the discretion of the Board of Engineers. It would, of the $35,000, be possible to expend the whole of it, providing the other points for improvement were entirely deprived of funds. Otherwise the power of appropriating money is vested in the Board of Army Engineers. Whatever could be properly used for deepening the harbor, if it is to be made a place for the public defense, I would not oppose, but how much is to be used is a matter of discretion with the river and harbor engineers.
Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Utah?
Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.
Mr. SMOOT. Was the Senator from Illinois referring to the Cold Spring Inlet of New Jersey?
Mr. SHERMAN. I was referring to Toms River. I read it in the item, but I have said nothing about it at this time. I did not connect that in any statement I made about the Cold Spring Inlet.
Mr. SMOOT. I think the Senate ought to know what the Cold Spring Inlet is; what it is asking money for; and if Congress appropriates the money, what the result will be. I hope the Senator will give it, for I know that he has the information.
Mr. SHERMAN. If out of this $35,000 any part of it were expended on Toms River, I think it would be a waste of so much of the funds.
Mr. SMOOT. The Senator knows that Col. Flagler stated in Document 388, at page 5:

It would permit a resumption of the yacht races that were at one time sailed at Cape May and formed the most attractive event of the season.

That is what nearly $1,000,000 was spent for; and the project is again appropriated for in this bill.
Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois allow me to interrupt him?
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Florida?
Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.
Mr. FLETCHER. The Toms River is not estimated for, and does not share in the appropriation. The estimate is for Cold Spring and Absecon Inlets, $30,000, and Absecon and Tuckerton Creeks, $5,000, making up the $35,000 estimate. Toms River is not estimated for, and would not share in any of this appropriation at all, unless there would be some accidental filling up or something of that kind, in which case they might apply a dredge for a day or so to open it up, if the engineers found it advisable to do so.
Mr. SMOOT. What I stated referred to the Cold Spring Inlet and not to Toms River, although Toms River is included, as the Senator says, in the appropriation asked for of $35,000 under the provisions of the bill; and if the engineers wanted to spend all of the sum on Toms River, they could spend it on that, or they could spend it on Cold Spring if they so desired.
Mr. FLETCHER. They could not do that because the estimate is for the Absecon Inlet, $30,000. They could not divert that fund to Toms River. As to that inlet the statistics for 1915 show that the value of the tonnage for 1915 was $3,025,105.67.
Mr. SHERMAN. However, when we get the new legislation in this form, the power will be vested in the Board of Engineers in such a way that it will not be controlled by any presentation of evidence before the committee or any recommendations made. The law will be a finality. When it is once enacted by Congress, discretionary power will be vested in the Board of Engineers to use any part of the $35,000 that will be appropriated for the Toms River. Even if it were confined to that, I do not think the Toms River, from any evidence that I can discover, is a proper place for public expenditure. According to Document 346 of the Sixtieth Congress, first session, when a very full report was made on it by Engineer Flagler:

It is located on one of the principal automobile lines of travel. A suitable depth of river would increase its traffic owing to the ease with which owners could communicate with their yachts at this point.

The commerce in 1914—and that is the basis on which we make this appropriation—was 92 tons. In 1915 it showed an increase to 4,990 tons. As to whether in 1916–17 any increase was shown we have no available figures at this time.

I wish when it comes to the matter of these inland waterways, whether connected in part with tidewater or whether entirely fresh-water inland waterways, to refer to one very large undertaking as a basis for estimating what some of these new projects would be worth. Some years ago a number of enthusiastic gentlemen in the Mississippi Valley conceived that there would be very great benefit if Chicago were joined with the Mississippi River. Surveys were made. The geological deposits were examined, and it was found that a limestone bench that acts as a watershed between the Mississippi River Valley on the west and the Great Lakes could be cut out. The expense was estimated, and so the Illinois and Mississippi Canal was projected. The first appropriations were made at a very early time, away back in August, 1882. Now, it is about 35 years ago since the initial appropriation was made for this project. It lies entirely in my own State.

There is another canal, known as the Illinois and Michigan Canal, that connected the Chicago River with the Illinois River. It was a land-grant concern. This Government made a considerable land grant for the purpose of aiding in the construction of the canal. It began away back in 1848. It had some misfortunes, but finally it was completed. It operated for a time, until steam-road development made it suffer the fate of all other waterways in that section of the country.

So we have two very large object lessons in my own State of the construction of inland waterways. They were both built under as favorable conditions as would be possible on any of the inland waterways. The Illinois and Michigan Canal began in 1848 and followed the development of the country. The Illinois and Mississippi Canal began in 1882 after the country was fully developed.

Those two great enterprises, as they were hoped to be, exist under as favorable conditions as any inland waterways away from tidewater in this country. There is a great agricultural country about them. The five primary food grains of the world find some of their largest areas of production within the carrying area of those canals. The second largest commercial manufacturing and collecting point for merchandise in the Western Hemisphere is found within the same area of those canals. The greatest river in the Western Hemisphere for commercial purposes inland is found in the same area. The tributaries of those rivers are likewise of the same kind. The steam road transportation and the interurban electric lines that can bring freight to favorable points for water shipment are found under the most favorable conditions within the same area.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to ask the Senator a question. Perhaps he has already stated the answer to it; but my attention was diverted, and I did not hear him. Of what canals is the Senator speaking?

Mr. SHERMAN. I am speaking now of two canals—one known as the Illinois and Michigan Canal, an old canal, which was begun in 1848. The other is known as the Illinois and Mississippi Canal, the first appropriation for which was made in 1882, and it was open, I think, for traffic about 1912 or 1913, along there some time.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator give us the terminii of those two canals? I want to know just where they begin and where they end, how long they are, and how much they have cost.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir. The Illinois and Michigan Canal begins at the south branch of the Chicago River. The Chicago River is made up of the north and south branches joining a considerable distance west of the Rush Street Bridge. The South Branch ran down and made the point that connected the Illinois and Michigan Canal with the Illinois River. From that point south it extended past the city of Joliet and the Desplaines River, taking its water from the Desplaines River until it reached the Illinois River. This early canal, begun in 1848, was a land-grant canal. There was considerable help given by the Government in the way of a land grant; I am unable to say from memory how much in actual value; but the canal was constructed and still is in partial operation. I am unable to say how much it has cost. I went into that matter with some detail one winter, spending the greater part of the winter in examining it in connection with a legislative investigation, but I can not say offhand now, without referring to the manuscript that I have at home, what the total cost was, but it ran up into some millions of dollars. As my recollection goes now, nearly $20,000,000 were ultimately expended on this canal. There were over $15,000,000 in actual appropriations, and afterwards some income was used.

Mr. NORRIS. What is the length of the canal?

Mr. SHERMAN. That canal is probably 90 to 95 miles long, estimating it roughly.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, with its connection with the river of which the Senator speaks, it connected the Great Lakes with the Mississippi River, did it not?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; it connected the Great Lakes, and might have served the traffic that would go by way of Chicago and be diverted south to the Illinois Valley and to the Mississippi.

Mr. NORRIS. Is that the canal that runs parallel with the Rock Island Railroad?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. NORRIS. What is the tonnage on that canal now?

Mr. SHERMAN. Practically nothing.

Mr. NORRIS. The Government still maintains it?

Mr. SHERMAN. The State maintains it; but the traffic has reached a point where it is negligible. Grains are barged down the river and some up; some merchandise of a seasonal character is carried, but not much. A good deal of crushed rock, materials for cement making, and lime are carried, but, compared with the volume of traffic that goes up and down the Illinois and Mississippi Rivers, it is an infinitesimal part; it is a negligible factor in the freight problem of that section.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator why, in his judgment, it is that this waterway connecting the Great Lakes with the Mississippi River, constructed at such an enormous expense, has not been utilized? What is the reason that there has been no use made of this canal?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is because of the superior facilities offered by the steam roads that cover all species of transportation in every area that could be affected by water transportation.

Mr. NORRIS. It certainly runs through one of the best portions of the United States.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; the conditions are admirable.

Mr. NORRIS. It connects some quite large cities also.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know of no other canal, Mr. President, outside of the Erie Canal in New York State and its connections, that has advantages at all comparable to those possessed by these two canals.

The Illinois and Michigan Canal is owned by the State. The State since 1870 has had a railroad and warehouse commission that has controlled all strictly intrastate rates. The only time that we have had any interference is within the last two or three months, when the Interstate Commerce Commission made a ruling that was taken advantage of by the railroads and others acting in behalf of the steam roads, by which the 2-cent fare and, impliedly, all intrastate freights will be raised. The passenger fare was raised from 2 cents a mile to 2.4 cents a mile. Governmental interference with rates here at Washington has had the same effect that it has had in connection with coal.

I think in central and southern Illinois as great a tonnage of soft coal is produced as in any other place in the country, not even excepting Pennsylvania possibly. The bituminous coal goes from that district to all the manufacturing plants in the Mississippi Valley. There are veins of coal in that region that can be very profitably mined. I have seen borings when the prospector first put down a shaft showing a vein 14 feet thick. That was in southern Illinois. Coal found in veins of that thickness, of course, can be very profitably mined. The thicker the vein, of course the less the expense of mining.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Illinois if it is not true that there is now a project on foot for the State of Illinois to spend something like $20,000,000 in the deepening of the channel of the Illinois River, in order to facilitate the handling of traffic?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will get to that in a moment. I do not desire to take much more time than I can help. I desire to conclude as to the coal question.

The bituminous-coal operators came to Washington and had a conference. They were authorized to fix the price of coal at the mine. The price of domestic coal was fixed, according to a circular I have, at $3.75 a ton. In the same conference they agreed that all the jobbers would be allowed 25 cents a ton for handling. I presume it is generally understood that you and I can not go to any of the principal coal operators in that section of the country, or in any other of which I know, and buy a single carload of coal. The operators do not engage in the retail trade. They sell the output of their mine to jobbers. They limit the commission of the jobber to 25 cents per ton. In Illinois the jobbers turn it over to the coal merchant and the consumer buys from the coal merchant. What he pays above $3.75 a ton, with the 25 cents commission of the jobber added, making $4 a ton, marks the profit made by the coal merchant in selling to him. If the coal costs a man $6.50 a ton, it means that $2.50 will go to the local coal merchant with whom he is in effect compelled to deal.

The Government so far, in dealing with the coal question, has done just what it has done with the railroad question in my State. Every time an order has been made, every time a conference has been held in this Capital, it has resulted in every instance in an advance in the price of the commodity or of the service over that prescribed by local regulations. I presume it looks small to the Government; I presume the Government looks at it in a much larger way; but the result is that the operator and the railway get the benefit of the Government interference. The consumer does not get any benefit out of it; certainly he has not done so up to this time, so far as I can see.

If the food-control bill operates as the efforts named and the pure-food bill of 1906 operated, it will work in just the same way. The pure-food bill did not give us any purer food in my section of the country than we got before under State regulation. All it did was to enable the food manufacturer to put a highly ornamental label on the bottle or the package, which contained printed matter of a highly laudatory character, reciting that the article was manufactured and sent into commerce under the auspices of the pure food and drugs act; but I got more unpalatable food with that fancy label on it after the law was passed in 1906 than I ever did before. At that time my habitat was a lunch counter. I was living then on the curbstone in the larger cities. I spent a good deal of time on the road and I know something about the character of the food that was put out for the consuming public to use under the pure-food act. My doubts about the efficiency of Federal legislation to benefit the ultimate consumer are based upon experience, not upon any mere theoretical argument that might be offered in this Chamber.

The junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] inquired about our $20,000,000 enterprise. In 1908 we developed the mania, just like everybody else gets it. Whole communities and countries at times are just like infants emerging from the kindergarten. They are subject to all sorts of epidemics; among the complaints they get—a sort of a governmental mumps and measles and whooping cough—is periodically to take a notion that they can lift themselves over the fence by pulling on their boot straps and become rich by spending their own money.

We had it away back in 1827 in Illinois, when there was a series of internal improvements projected on which we spent $14,000,000, in a State that had only been in the Union nine years, and the debt stayed there for nearly 40 years. The members of the legislature, just as in the case of the food-control bill here when it was up, said, "Oh, it is an internal improvement scheme; we must be for it." I have an old certificate of it yet, finely engraved, with a vessel, full rigged, sailing down through the prairie of Illinois. It looks like an ocean-going sailing vessel in the old days that used to go from the coast of Maine across the ocean or around the Horn. I have that certificate yet. It calls for one share of stock in this improvement association. At no time since it was issued has its value ever changed. Its sole value is as a souvenir and a work of art. As a financial investment it represents nothing except the unfulfilled promises of the promoters.

That has nothing to do with the Illinois-Michigan Canal; but in later years you would think that communities would be immune from fresh attacks. One of the kindly offices that nature performs for us is that after we have a contagious disease ordinarily we are impervious to future attacks; but communities are not that way. In 1908 we had another attack, and we voted a constitutional amendment to spend $20,000,000 to realize the picture on this printed certificate I have described. They had the same epidemic again, because all of those that had paid the bills and indulged in this wild-goose chase of 1827 were dead.

It is one of the discouraging things attached to the human family and the highway of progress that financially and on schemes of that kind we never have any memory or history; and so the disease took us again. Both parties had their conventions and inserted resounding planks in their platforms. I compared one of the planks in the Republican platform with the records of the Illinois Legislature in 1827 and it was exactly the same kind of a complaint that they had. Experience does no good; taxpayers' outcries do no good; they had the same disease again, and it may cost $20,000,000 before they get through with it, unless some of us can head it off.

I have always stated publicly, when I was asked, that I was against it, although both parties—and even the Socialists—indorsed it. I think we have rudimentary vestiges of all the political parties on earth in that country. Everybody indorsed it. I did not say anything against it except when I was asked. Once in a while some hardened miscreant among my friends would ask if I was for the waterway improvement, and I always said "No." I voted against it, and said I intended to vote against it, and I did when I went into the polling places in the precinct where I lived. I never had any apologies for my attitude. I know what those things mean. But it passed, and was just like a good many things I see around this Chamber; it was a nice thing on paper, but statesmen who had practical friends began to write bills, after the amendment was adopted, at the ensuing session of the legislature, to spend the $20,000,000, and immediately various schisms arose. Divers schools of internal improvement began each to pursue his favorite phantoms.

There were the deep-waterway advocates, to which several Members of Congress fell victims. By some sort of a hallucination that I never was able to understand, they thought that a deep waterway was 14 feet deep. Now, where they got the 14 feet, the deponent saith not. I never could find it anywhere on the face of the earth, but it was 14 feet. They said nothing was deep unless it was 14 feet deep. "Well," I said, "if water is 8 feet deep, it is deep enough for me, if I can not swim and I am in it, because I am only a little lacking 6 feet tall." But they got the 14-foot depth started, and there was a school of that kind that went merrily about over the country making the welkin ring with their clamors for a great waterway. I noticed the contractors in the audience always started the applause. Then there were the little-waterway people that said 8 feet was enough, and they were ridiculed universally as a band of unprogressive gentlemen who were conservative to the point of inanition. I was regarded as one of them and a lamentable sample of a statesman who had petrified in his tracks.

We said: "Eight feet is enough, because the Mississippi River is only 8 feet deep, and when you get your commerce going down toward St. Louis, after you get out of the Illinois River Valley, you can not barge anything or run any water craft on the river that draws more than 8 feet." At the chain of rocks below St. Louis there is an 8-foot limit. It has been there ever since 1811, 106 years ago. There was then the New Madrid earthquake. The earthquake tore up the earth considerably in that part of the country, and, among other things, it heaved up the bottom of the Mississippi River and made this projecting chain of rocks that now stands as a barrier to an increased depth until it is blown out. It will take about as much money to blow that out as it will, according to a circular I received from an enthusiastic New York City gentleman, to "blow the hell out of Hell Gate." You remember that came to all your desks. I do not suppose he meant it to be profane. Nevertheless, it sounds that way when it is repeated by a profane historian.

Eight feet was said to be enough. Well, I belong to the latter school, because I thought: "If you are going to have the disease, get it in as mild a form as possible," and I would rather have 8 feet of it than to have 14 feet. So the controversy grew apace. I was over in the State senate at that time. They began to frame bills. I opposed the 14-foot waterway. I have a large set of files in a garret up in my house, containing the maledictions and the resolutions that were passed concerning myself and my friends. I was threatened with destruction. I have been threatened with destruction a great many times in my country, just as I am here. I have been killed so many times I yearn for more annihilation. I would rather be destroyed anyhow than survive as the price of the surrender of my convictions on anything of a local or a national character. I would rather be myself than somebody else. I am responsible for myself, but I am not and do not desire to be responsible for other people. So we revolted, and we beat their legislation.

Twenty million dollars is a considerable price for contractors. I have known people to come to Washington to try to get contracts for less money than that. The contractors were present, and they were, save the unseemly applause mentioned, discreetly neutral. They were willing to take an 8-foot contract or a 14-foot one, just as the powers that prevailed might make it possible to get any kind of a contract. But we beat it all, and suffice it to say it continued defeated until 1915. At that time we decided, on both sides, on a compromise. I left my seat here in this Chamber and went back to the Illinois Legislature on the request of a number of the authorities, and my colleague [Mr. LEWIS] went back. I am only saying this in view of the question asked by the junior Senator from Indiana. We compromised, and decided that instead of spending the whole $20,000,000 we would spend 25 per cent on it, on the idea that with an improvement that could be made with $5,000,000 we could try out the question of whether a waterway of the kind contemplated would be of any commercial value in that country. So it went through, and I stayed for several days and solicited members of the legislature to make the experiment and settle the question as far as a demonstration of this kind could do so; and a bill was finally passed by which the 42-mile strip that makes the intervening link between Chicago and the Mississippi River would be converted into an 8-foot barge channel connecting with the Illinois River that empties into the Mississippi at a point called Grafton. That would reach all of the traffic in the Mississippi River from that point to the Gulf.

Of course we had to get the permisssion of the War Department. I adverted to that here yesterday. Gen. Black and a number of distinguished river engineers who possess great wisdom sat in solemn conference. We appeared before them. I think our efforts were futile, from the findings they made at last; but the river engineers possess all sorts of information. First, I think they are abnormally impressed with the gravity of their own titles.

Most of them are colonels, to say the least; many of them are brigadier generals or worse; and they have a long roll of illustrious military titles that, I think, somewhat impair their efficiency, because I fear they contemplate the titles they bear in such a way that they forget that grass grows and water runs on earth just like it used to before they received such honors. I am not greatly impressed myself with the knowledge of many of these gentlemen who are on river engineer boards merely because they have the titles and are called engineers.

The word "engineer" has a fearsome sound to a man who does not know anything about it. You are apt to lose your self-possession when you are in front of them; but I can take old river captains, men who have haunted the Mississippi River and Illinois River bottoms every since they can remember, who can tell me more about the movement, the uses, and the value of these inland waterways than all the distinguished generals and colonels that ever got on the pay roll in this Capital.

I did not expect ever to get their consent when the delegation landed from the western country. St. Louis was quite anxious for it to be done. She is interested in it just as much as Chicago; so we went before the board and presented the reasons at least all of one day. It did no good. It reminded me of Dickens's circumlocution office before we got through. One engineer passed it to another one; that engineer passed it to the Chief Engineer; the Chief Engineer passed it to the Secretary of War; the Secretary of War referred it to the legal counsel of the department to find what the Constitution permitted, or, if that document had a thing to do with it that we ought to consult it. Some even talked about the constitutionality of allowing such a thing as permitting a State to spend its own money on a waterway when all the moldy precedents showed it ought to try to spend the Government's money; and so, before it reached a conclusion, the merits of the proposition were quite lost. It was finally denied.

I said here the other day that probably it was such a novel question that was presented to the board that they have not yet gathered their faculties. They never heard of anybody that wanted to spend his own money before. They were always used to seeing a delegation come down here and demand money from the Government, so when we told them that we wanted simply leave to spend our own money, then they had a sort of dumb, inactive, stolid look, like we were speaking to them in strange tongues, just like a hod carrier at the Tower of Babel, I suppose. He got so mixed he could not carry mortar in the confusion of tongues that fell upon him.

That was the end of our application. The generals denied us. "Why," they said, "take this 42-mile link, and it will control a vast trade, a great volume of commerce, and be controlled by the State; and they might, standing at this gateway, put the rates so high that it would be a great burden upon the traffic of that country." Then I wrote an amendment here providing that it should be placed under the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix the rates on this waterway as they saw fit. I heard no more of the argument, but it did not reverse the order they had made. They next heard from Canada and discovered fresh doubts of a most distressing character. So they denied us the right to spend the $5,000,000 taken from our own taxpayers in order to open up the last remaining link that lies between Chicago and the Mississippi River and the Gulf traffic.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. NORRIS. What connection has the canal the Senator is speaking of now with the one he was describing a while ago? Is it the same canal?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; the old Illinois and Michigan Canal, together with the Sanitary District Channel.

Mr. NORRIS. The object of spending $20,000,000 was to deepen that old canal, already in existence?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; and to deepen certain parts of the Illinois River.

Mr. NORRIS. The outlet is not the same as that of the old canal, is it? Does it not go into the Mississippi River at a different place?

Mr. SHERMAN. The Sanitary District Channel?

Mr. NORRIS. No; this canal of which the Senator was speaking.

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, no. It runs in the same general direction, but it is not altogether the same right of way.

Mr. NORRIS. Was it contemplated to abandon the old canal, then?

Mr. SHERMAN. Most of it. The idea was to use some parts of it, but to abandon the rest. All the parts that lie between Joliet and Chicago would have been abandoned, because the Sanitary District Channel is a sufficient body of water for that purpose. The old canal below Joliet would have been partly abandoned.

Mr. NORRIS. What was its depth?

Mr. SHERMAN. Its depth was all the way from 4 to 7 feet originally. At some places, of course, it was deeper than others. It has filled up of late years. It has been practically useless for traffic for a good many years. There was no traffic on it that would make it worth while, and it fell into decay for a long time. The greater part of it, from Joliet south, would not have been used. Here and there there was a section of it that could be used on the plans that were presented to me. The part from Joliet into Chicago, some 30 or 35 miles, would not have been used at all.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to ask the Senator at the time this other canal was originally built were there great promises made or great expectations held by the people, for instance, in Iowa? The original canal reached the Iowa line, did it not?

Mr. SHERMAN. Not the Illinois-Michigan Canal. This last one did. The one appropriated for in 1882 reached to the Mississippi River.

Mr. NORRIS. That is the one I referred to. That reached the Mississippi River?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. NORRIS. The theory was that all the produce from Iowa would have an outlet to go to the Gulf and to the Lakes through this canal?

Mr. SHERMAN. That was the claim which was presented in a great variety of methods.

Mr. NORRIS. What were the results?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will get to them in a very short time. I wish to finish this $20,000,000 John Law bubble before I leave it. We were denied the right to spend the $5,000,000. So the matter rested there and we never spent anything. We could not spend the $20,000,000 without the consent of the War Department. I very briefly sketched one argument the other evening. They denied us the right, among other things, because we would draw more water from Lake Michigan. That was wholly an erroneous statement. It would require no more water from Lake Michigan than we are drawing at the present time, coming down from the sanitary district channel. I do not want to repeat, but all the way from Quebec to the upper Lake region the cities, including some objections, even at Milwaukee and all along the lower region of the North, complained that it would impair the lake level. This was wholly an erroneous charge, because the same water going through there now would be available, and not a gallon more for making this 42-foot channel is available.

Mr. NORRIS. Was any other reason given for denying this?

Mr. SHERMAN. No; that is all that I heard. The real reason was none of what I have given. If in the bill we had said that the Government board of river engineers could spend this $5,000,000 there would have been no objection. That is the real reason. They do not propose for anybody to spend the money on any waterway unless it has the thumb print of their approval. That is what is the matter.

This 42-mile link, if filled in, would settle the question of whether there is any value in that kind of traffic and would leave $15,000,000 unexpended. Five million dollars, it is estimated by the engineers, is ample to complete this link, and if it was a failure it would save the other $15,000,000.

I now come to the Illinois and Mississippi Rivers as a canal project and the inquiry of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS]. This began with an appropriation August 2, 1882, of $30,000 for a preliminary survey. There had been considerable agitation before that, resulting in enough support to put the $30,000 appropriation through here. August 5, 1886, another appropriation of $15,000 was made for an examination. They had a survey, and after the survey they wanted an examination.

Mr. NORRIS. Before the Senator starts in on that I wish to ask him if that is what is ordinarily known as the Hennepin Canal?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. NORRIS. Why was it called Hennepin Canal?

Mr. SHERMAN. There is a city on the Illinois River called Hennepin, named after old Father Hennepin, who was a contemporary of La Salle and Joliet and Father Marquette. Two of these at least were Catholic priests of great renown in their times, who entered upon mission work among the Indians of the northwest tribes and have a most commendable record of pious sacrifice and a great literature in the history of that time.

You find quite an interesting account in Parkman's History of the Northwest. Father Hennepin was one of the early priests and the name is taken from him. Joliet, Ill., is named after one of those early explorers. Louis Joliet was a Frenchman, a blacksmith of Quebec, who came south with the trail finders in those days. The rest of it is a part of the history of the country and has no place here. But so it is called the Hennepin Canal from the city of Hennepin, which is the eastern terminus of this canal where it reaches the Illinois River.

Here is the amount of money that is put in to the 30th day of June, 1916. There was $7,657,803.46 expended in this enterprise. It is not as expensive as the $20,000,000 project for the deep waterway whatever it may mean, 14 feet or 8 feet. It is not so expensive, but it has cost the Government in the vicinity of $8,000,000 now.

Here are some of the results. I wish to preface before I take up the results by saying that for a good many years I fought the appropriation for the old Illinois and Michigan Canal. It had reached that degree of semirespectability that for a long time its pay roll was greater than its income. For many years it survived solely on the pay roll. It had engineers with titles that would have staggered a Russian duke. They had janitors in uniform. They looked as gorgeous and haughty as the elevator man in a high-class apartment house here in Washington. That is where I got my primary baptism in trying to destroy useless pay rolls, beginning over 20 years ago. In my innocence I saw the pay roll ranged alongside of the income, and I made up my mind that it was like a lot of Government concerns here in this bill, that there was more appropriation than there was income or value, and I attacked it. The fight lasted for 11 years, and finally we put the decrepit, old bankrupt concern out of business. There was mourning on the pay roll and rejoicing among the taxpayers. Our State supreme court gave it a final blow in a case we took up and tranquillity settled on its remains.

That is all the matter with this bill. If it were not for the jobs of river engineers, for contractors who swarm here in this Capitol, everyone of them for the bill; if it were not for the local influences that sell supplies to the contractors and to have men on the pay roll this thing would lose its savor and would be like any other rank, decayed, useless sort of a Government job. It would die of its own putrescence. There is some virtue in here. It is like a man who puts apples in cold storage. He would sort out all of the rotten apples before he saved any of the good ones for the barrel. Here you are trying to save the rotten ones along with the good. It infects the whole barrel. That is what is the matter with this bill. I go back to the old spelling book. It is the case of dog Tray. He had his complexion spoiled because he was caught in bad company, not because he was not a virtuous dog.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. KING. I stepped out of the Chamber for a moment. Is the Senator alluding now to the Hennepin Canal?

Mr. SHERMAN. The Hennepin. That is in my own State.

Mr. KING. Is there any appropriation in this bill for that defunct concern?

Mr. SHERMAN. No; I am using that as a horrible example.

Mr. KING. Was there any benefit whatever to the State or the Government from that $8,000,000 appropriation?

Mr. SHERMAN. I say not. I will answer candidly, and I expect to receive the fervid malediction of every fisherman and everybody who sails an ocean-going gasoline launch along that neck of water. I say that I think it is of no value whatever to the general commerce of the country. Nearly $8,000,000 of Government money has been stowed away.

Mr. NELSON. Is the Senator referring to what we call the Hennepin Canal?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; that is the guilty party. It is possible when I came to the Senate Chamber and was sworn I was an unfit juror to sit in a case of this kind. I had seen so much of it that I had my mind made up. I think the greatest delusion there is in this country that manifests itself among otherwise sane people is this notion that we can resurrect the country by a great system of engineering waterways for connecting links between large bodies of inland water or where there are tidewater improvements. There is nothing worthy of the name outside of a few of the larger rivers.

I do not want to say anything about the Missouri River. What is the use of saying anything about it? The item will stay in. I was raised in the great Mississippi River country. My earliest recollection of the Missouri River is that it is more temperamental than a woman. It is never of one mind for more than 24 hours. To-day there will be a channel 20 feet deep some place on the Missouri River, and to-morrow morning there will be a sand bar there, with snipes on it. Still, we are going to put $20,000,000 in that river. If we spent it on the Mississippi River flood control and its tributaries, it would have some permanent result.

Mr. KING. Would it be inappropriate to say that that is a species of sniping against the Government at this particular junction?

Mr. SHERMAN. No; it would not; it is a very vicious piece of financial sniping that in the aggregate is like the many drops that make a flood. After a while there will be a flood of appropriation and a stupendous revenue bill, and taxes galore. It will in due time reach the taxpayer, and then there will be a ground swell.

I am reminded about taxpaying. I believe the junior Senator from Utah is thinking along the same line I am. I remember that some day the taxes must be paid. This Government never repudiated any of its obligations. Some day the taxpayer will be asked to contribute. The day of reckoning will come then. I have seen that several times in a smaller area, and I know just what an aroused, indignant, and vociferous taxpayer can do.

I remember of reading what to me is one of the most interesting of all histories of Motley, that History of the Netherlands, the low countries, and I recall from the question asked by the Senator from Utah a single statement made by Motley. Philip of Spain, he said, made one great mistake with the Dutch. He said that the Duke of Alva and his minions had burned at the stake, had buried alive, had confined in dungeons, had beheaded and shot and starved and persecuted and exiled the Netherlanders and they bore it, fighting, it is true, but they bore those brutal oppressions. At last, however, he taxed them every tenth penny of their income, and then the Dutchman rose in his might and it ended in the independence of the Netherlands and the defeat of the then greatest military power in the world. It was at the end of a taxpayers' fight.

If Charles I had had any sense of this innate objection among a free people, he could have saved his head. Nobody revolted at his spending money as long as he kept inside of grants from the Commons or the Crown incomes, but when he tried to collect ship money it invaded the powers of the House of Commons in levying taxes and he encountered difficulty because the Englishmen, from whom we inherit much of our habits of thought and our governmental instinct, would not permit a King to levy taxes. They suggested economy to the King at one time, sent him a message, a memorial. He paid no attention to it. He said it was a Crown prerogative to levy taxes. That is the last statement he ever made of that kind. The battle of Naseby and Chalgrove Field came. Some of the commonwealth troops were killed. The commonwealth indicted him for murder, and in an old book published that I have, dated in 1661, there are the affidavits of the officers and soldiers of the commonwealth forces in which they deposed in a written statement that they were at the battle of Naseby and saw after the discharge of firearms some of the commonwealth troops lying dead on the field, and they verily believed they died at the hands of Charles's soldiers.

In the indictment, the process, all in the old black letter and in the literature of that time, are found the same forms we follow in our indictments yet, our capias and our mittimus. Everything that is issued down to this day is like the writs used in substance in that struggle. That grew out of the taxpayer's fight.

This is a taxpayer's fight. I am willing to take a long-distance chance on it. If the good can not be segregated from the bad, as long as I am a Member of this body I intend to oppose river and harbor bills.

Now I refer to the original provocation, the Illinois and Mississippi Canal.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield.

Mr. HALE. I should like to ask the Senator a question. Yesterday in the debate the Senator stated that "the river and harbor bill is no more connected with the national defense than my last doctor's bill." I think the Senator did not understand all of the items in the bill when he made that statement.

Mr. SHERMAN. I made it with due deliberation, with malice aforethought, as the lawyers say.

Mr. HALE. On page 2 of the bill there is a provision for completing the improvement of Portland Harbor and providing for an appropriation of $300,000 for that purpose. Portland is the natural harbor for Canada. It is the nearest seaport to Montreal. It is 400 miles nearer than Halifax and about 160 miles nearer than St. John, the two great Canadian ports. The Grand Trunk Railroad has its terminal at Portland.

Portland is also the terminal of some of our American railroads. A great many of the munitions of war that have been sent abroad from Canada have been sent through the port of Portland. The harbor is one of the best in the country, but it is not deep enough to accommodate all the vessels that the Canadians have. The depth now is 30 feet. The appropriation will provide for deepening the harbor to 35 feet and for blowing up the rocks in the channel. If this appropriation goes through and these improvements are made, the harbor will be able to accommodate all the Canadian ships that could use it. During the last year we have had six or eight big Canadian ships that have come to Portland, which have loaded there, and have had to go out partially loaded or to wait for high tide in order to get off. It has caused a great deal of trouble and a great deal of confusion.

The provision in this bill was recommended by the Board of Engineers; it went into the bill as an emergency war appropriation. I have here a letter from the British ambassador stating that if the improvements were made the Canadian Government would be glad to make use of them. I will read the letter:

BRITISH EMBASSY,
Washington, May 14, 1917.

The Hon. FREDERICK HALE.

DEAR MR. SENATOR: I have informed the Canadian Government of the provision in the House river and harbor bill relative to improved facilities for Portland Harbor. The Governor General informs me that the Canadian Government would be glad to make use of the facilities recommended by the Board of Engineers of the War Department during the continuance of the war, and that these facilities will be of great service during the time of navigation in the St. Lawrence being closed. They would be of great importance for the successful prosecution of the war.

Yours, sincerely, CECIL SPRING-RICE.

So I say that this is a piece of emergency legislation that will be of direct benefit to our allies in this war. I object to having this piece of legislation put in the same category as some of which the Senator has spoken.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, then I object to a meritorious proposition of this kind being caught in such company. I never saw among natural beings a respectable gentleman who was caught reposing among loafers and tramps. The trouble is a few meritorious propositions—take that for one, and I shall not controvert it in the face of what the Senator from Maine says—but it is caught among a lot of legislative panhandlers. It is strange that that could not have been included in some of these other bills. Of course we were not then at war, but there is a 30-foot depth there now, and this ought to have been done before. No doubt if the good people of the locality had been listened to, it would have been done long ago. I do not, however, want to enter on that phase of it.

The trouble is we must prepare now not only the harbors but everything else, even down to our Army rifles. We must depend on foreign nations to get army rifles to put into the hands of our soldiers. The Government does not have them. They have been made by munition manufacturers of our own country for other countries, but we have not got our own Army equipped with them.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield to me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. KING. Apropos of the suggestion just made by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], if the Senator from Illinois will pardon me, I desire to say that if the only ground upon which this appropriation can be defended is a letter from the British ambassador, notwithstanding the English are our allies in this contest, I should not feel like voting for the measure. It seems to me that it is an impertinence on the part of the British ambassador to intrude into this matter, although he is our ally.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield.

Mr. KNOX. I think the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] has, without proper consideration, used the expression of "impertinent" as applicable to this communication. As I gathered the sense of it, it only indicates that the Canadian Government would be glad to avail itself of the facilities of Portland Harbor if the channel were deep enough so that it could do so to advantage. I rather think the Senator from Utah should withdraw the observation, because the suggestion is useful as bearing upon the advisability of making an appropriation for that purpose.

Mr. HALE and Mr. KING addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HALE. I should like to state the circumstances under which the British ambassador wrote me this letter. This proposition was recommended by the Board of Engineers, but it would not have gone into the river and harbor bill unless it came under the head of emergency war legislation. When I was informed of that I took the matter up with the Board of Engineers, and they told me that they could not call it emergency war legislation unless it were in some way shown that it would help the British Government in the prosecution of the war. I then went to the British ambassador. I explained the circumstances of the matter to him, and asked that he take it up with his Government, and if they found that it was warranted that he would write me a letter stating that it would be beneficial to them if that provision of this bill went through. I see nothing in the letter which in any way reflects on the conduct of the British ambassador.

Mr. KNOX. Then as I understand, Mr. President, the letter from the British ambassador was invited by a Member of this Chamber?

Mr. HALE. The letter from the British ambassador was invited by me, sir.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield.

Mr. KING. It seems to me, if the British ambassador desires that there shall be some improvement in our harbors which will be advantageous to the Canadian vessels who seek them, that the appropriate method would have been for him to communicate that information to us through the State Department; and if the State Department felt that it was proper, by that department it could have been communicated to the War Department, and through the appropriate channel and in the appropriate way have reached the Senate of the United States.

Mr. HALE. The letter from the British ambassador was written to me and presented to the State Department before it could be in any way used, and the State Department consented to the use of the letter.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, this is not the first time that communications have come in this way. Of course, the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] is familiar, being a member of the majority party, as I am a member of the minority party, about Lord Sackville West, who one time wrote a letter, which followed just the same channel as this does, and he was recalled by the British Government for that.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think, in justice, the Senator from Illinois ought to recognize the tone of the letter. There is no suggestion whatever from the British ambassador as to whether or not this ought to be done. In answer to a question, the British ambassador simply says that he had written to the Canadian Government and had received the information that they would use the harbor, if it was improved, and they could use it to advantage. I can not see any impropriety or any impertinence in responding to a letter of that character from a Senator, asking merely for information as to whether the harbor could be used, and simply giving information as to what he ascertained, namely, that they would take advantage of it.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is possibly so, but we will waive that question. We have grown so accustomed to obtaining our directions from London that the mere fact of having a letter or two sent here suggesting what we must do will not make much difference; it will not make matters any worse. So we had just as well take it as being a direct invitation to accept that view of it, and vote the supplies accordingly. We shall be drinking ale and be wearing tweeds by the time frost comes; we shall be dropping our "h's," reading the London Times, and speaking about "dear old Lunnon," and wishing we could see such a fog as we used to have there. We have the complaint; we must, I suppose, pass through it; we are used to having it on the Atlantic seaboard, where people go across the ocean a good deal oftener than they go across their own continent; there is some excuse for that locality but I do not want the disease to spread farther west, for it may not be curable. I do not believe in Anglophobia nor do I yet believe in amalgamating ourselves with the British Empire. I have a different sort of inheritance in this country. I am willing to fight with them as an ally but I am not willing to take their advice on domestic affairs. That is where I think they are guilty of some impropriety. I am willing for them to take our money, but I am not willing to take their advice. So let us call it even in that way. I regard the letter as an improper communication to this body. Congress has, however, so invited humiliation and abdicated its powers as to excuse a diplomatist unfamiliar with our domestic affairs for such a letter. I have never known Congress fallen to such a dependent level as now. Independent action or originality of thought has quite disappeared. I am willing for England to spend the money she borrows from us, but do not take kindly to telling us how to spend our own.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. FLETCHER. I suggest to the Senator that aside from every other consideration and every species of counsel and advice, this is a most important harbor, and it is essential that its facilities be increased to accommodate the foreign trade that is passing through it. It ought to be made available for the largest ships. The project was adopted years ago; a depth of 30 feet was provided, and now there is need for a depth of 35 feet in order to accommodate the foreign trade.

To give an idea of the commerce through this harbor, I will say to the Senator that for the year 1915 it amounted to 2,990,076 tons, valued at $145,884,000. That commerce is increasing very largely, and would increase enormously if the additional depth could be provided. It is very important to open that port for the commerce that is intended to be cared for at Portland. It is recommended by the department on its merits. Independent of whether any railroad or anybody else is interested, this whole country is interested, because it is an important port and an enormous foreign trade passes through it, which will be greatly facilitated by increasing the depth 5 feet. The appropriation of $300,000 will do that, and it is estimated that after the improvement is made the annual maintenance charge will be $1,000.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I should like to make a further statement, if the Senator will permit me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield.

Mr. HALE. There has always been a great deal of jealousy between Portland and the Canadian ports. The Canadian ports have not wanted Portland to get this business, and the Canadian Government has heretofore backed them up. It is only in this time of stress, when the Canadian ports are so crowded that it is necessary to have some place to send their ships from that they have favored this improvement, which is against their ordinary interest.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let it be granted that there is merit in this item for deepening the harbor and for the improvements that are contemplated by the $300,000 expenditure, then why not put it in a separate bill and let it go through on its merits? Where these matters are recommended by the War Department or recommended by the British ambassador or by any other governmental authority, why not put them in a separate bill and pass or defeat them on their merits? It is brought in, however, under such suspicious conditions as to arouse a spirit of criticism. If it possesses merit—and for the purposes of what I have to say I am willing to concede that the Senator from Maine is correct—why not let it stand on its own merits? Why hook it up with these dubious enterprises, some of which are admitted to be without excuse, many of which are ancient friends known to Senators long before I reached this Chamber as utterly without merit and which have become mere jests?

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator says that some of the items in this bill are admitted to be without excuse. I would be very glad if the Senator would specify who makes any such admission and would indicate to what items he refers, because I do not know of any such items.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well. I will get to them. I shall be glad to do so on some of these items, although time does not admit of going into detail. The junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] gave a series of projects in this bill that are a travesty on public improvements. Why repeat them? They have been repeatedly pointed out by Representative FREAR, of Wisconsin, too.

To recur to the Illinois-Mississippi Canal, I wish to complete my comments on it. With the expenditure of a total of $7,600,000 and more, let us see what the commercial statistics are for 1915 on that waterway. I might make criticism in detail of matters away from home, for there is an abundance of material, but I would be accused, perhaps justly, of ignoring the mote in my own eye when there was such an enterprise as this in my own State. So I begin my ministrations at home. Here is the traffic statement for the canal for the calendar year 1915. It shows a total of commercial traffic of 11,279 tons for the entire year, and a Government traffic of 20,997 tons, making a total of 32,276 tons. Total ton-miles amounted to 1,055,952.

Here are the articles: Of grain there was transported east a total of 6,829 tons and west 440 tons, a total of 7,269 tons.

In a single box car of average capacity 20 tons are carried. Forty thousand pounds is not out of the way at all. The amount carried usually exceeds that, but I take the smaller figure of 20 tons for a single box car. The 7,269 tons of grain carried over that canal could have been transported in 360 box cars. That number would have carried all of the grain; and remember, too, that this waterway runs through the greatest grain-collecting point and the center of the greatest producing area for food grain in the world. This $7,600,000 canal has been open for several years for traffic, and see what has developed!

Of rock 60 tons were carried, and all of it on Government account. Of lumber there were 2 tons carried east and 20 tons west. That is how we are getting lumber to the interior cities of Illinois—a total of 22 tons.

I come now to the figures as to coal. Of the millions of tons of coal that are taken out of Illinois mines every calendar year, there were transported on this Government waterway 28 tons east and 194 tons west. I burn more coal at home in the furnace in my house than goes east on this $7,600,000 Government enterprise.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. Can the Senator advise me in what part of the bill this enterprise is taken care of?

Mr. SHERMAN. There is nothing now in the bill relating to it. I anticipated that question. I said that I was citing this as a "horrible example" of such schemes as are contained in the present bill. This is one of the dead; some of the quick are already in this bill and will be there for some time. They have been there ever since I have been here—four years. I recognize many old friends every time this bill comes up. They are constant mendicants knocking at the Senatorial door, at the committee and elsewhere, seeking at all times waterway alms, and they are getting them. The project I am speaking of is one of them. It is one that is certainly embalmed, encased, put away in the mausoleum of Government enterprises—a melancholy instance of crimes committed in the name of waterway improvement!

Now I wish to turn to another volume concerning this same enterprise. I have been reading from Part II of the report of the United States Engineers. I now turn to Part I, on page 1102, wherein are found some further statistics concerning this subject. These are most illuminating, Mr. President. They show how progressive waterways are. The only progressive thing about them in their lifetime is the constantly increasing appropriations. The only progressive thing about them after they are done and wrapped away for the ages is the constantly decreasing volume of traffic. They work in an inverse ratio, according to the square of the diameter of the pork barrel, if we may go back to our old mathematical lessons.

In 1913 the total value of the traffic on the Hennepin Canal was $83,595. In 1914 it fell to $80,568. It lost instead of gained. In 1915 it rose to $96,828 worth. This included all of the Government business. If I take the commercial business alone, in 1913 it hauled a total of 11,856 tons; in 1914, 12,222 tons; and in 1915 it fell lower than it ever had in the three years—11,279 tons, lower than it was in 1913.

If you take away the sand and brush and rock and silt and material that the Government hauls over the canal, there is not enough profit on the commercial business on the canal to pay for the axle grease that works the locks in it. If the Senators can extract any information or consolation from this type of a great Government inland waterway improvement, so as to justify some of the items in this bill, they are perfectly welcome to do so.

I have said all that time will permit about these two home enterprises. I should like to take more time, because there are many illuminating details.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Before the Senator leaves those two canals, from what place on Lake Michigan do they start?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly the Senator asked for that and I am glad to give it. The Illinois and Michigan Canal starts at the Chicago River.

Mr. NORRIS. Where does the other one start?

Mr. SHERMAN. The other one begins at a point on the Rock River, which empties in the Mississippi River below Rock Island, Ill., and runs west until it reaches the Illinois River at the city of Hennepin, and from the Illinois River it passes up through what is operated as the old Illinois and Michigan Canal and the Chicago Drainage District Channel, until it reaches the Chicago River, and the Chicago River reaches Lake Michigan.

Mr. NORRIS. The point I wanted to get at is this: There is only one of them that reaches Lake Michigan?

Mr. SHERMAN. Only one of them.

Mr. NORRIS. They are connected?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. NORRIS. So that in reality they constitute one canal, do they not?

Mr. SHERMAN. They constitute one canal, and this 42-mile link that we intended, if permitted by the War Department, to open with the $5,000,000 appropriation, would have served both purposes. It would have served to connect Chicago directly, through the Hennepin Canal, with the Mississippi River by way of the Rock River, which discharges into the Mississippi River below Rock Island, and also would have opened the Illinois Valley and down through that valley into the Mississippi River, and so would have reached the lower Mississippi stretch in that way.

Mr. NORRIS. If that were done, would it be practicable? Would there be any traffic coming from the West? What route would traffic going from the West, toward the Gulf, take?

Mr. SHERMAN. If taking a water-borne way, it would go down the Mississippi River.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, yes. That would not use the canal at all?

Mr. SHERMAN. It would not necessarily, any of it, west of the Mississippi River, reach either of these canals at all; but if it were eastbound, and seeking to reach any of the interior cities east of that or Chicago——

Mr. NORRIS. Or any lake port.

Mr. SHERMAN. Or any lake port, it would use one or both. It might use either, according to the convenience of access.

Mr. NORRIS. If it went first down the Mississippi River, it would be a roundabout way, would it not?

Mr. SHERMAN. Somewhat.

Mr. NORRIS. The direct route would be to come straight across the old canal?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir. All of the northwestern business that would be eastbound toward Chicago or way points would use this canal.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will say to the Senator that that was the argument that was used for this great expenditure of money—that it would furnish a highway for a large part of the merchandise, especially the food grains, coming from the Northwest, that reached Chicago; that it would be a competitive line with the railways, and would help regulate rates.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course that is the argument used for the development of all these rivers; but does the Senator know of any other case in the United States where that argument is so well grounded? I mean, is there any other instance where any canal runs through a country so productive, so well settled, and so well developed in an agricultural manner and in manufacturing?

Mr. SHERMAN. I know of none except the Erie Canal that would at all compare with it. The Erie Canal has cost New York State, as I remember—I say this subject to correction, because I am only giving general recollection—over $100,000,000. It is an open waterway at this time, and I believe there is a considerable traffic, as it practically connects New York City with the Great Lakes traffic. Whether it pays or not, and what effect its operations have on freight rates, is a story by itself. There is a very large literature on that subject. Whether it has paid or not is another question, although New York State has recently spent a very large sum of money in the improvement of the canal in the hope that it will recover some of its former prestige and at last be a material link in the transportation system of that country.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JOHNSON of California in the chair). Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. RANSDELL. I wish to ask the Senator what kind of connection there is between the eastern end of the Hennepin Canal and the city of Chicago? Is it not a fact that when boats get to the eastern end of the Hennepin Canal they are practically impeded and can not go on any farther toward Chicago? There is no real waterway between the point where the Hennepin Canal leaves the Illinois River in its westward course and the city of Chicago. Is not that true?

Mr. SHERMAN. It has some effect on the traffic passing through this canal; there is no doubt of it. This 42-mile stretch that we hoped to improve would have removed that obstacle, but we were not permitted by the War Department to make this improvement. If that had been put in, then the Hennepin Canal would have had the benefit of this improvement in reaching Chicago.

Mr. RANSDELL. I was just asking the Senator whether it is not very probable that there would be considerably more commerce on the Hennepin Canal if that link between the city of Chicago and the eastern end of the Hennepin Canal were in good shape? Would there not probably be considerably more commerce on the Hennepin Canal then than there is now if there were any way for the boats to get from the Hennepin Canal to Chicago, and vice versa?

Mr. SHERMAN. It would undoubtedly increase the traffic. If this link were filled in there would undoubtedly be an increase in the Hennepin Canal business. But the way is already open, and barges drawing 4 feet could now run in unlimited numbers from the city of Chicago to the Gulf of Mexico or to New Orleans if there were anybody who had sufficient faith in that kind of water transportation to put money in it.

Mr. RANSDELL. But is it not true that the Hennepin Canal is a very good 7-foot waterway, and boats prepared to draw 7 feet would hardly wish to run in a 4-foot waterway, which is the connection with the city of Chicago? I am trying to get that clear. I am not as well posted about it as the Senator is; but I believe that the only connection leading out of the city of Chicago down into the Illinois River and thence into the Hennepin Canal and thence over into the Mississippi River, for a number of miles there, is this obsolete Illinois Canal, which does not permit a draft of over 4 feet. Am I correct in that?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think so. I think it would improve at least the traffic through the Hennepin Canal.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question? Is it possible now, or has it been when the Hennepin Canal was in its best condition, for a boat to reach Lake Michigan through the Hennepin Canal; and, if so, how large a boat could do it?

Mr. SHERMAN. Not through the Hennepin Canal. That is the new canal, the one built by the Government.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not know whether it was built by the Government or by the State. I mean this canal that the Senator was talking about.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Illinois-Michigan Canal—no; only a barge service could go through.

Mr. NORRIS. How much water is there?

Mr. SHERMAN. Possibly 4 feet.

Mr. NORRIS. How long has it been in that condition?

Mr. SHERMAN. It has been in that condition for probably 15 years.

Mr. NORRIS. When the Hennepin Canal was built and made to carry 7 feet of water, was it the intention to extend that depth clear through to Lake Michigan?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; that was the intention. It was hoped further improvements would come.

Mr. NORRIS. And was the only reason why that was not done because the Government engineers refused to permit the action of the State of Illinois?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes. It would have been under way by this time. It might not be done, but it would have been under way by this time. It has been two years since we entered upon it, and a year since the refusal.

Mr. NORRIS. The Hennepin Canal was built several years ago.

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Was it the original intention to have a water depth of 7 feet clear through to Lake Michigan?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; and we wanted to make the experiment, and were willing, as I said a while ago, to spend $5,000,000 out of this $20,000,000 in order to fill in this remaining part, to give the experiment a fair chance and see whether that canal was of any account, as well as the other one.

Mr. NORRIS. Was the only reason why you did not get a 7-foot waterway clear through to Lake Michigan the refusal of the Government to permit the State of Illinois to go on as it intended to do?

Mr. SHERMAN. I know of no other reason, Mr. President. I will say to the Senator that I have given two reason for refusing a permit for the improvement which are fit to be preserved in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not think the Senator understood me.

Mr. SHERMAN. Maybe not.

Mr. NORRIS. Was there any reason why this was not completed as it was originally contemplated except that the Government of the United States, through its engineers, refused to permit it to be done?

Mr. SHERMAN. No; that is the only reason. It would have been done without any expense whatever to the Government and with safety to all interests concerned.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President——

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. STERLING. What was the ground of the refusal on the part of the Army engineers?

Mr. SHERMAN. The first reason was that this 42-mile piece would have been wholly within the control of the State, and they could fix such rates as would strangle commerce, or be an undue burden. Then, as I said, there was an amendment offered to the item in the bill by which the Interstate Commerce Commission was to fix the rates on that waterway, as in the case of the railways.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. RANSDELL. I was just going to ask the Senator if there were not some very serious water-power propositions in connection with the permit which was desired from the Government engineers, and also some question about possibly lowering the level of the Great Lakes? Did not those questions come into the whole question of giving a permit to the State of Illinois to construct that canal? My recollection is that there was a very serious water-power proposition connected with it, and a fear on the part of the residents of the Great Lakes section that the lake levels would be interfered with by drawing from the Great Lakes a much larger quantity of water than is now being drawn; and all of those things, as I understood—I may be wrong—were considered by the engineers in refusing this permit.

Mr. SHERMAN. I had hoped that the water-power matter would not be referred to. There are certain enthusiasts, both in the State and in the National Government, who think there is an untold fortune in the undeveloped water power connected with this project. There is a dispute as to whether the State ought to have it or the Government. If the Government can not do any better in handling electricity and hydroelectric power than it does with the finances of other similar projects, I should prefer not to discuss the question or let the Government have anything to do with it. It seems to me that it is pretty well loaded up with its obligations at this time. If we were out of the undertakings that the Government has already assumed, I should feel somewhat relieved personally, because the gravity of the undertaking weighs on all of us.

The hydroelectric power growing out of this matter has been in dispute for a long time. The same thing occurs all over the country. The Government has an idea that it ought to control. I do not want to undertake to argue that question now.

I am not in any way connected with the large electric companies; I have no interest at all in them; and I have heard a great deal by the Commonwealth-Edison people in Chicago and New York, and by others who assume to know all about it, to the effect that every time you oppose the Government ownership of this enterprise you are instantly charged with being in the pay of the Commonwealth-Edison Co., or some other sinister motive; and I do not want to discuss that. I have discussed it at many times among my associates and elsewhere with some asperity, I fear, when the charge was made; but I am steadfastly opposed to the Government taking over this enterprise at this time from the electric-power feature of it. I do not think that had very much to do with the denial by the engineers of this permit. The engineers, after the objection that I have mentioned had been covered by an amendment, then began to listen to complaints that came from Canada, from Quebec, and other points, and from the upper lake region. They said it would take an increased quantity of water from the Chicago River, and lower the level of Lake Michigan and the connecting links, and thereby would injure the commerce of the upper lakes. They were mistaken in that—I have made that statement since—because it would not have taken a cubic foot more of water for this enterprise, if it had been done, than it is taking now; nor is any injurious lowering of any of the lake levels in any of the harbors of the upper lake country attributable to the withdrawal of water through the sanitary district channel. What has lowered the lake levels is this, when you get at the truth of the matter—and when you confront a Canadian engineer with the facts, I have never yet heard it successfully answered. There have been many hearings in Chicago and elsewhere and before the War Department here in years past, and I have never heard them answer this—that when the depth of the St. Lawrence River at Quebec, at Montreal, and other places, was increased by river improvements, the depth was increased from 18 feet to more than 30 feet, the discharge of water was thereby increased and the Canadians themselves were responsible for the lowering of the levels of the upper lake country.

If there had been a mere cutting made some place else it would not have made any difference. Water always seeks its level, and the accumulated water discharges at a lower level where the channel was deepened, because when in the St. Lawrence River would necessarily lower the level in the upper lake country. That is a story of itself. I do not want to go into that. I only state it in view of the question asked by the Senator from Louisiana.

I have said all I care to say about these two shining examples of waterway improvement in my own State. Probably if they were all footed up it would be more than $30,000,000 that has been put into these two enterprises alone, and more than $40,000,000 have been put into internal waterway improvement in that State from 1827 down to the present date, and there is not any appreciable tonnage in any of them—Hennepin Canal, Lake Michigan Canal, Illinois River—and practically nothing of the ancient glory of the Mississippi is left.

The Senator from Louisiana asks a proper inquiry: What would be the effect on the Hennepin Canal if the eastern exit from the canal was improved so as to reach Chicago and its commerce? I reply to that query by saying what has become of the traffic at St. Louis both in and out bound freight on the lower Mississippi River in all this time. There is a beggarly 5 per cent left of the traffic of 1880. The glory of the old steamboat days in 1850 is long gone. On each side where the St. Louis Bridge or the Eads Bridge now stands in 1850 there would be 3 miles of steamboat on either side tied up on the levees. They represented the traffic of boats of the upper and lower Mississippi country, everything from the cotton, the sugar, the tobacco, and the manufactured merchandise and grain of the northern countries, that went north and south by this great channel of commerce. But in 1880 it reached its high water mark, and to-day there remains 5 per cent of all the traffic of the Mississippi River.

Steamboats can run during all the season except when closed by ice, and below the city of Cairo, after the Ohio River pours its volume into the Mississippi River, there is an open river for barge or steamboat or tug all the way until tidewater is reached. Steadily it has declined. If it were not for the coal coming down the Ohio River, it would be still more remarkable in its decline, but that has kept it alive to some degree.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. In connection with his interesting statement can the Senator give us the amount of public funds that has been used in the improvement of the Mississippi River during that term of years?

Mr. SHERMAN. I could not separate it, Mr. President. I never have divided the tabulation from 1880 down to the present, and taking out of it the appropriations made prior to 1880, but all of the appropriations made for the Mississippi River, of which a great part has been made since 1880 to the Mississippi River Commission, together with the improvement for the lower Mississippi River, altogether aggregate, outside of what is contained in this bill or other bills pending, in an expended sum of more than $120,000,000, and in the face of all that, with the dredging, the diking, the improvement even of the jetties put in at the delta—in the face of all that there has been a steady decline of river traffic.

Mr. NORRIS. That has been from the beginning of the appropriations?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; all told, from the first appropriation made down to the last.

Mr. NORRIS. When was it that the channel was completed as far up as St. Louis?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not know just when, but I note here that with the chain of rocks it was limited to an 8-foot depth below St. Louis. I think it crosses about New Madrid, Mo. It runs clear across the river, and it would take a very large sum of money to blow that out and increase the depth; but there is an 8-foot depth above that and unless there is extremely low water it never interferes with the ordinary river traffic.

Mr. NORRIS. Eight feet would be considered a sufficient depth for all the boats that are plying on the river, would it not? What is the draft of those boats?

Mr. SHERMAN. The average river boat does not draw more than 4 or 5 feet. They are flat bottomed. They are like a scow. They are very broad. They do not draw much water and they will navigate in 4 feet. But an 8-foot depth is an abundant depth for all the boats that ply on the Mississippi River coming down and going to St. Louis. A profitable barge can be operated on 4 feet, river men tell me. Those of long experience have taken up modern methods, abandoning the steamboat and substituting the barge. If a tug is used a number of barges can be attached to the tug and they can be maneuvered in an ordinary channel in such a way as to make very cheap waterborne freight.

Since the use of internal-combustion engines the barges are self-propelled. They have gasoline engines and each barge carries its own motive power, and that is much easier for navigation purposes than the tow.

But in spite of these modern improvements that can be used with cheap power in tows or in self-propelled barges, this traffic has steadily declined. So I have not any superabundant hope of the Hennepin Canal, even when the link is filled in, of its being any factor in the transportation problem of that part of the country.

I now come to the question asked by the very competent chairman of our committee, the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], to name some of these enterprises that are coming properly within the classification as I have given it. My application of that description is entirely impersonal. I am speaking of geographic points. There is a difference between the geographic points and between personal point of view. I am speaking of these things in a geographical sense. I will say to the chairman of the committee I speak of Toms River as one that I think is utterly indefensible. That is one of the New Jersey improvements, it is true.

I wish now to turn to part 2 of the engineers' report on page 2252. Here is some of the information on an item in this bill. This is one of the live items:

Santee, Wateree, and Congaree Rivers and Estherville-Minim Creek Canal, S. C.

I have been confining my activities to Northern States. I intend to be entirely cosmopolitan in my criticisms on this question and not be confined by mere geographical locality. Wherever I find it I wish to make some adequate comment. Here are the appropriations. Altogether as they are all, and have been for some time, grouped in a single item there is a total of $670,044.44. The project is quite a hoary beneficiary. It began in 1886 and is entitled to sit on the platform at an old settlers' meeting in affairs of this kind.

Beginning in 1886 it runs down to the last item in the tabulation here of September 1, 1916, at which time this volume went to press. Here are some of the items. There is a total result out of this $670,000 of appropriations. The commercial statistics, which is not all, I want to be fair about it, is $770,902 worth. That is for a portion, not all of this enterprise. At another division of the improvement are some further, but altogether it does not total much over a million dollars.

Then here are some of the crafts that ply on the river:

List of vessels handling freight on Estherville-Minim Creek Canal.

Here is the Nan Elizabeth, 133 tons burden. Here is the Dixie, of 20 tons. Those are tremendous water crafts when you come to think about it. Here are the W. H. Andrews, of 39 tons, and the Pathfinder, of 6 tons.

Here is the number of trips they made: The Nan Elizabeth made 42 trips in a year. It needs repairs at that unusual speed. We grow accustomed to the activities of Government enterprises, but here is a Government boat that in 12 months made 42 trips—that is, three and a half a month—that is, one-tenth of a trip a day. This exceeds anything in governmental lethargy which I have discovered on record, except some of the records below here of these other vessels which can offer an improvement on even this inertia.

The Dixie made 26 trips. The W. H. Andrews made 19 trips, and there is a footnote to that showing how painfully accurate the river engineers have become. The footnote says of the W. H. Andrews this year, it made approximately 19 trips in a year; and as to the Pathfinder—if John C. Fremont never had beaten the Pathfinder he would never have gotten anywhere. The Pathfinder made six trips in a year. It no doubt died of exhaustion. Total number of tons carried in this part of the undertaking, 25,376. Then here is a footnote added by the engineers of this tabulation:

The decrease in tonnage and value of freight is due to a decline in the business of transporting logs, lumber, and timber products by water (steam railways being more economical), and also to decreased tonnage carried by steamboat between Columbia and Georgetown.

Everybody knows that, but I am glad to have some wise man on the Engineer Corps place in the Government records some place that the lumber and logs can be more economically carried by steam railroad than over a Government waterway costing $670,000.

Mr. STERLING. May I ask the Senator to which of the projects among these several projects he now refers?

Mr. SHERMAN. In the bill?

Mr. STERLING. Yes; to the Estherville-Minim Creek Canal?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is found, I think, on page 13, beginning at line 15, Wateree, Congaree, including the Estherville-Minim Creek Canal.

Mr. STERLING. Now, to which one of these streams does what the Senator read from the engineer's report refer?

Mr. SHERMAN. It refers to the Estherville-Minim Creek Canal.

Mr. STERLING. I should like to ask the Senator further if there is an estimate made for the Estherville Canal in the report separately?

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir; they are all grouped together and it is all the same section, I understand, or a part of the same improvement. It is grouped together in such a way that it is necessarily connected in the improvement. I take that from the engineer's report that I find here to be true. This is one that I think is unjustifiable and would make it proper for me to apply the words of criticism that I have done.

Mr. STERLING. I suppose the Senator will have in mind what was stated by the chairman of the committee in discussing the bill, that where they are grouped in this way there are estimates often made for certain ones in the group, and that it is not probable that any money will be expended upon others named in the group, but for which no estimates were made, admitting, however, that the Board of Army Engineers would have some discretion in the matter and may spend something on a project for which no estimate was made?

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no doubt of it.

I turn now to part 2, page 2385, the Tombigbee River. In this there appears to have been during a series of years appropriations of a very large sum of money, probably half a million dollars from the summary on page 2389. I submit that, with the volume of commerce put alongside of the appropriations devoted to this purpose, there are utterly inadequate returns.

Mr. STERLING. If the Senator will pardon me, before he leaves the Santee, Wateree, and Congaree Rivers, I should like to ask if he has compared the estimate made for some of these projects with the commerce that is carried, for example, on the Santee or the Waterce or Congaree. They are grouped together here with the Estherville-Minim Creek Canal. That is the problem that is troubling me in regard to this grouping system.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; I have, but I do not care to present the tabulation. It takes too long. It is out of all proportions. I want to generalize, because I do not want to prolong my remarks unduly, or many minutes more, but compare it with the appropriation. If you put the same amount of money in a roadbed, in a steam railway equipment, or an interurban line, you could transport more freight and more passengers more expeditiously and reach any place with railroad building by far than you can to take the sums of money in these appropriations and compare it with the actual freight carried. The electric or steam railroad freight has so vastly the advantage of any freight carried by some of the appropriations in this river and harbor bill that there is no comparison to be made. They can not be mentioned in the same business way.

I turn now to one other that I regard as justifying any criticism that I have made in part 2, page 2248. Here I find a geographic point known as Winyah Bay. The improvement at this point, Mr. President, has some chance, or ought to have, of developing a commerce. It is a tidewater point, and $3,242,393 has been spent at this point. The commerce I generalize, and I say it is entirely out of all proportion to the cost of the improvement. Here is some of the commerce, for instance. A total in 1915 of 17,842 tons inbound freight, and of 165,904 tons of outbound freight; the total value of $4,900,821, with an admitted expenditure of $3,242,000 and over, in order to move this much freight in a single year. The same amount of money spent in an electric or steam road improvement would gather this freight many times over and reach tidewater with it and deliver it to any ocean-going or coastwise vessel in that part of the country.

Here is a very singular thing for a prohibition State like South Carolina. The inbound freight contains 88 tons of whisky, wine, and beer. That is inbound freight; and the outbound freight contains 86 tons of clams. I note that commerce keeps pace with conviviality; 88 tons of whisky, wine, and beer coming in, and 86 tons of clams going out. That is the way it always happens. The whisky gets in, and then the clams come out.

I have far exceeded somewhat, Mr. President, by interruptions that have properly been made, the time in which I intended to close my remarks. I do not care to go more in detail, because it would serve no more useful purpose than to multiply these instances that I have given. Why multiply the record on such shameless schemes? I wish only to close here by calling attention to the letter read from Engineer Black—I think he is Chief Engineer of the board, if I remember correctly—in which he says these are the military necessities. He is speaking of the time when he writes the letter that they are now military necessities. If that is the Engineer's sober judgment that these are military necessities contained in this bill, I am just as well satisfied to have him to stay on the Board of Engineers rather than to engage in any of the military or naval undertakings of this country. If that is his judgment, keep him where he will do just as little damage as possible, and it may be at the end it will be economy to make some of these appropriations in order to keep Gen. Black busy in civil life. If his judgment is no better than that, keep him away from the military service in which this country is now engaged. I regard it as a proper matter of criticism for a Government officer, a river engineer, who will send a letter of that kind here, bracing up such a river and harbor bill and saying it is a military necessity. I feel justified in any criticism that in a parliamentary way I can properly make here of such a statement to influence legislation in this body in favor of as many unmeritorious schemes as will be found within the limits of this river and harbor bill.

Here, Mr. President, while I am loath to close, I know it is my duty to take no more time. I only wish to voice my protest against it, and I intend so long as it appears in its present form to continue to voice that protest while I have a seat in this body. I do not hope the bill will be defeated. If there are meritorious measures let them be segregated. Let them be taken out and put upon their own merits, just as the Mississippi flood-control bill was at the last session, where it went out and stood upon its own merits, where if it had remained in this bill it would have been touched by the same weakness that manifests itself in so many of these enterprises.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NEW in the chair). The pending question is on the amendment of the committee.

Mr. JONES of Washington. What is the committee amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, beginning in line 6, insert the item for Cape Cod Canal, Mass.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] wants to be present when that amendment is voted on.

Mr. BORAH rose.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator from Idaho desire to proceed now?

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator from Iowa asked me to suggest the absence of a quorum, and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am requested to announce that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] is detained from the Chamber by official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). Fifty-seven Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, there are some items in the pending bill which can undoubtedly be defended, and for which I think Congress should make appropriations. There are items which can very well be said to be necessary and essential in taking care of the situation which now devolves upon us by reason of the war, and if the measure could be confined to those items, if those in charge of the bill would accept an amendment which would confine the operation of the bill to those items necessary in the carrying on of the war, I should not oppose the bill. I am satisfied that anyone disinterested, who has listened to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] and to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN], aside from any original investigation which he may have made, can not conclude otherwise than that there are many items in the bill which can not be justified, particularly at this time. They constitute that kind of expenditure and want of economy which, above all times, we ought at this time to avoid; that is to say, they are unnecessary expenditures. Whatever they may be worth in the future may be a matter of debate, but as to their immediate necessity there can be no debate. I do not believe that many of these items can be justified at any time; they are not only extravagant but unconscionable, and certainly they can not be justified at this time.

Aside, therefore, from the general principles which guide me in the opposition which I have heretofore interposed to river and harbor bills, I am particularly opposed to this bill at this time because a vast number of the projects can wait, and can wait without any detriment to the country, to commerce, or to the situation which is most immediate and imminent in the country—the war situation.

Aside, therefore, from the underlying principles which have heretofore been discussed, the manner in which the bill is always made up, the object and purpose of the bill in some respects, we ought to take into consideration the outlook of the taxpayers of this country, their undoubted discouragement when they see such things as this being done at a time when they have such tremendous burdens already. It must be a matter of grave concern to business, to labor, to capital, and to the patriot generally to see the Congress, after having put upon them billions in the way of burdens, to turn and add expenditures such as are found in this bill. I can not imagine anything more calculated to dull initiative and to discourage economy and energy than this heartless and unconscionable waste of public funds in an hour like this. It is not alone the amount appropriated, but it is this disposition to waste of public servants which is distinctly alarming.

Mr. President, it must be startling to contemplate the manner in which we are piling up expenditures at this time. I shall not go into the question as to the necessity for them, or as to whether or not some of the expenditures which are being provided for are unnecessary, or as to whether we could curtail, or as to whether there is waste, but I simply take the broad proposition as we find it in the record, and I call the attention of the Senate and of the country for a moment to the manner in which we are piling up expenditures and loading such tremendous burdens upon the already overburdened taxpayers of this country.

According to the figures which have been put into the RECORD, and about which there seems to be no dispute, we are now approaching an expenditure and an obligation of nearly $17,000,000,000. Within a few weeks after the declaration of war, before a gun has been fired and before a soldier has been placed in line, before we are actually in the war, we have placed upon the taxpayers of this country a burden approaching $17,000,000,000. Every dollar thus far provided for may be necessary; but certainly it behooves us, even if it is necessary, to trim at every possible point we can and to avoid imposing any burden that is not absolutely necessary. If we have any regard for public opinion—and upon public opinion, and public opinion alone, ultimately this war must be fought and won—if we have any regard for the great masses of the people upon whom this burden is ultimately to fall, we ought to scrutinize every measure that comes before this body with a view of exempting from its provisions, if possible, every single dollar that is not necessary in this great exigency. Will any Senator who honors me with his presence dispute that as a patriotic obligation?

If there are items in this bill—although they are small, but though small in their individual standing they become large in their collective standing—if there are items in this bill which can wait—and about that, Mr. President, it seems there can be no possible doubt—do we not owe it to the country, to the perilous situation in which we stand, and to those who must bear the burden of this war, to stop here as patriotic Senators and eliminate them from the bill? If not willing to do that, are you not willing to put into this bill a provision that no part of the money appropriated by it shall be expended except that part which those carrying on the war shall deem necessary and essential to the progress and the prosecution of the war? How can we escape the force of this solemn duty to those whom we represent? How shall we answer in the court of conscience when called to plead to the indictment of taxpayers of this country?

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the Senator how he views the philosophy of appropriations, when we are appropriating so much money as $17,000,000,000, that a matter of $27,000,000 is too infinitesimal to think about?

Mr. BORAH. Of course, Mr. President, it is a perfectly vicious proposition, and I do not suppose that seriously it would be urged. I know it has been suggested; but I do not suppose it would be seriously and consistently urged that at a time when the burden is all that can be borne it is immaterial if we place a little more or, in other words, that it is immaterial that you put on the final straw which may constitute the disaster. To say that twenty-seven million is easily lost in a bulk of seventeen billion, and that therefore we can slip it over on the taxpayer, is to preach that theft is excusable if not detected.

Mr. President, I call attention to another phase of this situation. I want to say here from the floor of the Senate that the business men of this country had better take a keen interest in these propositions, and that speedily. We have reached the point where we must reflect upon this plan of issuing bonds ad libitum. We have got to raise money; we must have cash. There is only one way to get cash, and that is to go to those who have it.

England has up to the present time issued bonds to the amount of $18,740,000,000. France has issued bonds to the amount of $10,532,000,000.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. Does the Senator from Idaho mean by that statement that that has been done by those countries since the beginning of the war?

Mr. BORAH. Yes. I am speaking now with reference to the war period and with reference to conditions which would be included in the war situation.

France has issued $10,532,000,000 of bonds, Germany has issued $13,400,000,000 of bonds, Russia has issued $7,896,000,000 of bonds, Italy has issued $2,520,000,000 of bonds, Austria has issued $3,659,000,000 of bonds, and the United States will add to it this year in the way of bonds in all probability to the amount of at least $10,000,000,000. You have, Mr. President, the stupendous, almost incomprehensible burden of $66,747,000,000 in the way of bonded indebtedness upon the countries named which are engaged in this war. Calculate the annual interest on this and you get some conception of this burden.

We can not any more than can a corporation or an individual continue to issue our notes and bonds without facing bankruptcy, without facing a breakdown and disaster. So, Mr. President, we in this country must face the proposition in the revenue measure which is to come along in a few days, not of raising the mere sum of $1,800,000,000 of money, but we must face the proposition of raising by this Congress in the way of taxes at least $3,000,000,000. There is only one place to go to get the $3,000,000,000, and that is to go to those, sir, who have the money. We must necessarily reach out to those places where wealth has been gathered and stored. Business ought therefore to be heard and heard quickly on these useless expenditures.

In view of the fact that the countries with which we are now allied are raising apparently every dollar that they can, but must necessarily vote these large issues of bonds, and in view of the fact that we have already incurred obligations or provided for expenditures approaching $17,000,000,000, as a matter of patriotism, in the simple discharge of the most simple duty which devolves upon us, we ought to insist that every item of appropriations which passes through this body shall have stamped upon it "necessity"; that no item which can not be said to be absolutely necessary to the successful carrying on of the war ought to pass, and that to pass it would be an act in disregard of the imminent urgency which confronts this country.

Mr. President, there never has been a time in this struggle, from the 1st day of August, 1914, until this present hour, when the outlook was so serious and menacing to the allies as it is at this time. There has never been an instant so calculated to call forth patriotic effort to enlist the unselfish zeal of those who have to do with the guiding of their country's affairs as this present time. Russia has for all practical purposes at this hour, for the present at least, passed out of the conflict. Her internal difficulties have made it practically impossible for her to be of effect upon the fighting line. That vast body of people, upon whom all interested in this war upon the side of the allies depended so much and from whom they expected so much, have by reason of the situation at home practically left the battle front.

What does that mean to the people of the United States? Could a more serious message come over the wires at any time, one involving more nearly the lives of millions of our boys, than the fact that Russia is breaking down? If there is efficacy in prayer in such things as these, the American people may well offer up a silent prayer at this hour for the guidance and the preservation and the success of Kerensky. If this gallant leader, standing now at the head of his disorganized forces, meets either the assassin's bullet or failure in other ways, it means a leaven which will disorganize and demoralize the situation beyond any power that language can portray. It means, Mr. President, that in all probability a million American boys in addition will find graves upon European soil.

No more serious situation, sir, could confront warring nations than that which confronts the allies at this hour. In the minds of some it may not be considered wise to say so, but the situation is here, and I am one of those who believe that we should speak truthfully and plainly to those who must pay our taxes and fight our battles. The hour of sacrifice has arrived, and, being here, will the Senate of the United States linger and parley, sir, over money to go into Fish Creek, Tombigbee Creek, or some other inconsequential and worthless waterways? Will the American Senate delay for a single hour to cut away all unnecessary and idle things which impede progress or add unnecessary burdens and meet this situation as it is necessary for us to meet it in order to solve the problem? Shall we rise to the invitations of this solemn and awful hour or shall we still trifle with selfish and immaterial matters as the storm comes on?

But that is not all, Mr. President. Not only has Russia for the present time passed out of this war, but the submarine problem, which, it was hoped a few weeks ago, might by this time be well upon its way to a successful solution, instead of being favorable to the allies is distinctly favorable to the Teuton powers. I read in the reliable papers this morning that, instead of the amount of tonnage sunk decreasing, it is increasing day by day, and thus, while the Russian forces are breaking away from the fighting line the submarines of the Teutonic powers are spreading havoc upon the seas, and France is being fought almost to her knees, though displaying again and again courage and heroism such as has never been excelled in the history of the world.

Sir, under conditions so unfavorable, America has entered the war. She is in the war now practically as the guarantor of the financial success of every ally; and so it seems it behooves us, sir, to conserve our energies, our financial ability, and our power in every conceivable way. We ought to waste nowhere and in no way. We ought to act with reference to every measure according to the seriousness of our task.

I want to call attention, Mr. President, to an article which appeared a few days ago in the New York Tribune, written by Mr. Pollen, upon the shipping conditions:

> According to the latest statistics Great Britain has lost since the beginning of April an average of 24 ships a week. The tonnage of these ships is not stated. We are not told what neutral shipping is lost. Only France and Italy publish weekly lists like the British list. Unofficial statements place the neutral and allied losses, not including British, at something like 50 or 60 per cent of the British losses. It has recently been stated in Washington that the figures for June show that the U boats are destroying tonnage at the rate of 9,000,000 tons a year.
> On the 1st of February of this year there were supposed to be about 40,000,000 tons available for all the world's needs in sea traffic. All the world's power of replacing the lost tonnage has also been stated to be equal to about 2,000,000 tons between February, 1917, and February, 1918, and about twice this for the period between February, 1918, and February, 1919.
> If the rate of losses continues, then there will be 18,000,000 tons destroyed and 6,000,000 tons replaced, or a net loss of 12,000,000 tons 18 months from now.

Will anyone tell me, as conditions are developing at this time, under those figures gathered by an accurate, conservative, and expert writer upon this subject, that we are going to win this war under the present program? Has the time not come, sir, when we should realize here and now, if we have never realized before, that indeed America is in this war and that, for weal or woe, it is our war. It is no longer a European war, sir; it is an American war. And with this condition of affairs confronting us it is necessary that we proceed to legislate here upon these respective measures as if the enemy were at our gates.

Mr. President, something was said a few days ago in the Senate about peace; peace was discussed. This is not a propitious time, generally speaking, to discuss peace or to propose peace if we intend to have that peace which is permanent and which endures. With an enemy that is apparently marching on to victory, we shall hardly be listened to upon their part; we can not discuss peace with them. Does anyone suppose that Germany at this hour would consider any proposal of peace other than the peace which takes care of Germany's interests as Germany alone sees those interests? Does anyone suppose the central powers, with Russia caving in, with the submarine war growing stronger and more effective apparently every day, with France, apparently at the height of her fighting power, not able in all probability to go beyond the point which she now holds—with those conditions presented to the German mind, does anyone suppose that we could discuss peace with them upon any basis whatever other than terms which Germany would practically dictate?

No, Mr. President; we have not arrived yet at the time when we can discuss peace with those powers against which we are arrayed; but I think this much ought to be said, lest I be misunderstood: I am not so sure but that the time has come when the American people should have presented to them more definitely and specifically the terms and conditions upon which we are fighting the war and the terms and conditions upon which we would cease to fight it. I believe that there ought to be laid before our people a more specific program as to what we propose to attain, as to what we propose to accomplish, and as to the terms and conditions upon which the war, so far as America is concerned, can end. I think we ought to say in as clear terms as possible just what America demands as a prerequisite of peace.

I say this, not, sir, with the view of dealing with Germany or with the expectation that she would accept from us at this time any proposal which we might submit, but I say it in behalf of our own people and of permitting them to know definitely and specifically the things for which they are expected to fight and the things which shall constitute the end of their task. We can not carry on this war, in my judgment, without a thoroughly aroused and sustained public opinion in favor of the war, which does not at this time exist; and one of the reasons, in my opinion, why it does not exist is because of the nebulous and uncertain terms and conditions upon which we are supposed to be in the war, and the utter want of knowledge as to what conditions will take us out of the war. No one seems to know what will constitute the end. America ought to hold the reins of peace every hour and at all times.

Mr. President, Viviani in that remarkable address bidding farewell to the American people told us that the great mistake the German Government made was in not knowing the French and English people; that they sent their ambassadors to France and England to study government and to practice the arts of diplomacy, but they misunderstood or did not read at all the noble qualities of the masses. Let us not as a Government make that same fatal mistake with reference to our own people. Let us keep in mind that the ways of government and the paths of diplomacy overshadowed by no sacrifice are often far from the sad and dusty lanes down which the people march to war. Government and diplomacy may be interested in the future of Constantinople and the Bagdad railway, but out yonder in the open where every move toward war means sorrow and sacrifice, where families are to be separated and broken, where husband and brother and son are to be offered upon the altar, that altar must be our country—you must speak to them of things of home and of the flag, you must give them an American issue for which to die.

After we have declared war and taken the steps upon the part of the Government which necessarily follow, we come then to deal with another world entirely. We leave the field of form and formality and find ourselves in the world of the concrete, of the real, where hearts throb and grieve and men are preparing to suffer and die. From this forward you must deal with the man on the street, in the field, and in the factory; the man of simple and fixed but noble national instincts; the man, bless God, in whose moral and intellectual fiber are ingrained the teachings and traditions and aspirations of a century of national life—a national life separate, distinct, exceptional, and sublime. You will not change these things overnight. The American citizen must live his character; you can not transplant in a few weeks the habits and ideas, the methods and ways, of other people. We have our allies, and with them a common purpose, but America is still America, with her own institutions, her individuality, the moral and intellectual conceptions of her own people; she is still a sun and not a satellite. Sir, if our own institutions are not at stake, if the security of our own country is not involved, if we as a people and as a Nation are not fighting for our own rights and the honor and lives of our own people, our declaration of war was a bold and impudent betrayal of a whole people and its further continuance a conspiracy against every home in the land.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I understand from the Senator's remarks a few moments ago that he is of the opinion that any attempt to arrive at such a basis of peace as he is now advocating would be perfectly futile because of the victorious position Germany is in. If that is true, does it not follow necessarily that the only basis upon which the United States can proceed is to change that victorious position of Germany? The only way in which that can be brought about is by victory, so that that constitutes the issue.

I would, furthermore——

Mr. BORAH. Just a moment, until I answer that. Of course, that constitutes the issue. That is what I am talking about. The Senator is greatly in error if he supposes that I have advocated peace upon any basis. I have simply advocated that the American people be advised as to the issues in this war from the American standpoint, and the issues which will have to be determined from the American standpoint before this war is closed. I am speaking to a proper preparation to carry on the war from the standpoint of the spirit and purpose of our own people.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Well, Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield further?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Pursuing that argument one step further, if the situation is as the Senator describes it—and there is very much ground for his conclusions as to the present situation in Europe—I assume that the Senator would be of the opinion, but for the presence of the United States in the war, that Germany would be completely victorious, and assuming that that is the case, the American people would have very little difficulty in finding out what the issue of the war was. It seems to me to follow as a very obvious deduction that if Germany conquers Europe, as the Senator apprehends she would but for the presence of the United States, with the consolidated resources of England and France, with a navy far superior to ours, the war probably would be transferred from the plains of France to the territory of the United States, and we would then have an issue that the youngest child in the land could understand, and we would have a condition which some people seem to advocate, judging from the correspondence I have received—that we should fight this war upon our own territory, what they call a defensive war. They are not in favor of sending soldiers abroad, and they seem to prefer that this situation should come about.

Mr. BORAH. Of course, I do not want to curtail the Senator's statement, but I am at a loss now to know wherein the Senator from Washington differs with the Senator from Idaho. The Senator had just stated that this is an American war. I say so, too; but I am calling for a policy which will answer the correspondence which the Senator says he is receiving. That is the very situation which I would remedy.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I was simply attempting to point out, Mr. President, that there was an issue so plain that it seems to me that it is readily understood. I am delighted to know that the Senator from Idaho has the same view.

Mr. BORAH. The issue which the Senator states is the issue, but I think his correspondents, of which he speaks, may need attention before this war proceeds very much further. We have been supposed by many, even millions, of our people to be fighting for the rehabilitation of certain nations in Europe, for the redistribution of European territory, for the establishment of democracy in Europe.

Mr. POINDEXTER. For humanity.

Mr. BORAH. And for humanity, and so forth; but the imminent peril which confronts the American people, immediate and impending, has not been sufficiently accentuated; and we will realize that before we go much further.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I agree with the proposition of the Senator from Idaho, that it would not be justifiable war on the part of the United States if it were merely for an abstract principle. As I view this war, if the Senator will pardon just one word, it is not for democracy as a form of government, but it is for the right to establish such a government as a self-governing people choose. It is for the possibility of having any government at all. It is a war of self-defense. It is a war for the material welfare of the American people, and not for the spiritual ideals of the world.

Mr. BORAH. I venture to say, Mr. President, that if the Senator and his countrymen realized that this is an American war in the sense that it would be if France and England should break down, the Senate of the United States would not be sitting here passing upon the advisability of appropriating millions of dollars for creeks down which a duck can not float in some seasons of the year. There is no better proof, sir, anywhere to be found that we have not yet realized that this is an American war and that we are fighting for our own institutions than the method in which we are doing business here in the Senate at this time. It is distinctly a case in which the city is wrapped in conflagration while those in power continue to fiddle.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield further?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That raises quite a different issue from the general issues of the war. The proposition stated by the Senator——

Mr. BORAH. Excuse me; the Senator was not here when I started, I think, because that is the precise proposition which I submitted—that the fact of our dealing with these questions here as we are dealing with them, these matters which are not war measures at all, makes it manifest that we have not apprised ourselves of the situation in which we are placed.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I understand the Senator's proposition to be that no appropriation except for some necessary purpose ought to be made. If that were applied generally in the affairs of the United States, the normal course of business and life of our people would be absolutely suspended, and it would be impossible for us to conduct a war or to conduct the affairs of peace.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Washington is certainly not sincere in comparing the appropriations for many of the creeks in this bill with the ordinary and necessary business affairs of the United States.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I was not conscious of being insincere. I did not intend to be so, and I was not discussing the merits of the creeks included in this bill, to which the Senator refers; but I was on the point of stating this as the general principle of appropriations upon that phase of the matter which the Senator was discussing.

This bill is supposed to be in aid of transportation. Now, if there are items in this bill which are not in aid of transportation, which are not justified as furthering the carrying of commerce upon the waters of the country, the appropriations ought not to be made, whether we are at war or at peace. On the other hand, if they are justified as an aid to navigation—and I have a great deal of data going to show the excess of the transportation business of the country over the capacity of the railroads—I fail to see any movement or activity on the part of the Government which would be more in the interest of a successful conduct of the war than such appropriations.

Mr. BORAH. Of course, Mr. President, the Senator is now referring to those things in the bill which are defensible. I take it that he is not referring to these little creeks around and through which these driblets go.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. FLETCHER. I wanted to suggest to the Senator, in response to about the only reference he has made to the bill throughout his address, wherein he speaks about millions of dollars being provided in this bill for creeks down which a duck can not float, that I think it would be fair and just that he should specify, because, with all due respect to the Senator, I challenge that statement. I challenge the statement that there are insignificant and inconsequential creeks provided for in this bill, and I should like to have some information on that subject.

Mr. BORAH. If the Senator will read the speech of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], in which he pointed out these specific creeks and the commerce and the appropriations, while he will not perhaps accept my figurative expression, he will be compelled as an honest Senator to admit that substantially I was correct. The Senator from Iowa has gone into this matter in convincing detail. If the Senator is not convinced, I could not convince him by repeating.

Mr. FLETCHER. I will say this in reply to that statement, if the Senator will allow me: I have not yet read the speech, because it has not been printed. I heard most of it, and I am at least, I think, within bounds when I say that the chief criticisms in that speech are with reference to items that are not in this bill at all.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, they have very deftly and expertly, as they have been passing these river and harbor bills for years, covered up, or attempted to cover up, a lot of these items. They have aggregated them and collected them together so that it is almost impossible for a man to get into them and to deal with them separately, and, in my humble judgment, it was done for the specific purpose of covering up indefensible items. That is the opinion of the Senator from Idaho, after considerable investigation.

Mr. FLETCHER. I will say, if the Senator will allow me, that that was done upon the recommendation of the engineers for the purpose of economical administration, and that only, and that there is absolutely nothing covered up.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not care anything about the engineers. When it comes to the question of appropriations it is perfectly useless to say to me that it is necessary for the economical distribution of this money that a lot of small items should be aggregated and congregated, and then these items covered up in that way. I do not care whether the engineers said it or who said it. It is a dishonest and distinctly indefensible way of framing these bills.

Mr. FLETCHER. No; but there are specific estimates made for specific items in each of those improvements, and the report shows it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator very frankly that it is practically impossible for the Senator from Idaho to express in parliamentary language his opinion of this bill. I think there are many items in it which are absolutely indefensible.

Mr. FLETCHER. All I am asking is that the Senator will point them out.

Mr. BORAH. I said when I opened my remarks that I was not going to repeat the items and the specific details mentioned by the Senator from Iowa, because it is perfectly useless to do so. The Senator from Florida is not in ignorance.

Mr. President, the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] seems to have misapprehended what the Senator from Idaho was attempting to say. The Senator from Idaho has not taken the position that the United States ought not to be in this war, or that there were not manifest reasons for our immediate interest why we should be in the war—not at all.

I did say, however, and I entertain no doubt about it at all, that we could not do anything more helpful to this war than to make it distinctly an American war, by making it clear how vitally we are now concerned, how our own safety, our own institutions, our own civilization are in the balance, so there can be no doubt in the mind of the man who runs that he may read.

Let me call your attention to an illustration. A few weeks ago Russia made a declaration in favor of peace based upon no indemnities and no annexations. It found no response from any one of her allies. In my humble judgment, the United States could not have taken a more important and effective step than to have indorsed the proposition which Russia at that time put out to the world. Some noted exceptions, some of which, I have no doubt, Russia herself would have accepted, could have been noted, but the principle maintained. It is my opinion that if the United States had taken a bold stand at that time in favor of that principle Russia would be in 100 per cent better condition as a fighting force to-day than she is. But the impression immediately obtained that certain influences prevented the United States from defining its position, waiting upon other powers which were directing the course of this war. And there is abroad in this land now, the belief that we must fight on and on until captured colonies and certain territory are adjusted. Sir, I warn you now do not let that idea become fastened in the minds of our people.

Mr. President, I can only speak for myself and for myself alone. But speaking for myself, I did not vote for war out of sympathy for France, much as I sympathize with and greatly as I admire that brave and chivalrous people. I voted for war because our own rights had been trampled under foot, because our own people had been murdered, and because we were warned that the slaughter was to be renewed. I could see nothing under those conditions in the future but continued wrongs, dishonor, and complete national degradation. I did not vote for war that we might spread democracy over Europe, though in common with all my countrymen, I presume, I would be glad to see every king and every emperor and every prince exiled from among men and the last vestige of dynastic power swept into the refuse of history. I voted for war to preserve and make safe our own blessed Republic, to give honor and dignity and security to this democracy of ours, and to keep it if we could as our fathers transmitted it, whole and triumphant. I felt that self-respect was the very breath of life of a democracy, that while other governments might continue on in humiliation, and even in degradation, without self-respect a democracy could not long endure. I felt that a free Republic living alone and existing only in the affection and the devotion of the citizen could not long survive the day when that Republic should refuse to defend the rights and protect the lives of its citizens. So I voted for war because the most vital thing in our national life was and is involved, and for no other reason on earth would I have cast that vote and aided in plunging our Nation into the midst of this world conflict. As I view it, from that hour this was no longer a European war to settle and adjust European affairs, to rehabilitate European nations, but an American war, to be carried on, prolonged, or ended according to American interests, and to be adjusted upon American principles, and to settle, once and we hope for all time, that while slow to wrath we are swift to avenge those wrongs which challenge national honor and imperil the security of our own people.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the committee.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, this is the amendment dealing with the Cape Cod Canal. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] wanted to be present when this amendment was up for a vote, and he wanted to be present when the Senator from Massachusetts was discussing it, and I therefore suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Johnson, Cal.	New	Sherman
Bankhead	Jones, Wash.	Newlands	Shields
Borah	Kendrick	Norris	Smith, Md.
Brady	Kenyon	Overman	Smith, Mich.
Calder	King	Page	Smoot
Culberson	Kirby	Poindexter	Sterling
Cummins	La Follette	Pomerene	Swanson
Curtis	Lodge	Ransdell	Thompson
Fernald	McCumber	Reed	Trammell
Fletcher	McKellar	Robinson	Underwood
France	McNary	Saulsbury	Vardaman
Frelinghuysen	Martin	Shafroth	Weeks
Hollis	Nelson	Sheppard	Wolcott

Mr. THOMPSON. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HUSTING] is necessarily absent from the Senate on important business. I will also state that the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] are detained on important business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. WEEKS. I offer the following amendment to the amendment of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts proposes an amendment to the amendment, which the Secretary will read.

The SECRETARY. Amend the proposed amendment of the committee as follows: Page 2, line 6, after the words "Secretary of War," insert "Secretary of Commerce and a comma," and, in line 16, after the words "Secretary of War," insert a "comma and the Secretary of Commerce and a comma," so that it will read:

Cape Cod Canal, Mass.: The Secretary of War, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Secretary of the Navy are hereby authorized to enter into negotiations, etc.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am quite sure that the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts would be agreeable to the Committee on Commerce, and I have no objection to it.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to inquire what the amendment is?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will again state the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. KENYON. The Secretary need not read it. The Senator from Massachusetts can state the purport of it.

Mr. WEEKS. The amendment to the amendment includes the Secretary of Commerce with the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy to consider the proposition contained in the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. KENYON. And the vote now is on the amendment to the amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to inquire, if it be in order, if I can have an explanation of this Cape Cod Canal project? I have not been in the room, and I do not know whether the Senator from Massachusetts explained it or not.

Mr. WEEKS. I have not explained it nor have I had an opportunity to do so. I am quite willing, if there are Senators who wish information, to explain it, although I had not intended to take the time of the Senate, because it seemed to me that on its face it explained itself and that its necessity is beyond question.

Mr. President, this amendment is for the purpose of giving the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of Commerce authority to negotiate with the owners of the Cape Cod Canal for its purchase, and if they determine that for military, naval, and commercial reasons it is desirable to make the purchase then they shall at the end of their negotiations report to Congress that fact, that the price at which they would recommend the purchase shall be named, and that until that is done Congress shall not take any further action in the matter.

The appropriation provided in this amendment is but $5,000. I wish frankly to say at this time that with the information that Congress has, if the appropriation had been required for the purchase of the canal without additional information I should not have pressed it, but the monetary consideration in this matter is of so slight importance that it did not seem to me there was any objection on that score.

This canal has been under consideration from colonial times.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I was not in the Chamber when the Senator commenced. There was an amendment to the committee amendment offered and agreed to. That changed the committee amendment.

Mr. WEEKS. Only in that it provided that the Secretary of Commerce should join with the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy in conducting the negotiations.

Mr. NORRIS. The committee amendment to which the Senator is addressing his remarks gives authority, does it not, to purchase without any further authorization of Congress?

Mr. WEEKS. It gives authority to contract, but not to purchase until Congress has authorized it and has appropriated the money for that purpose.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course the appropriation will be necessary to carry the contract out, but does it not go far enough so that it would bind the United States to carry out whatever contract it makes?

Mr. WEEKS. I do not think so, Mr. President. As I said, this canal has been under consideration for 250 years. The reason why it has been considered is because of the dangers incident to navigation around Cape Cod. It is the most dangerous part of the Atlantic coast, and there is, as I shall show, a material saving in time and saving in expense in connection with the use of the canal.

The Cape Cod Canal Co. was incorporated under the laws of Massachusetts about a dozen years ago and this canal was opened for operation in 1914. It has been operated continuously since. In 1915 about 4,000,000 tons of freight went through the canal, and the amount of tonnage using the canal has been constantly increasing from the beginning. The map behind me shows the situation so graphically that I want to call it to the attention of Senators.

All the coastwise shipping coming along the Atlantic coast follows this line going through Vineyard Sound, then Nantucket Sound, then Pollock Rip, and around Cape Cod to Boston and the northern New England points. The canal is at this point [indicating]. It is 8 miles long. Shipping will go through Buzzards Bay, where there is an ample depth of water, and then through the canal, saving this extended trip around the cape. The saving from a point here, from Boston lightship to Brentons Reef, will be 154 miles. From Boston lightship to that point [indicating], to the Sandy Hook lightship, it would be around in this direction a saving of 108 miles. From Boston lightship to Hampton Roads, 45 miles; from Race Point, Cape Cod, Race Rock, and Long Island Sound, 130 miles. That is one way.

The amount of tonnage that goes around the cape is easily obtainable, and it may be charged against this project that there is not sufficient tonnage to make use of it. The last figures I have before me are those for 1912. In that year 11,523,000 tons of coal, 900,000 tons of lumber, 300,000 tons of stone, 31,000 tons of cement, and other tonnage of various products aggregating fourteen and one-half million tons, and shipping aggregating 5,600,000 tons, or a total of 20,000,000 tons went around Cape Cod. Of course that has been very materially increased. I have no doubt but that this year there will be 15,000,000 tons of coal go to northern New England coasts from New York, Philadelphia, and Norfolk ports. That coal, under the charges made by the owners of the canal, pays 8 cents a ton for passage through. That is 5 cents a ton for barges loaded and 3 cents a ton for returning empty.

If 15,000,000 tons of coal were to go through that canal at 8 cents a ton it would amount to $1,200,000, which is the toll the manufacturing and other interests in northern New England are paying for the use of the soft coals in our industries and for transportation purposes. Presumably it would largely inure to the benefit of commercial interests and shipping interests if the canal were taken over.

Then, again, there is a very great delay in this route to Boston. There is more than twice as much in Nantucket Sound as in Buzzards Bay, and it is notorious that there are very considerable and frequently great delays for shipping in Nantucket Sound, because this point at Pollock Rip is an extremely dangerous point. It is literally a cemetery for shipping. Let me give you some idea of the losses that are incurred. From 1904 to 1913, 329 vessels of various kinds had trouble in passing around the coast. In the year 1914 there were 14 wrecks and the lives of 747 people were involved. The loss of property was over $200,000, and the amount jeopardized was more than $3,000,000; and that was a comparatively good year. The losses that are incurred in going around the cape in actual monetary value would be sufficient to pay a fair interest on Cape Cod Canal itself, in addition to the loss of life and the very frequent delays.

The Committee on Commerce had before it a large number of shipping men who testified to the danger of this coast and the extra expense incurred both in time and in money. For example, the pilotage charge for conducting a ship around the cape is $75; for conducting a vessel through the canal it is $20; and that would inure to every ship that uses one or the other routes.

Then the actual loss of time is so considerable that the cost is very material. For example, a tug with three barges would lose something like $45 worth of time going around the cape, which would be saved if they went through the canal. So it is a question with every shipper whether he will go around the cape and take the chances of delay and loss or whether he will go through the canal and pay the charges which are incident to it.

I contend, Mr. President, that there are innumerable good projects in every river and harbor bill. There are some projects about which men might very properly disagree, but the purpose is to increase shipping and to facilitate as far as possible our commercial requirements.

This canal should have been constructed by the Government instead of by individuals. While it is not entirely comparable to the Soo Canal, it is to some degree. What would be said if every pound of coal and ore that goes through the Soo Canal were paying tribute to some one? The Government constructed that canal, and everybody agrees that it was a wise thing to do. The Government should have constructed this canal, because it does benefit not only the New England shipping interests and New England people but it benefits everyone who is engaged in any kind of traffic from Norfolk north.

Therefore, there appeared before the committee in one form and another very many interests in favor of this project, not alone shipping men but commercial bodies, the Merchants' Association of New York, one of the greatest commercial organizations in the country; the Boston Chamber of Commerce, with more than 5,000 members; the Massachusetts Board of Trade; and the Massachusetts Real Estate Association, with many thousands of members. There was no opposition to it before the committee, and I believe that there can be no opposition from any real commercial or industrial center.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. Can the Senator give the Senate the amount of tonnage that passed through the canal last year? He gave the tonnage that went around Cape Cod.

Mr. WEEKS. Not that year, because the canal was not open; but the first year it was open for the full year, about 4,000,000 tons.

Mr. NORRIS. How does the tonnage going through the canal compare with the tonnage going around?

Mr. WEEKS. I think probably about one-fifth.

Mr. NORRIS. What is the depth of the canal?

Mr. WEEKS. About 22 feet.

Mr. NORRIS. Are there any locks?

Mr. WEEKS. There are no locks. There are about 22 feet of water.

Mr. NORRIS. What can the Senator say about the maintenance of it?

Mr. WEEKS. I have here the figures of the annual cost of administration, maintenance, and repairs. It aggregated all told $196,000 in the second year the canal was opened, but a very considerable part of that was due to a wreck in the canal, and a large part of it to overhead or administration expenses. I do not know how they were divided up.

The canal is about 22 feet deep and is wide enough for any ship drawing that amount of water. The largest ship that has gone through the canal connected with the Navy was the Salem, which is a scout cruiser. I have forgotten the tonnage, but it is a ship of considerable size. I will say that the canal authorities did not think the Salem would go through there, but the Navy Department insisted that it should be done. The ship was being taken to Boston for repairs, and they did not believe she was in a condition to be taken around the cape if she could be gotten through the canal. So the department took the responsibility of sending her through the canal.

I am not arguing this question from the standpoint of military necessity as strongly as I am from the commercial necessity, and yet there are very important military reasons why the Government should control the canal and should widen and deepen it sufficiently so that it may be used by the largest ships. The project is indorsed by Admiral Knight, president of the War College, and by Gen. Wood, now in command of the Southeastern Department. Admiral Benson, Chief of the Bureau of Operations of the Navy, appeared before the committee and advocated taking over the canal. Col. Black, now Gen. Black, Chief of Engineers, stated in a report that such action should be taken. One of the first accomplishments of the present Acting Chief of Staff, Gen. Tasker H. Bliss, was to write a thesis on the subject of canals and other questions relating to waterways. In it he referred to the construction of the canal as an important military venture. That was in 1884, Gen. Bliss's first public appearance. I have not yet found any Army or Navy men who are opposed to the canal and who do not think it of military as well as naval importance.

Mr. SWANSON. I should like to ask the Senator if the canal is deep enough to be used if Boston or New York were assailed by an enemy and would it not be available for that purpose?

Mr. WEEKS. Undoubtedly.

Mr. SWANSON. In other words, the people of New York and the people of Boston could get through without danger from submarines or destroyers.

Mr. WEEKS. Undoubtedly.

Mr. SWANSON. And the Navy would have its effectiveness increased 50 per cent if that canal were made available for naval vessels to go through.

Mr. WEEKS. Admiral Benson called the attention of the committee to a point worth considering, because something happened in the Navy in the last two days which adds emphasis to it. He stated that if the fleet were in the locality of Point Judith or Montauk and were in an engagement with the enemy and our ships were more or less crippled, it was of vital importance that the largest man-of-war could go through Hell Gate to New York, and that this canal should be so deepened that the largest ship could go through it to the Boston Navy Yard, so that the facilities of these yards and the commercial yards near them could be used for repair purposes. Not very long ago—within two weeks—the Olympia, which was the mother ship of the coast-defense fleet, ran on an uncharted rock near Block Island at about this point [indicating] and was badly damaged. Fortunately there was a shoal near at hand, and the admiral on board directed that the ship be run onto it. That was the only thing which prevented the ship from sinking and is an example of what might happen if we were in a contest with the enemy, not that we would necessarily run on that particular shoal, but the necessity of getting a ship into a safe place until she could be convoyed to one or the other of the navy yards was immediately apparent. She was near enough to this shoal to save the ship although she was not more than 7 miles from shore, and if it had not been for that happy incident the Olympia would have gone down. This illustrates the desirability or the necessity of having both Hell Gate open and the Cape Cod Canal developed so that it can be used by the largest ship.

Mr. President, I do not care to take any more of the time of the Senate unless Senators wish to ask me questions about this matter. I am confident everyone who investigates every detail of this proposition will be satisfied that it is one of the most worthy of the items that have been proposed for legislation of this kind.

Mr. LODGE. I wish to ask my colleague one question before he takes his seat. The Chesapeake Canal was provided for by the House.

Mr. WEEKS. It was; that is, the Chesapeake Canal from Chesapeake Bay to the Delaware River.

Mr. LODGE. And, with the other, that is the whole chain of defensive waterways?

Mr. WEEKS. That is the Raritan Canal from New York Bay to Delaware River, and at that point the Chesapeake Canal from the Delaware River to the Chesapeake Bay, and the Cape Cod Canal from Massachusetts Bay to Buzzards Bay.

Mr. SWANSON. And the other one was around Cape Hatteras to Norfolk, which the Government has already bought.

Mr. LODGE. From Boston to Beaufort.

Mr. SWANSON. The Norfolk one has already been purchased. I know the Naval Committee last year very seriously considered this subject of acquiring this as necessary for naval defense to protect both Boston and New York in case of emergency or war.

Mr. WEEKS. If there were no other reason in favor of this, I am sure it could be sustained for naval reasons alone.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KING. Why does not the State enlarge the canal and take it over, I should like to ask the Senator?

Mr. WEEKS. Because the State is not engaged in interstate commerce. It is the National Government that is engaged in interstate commerce. The State of Massachusetts has spent more than $17,000,000 in the development of its rivers and harbors. It has a waterways commission which devotes its entire time to that purpose. It is not the habit of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts to run to the General Government for every item of expenditure which should be borne by the State. But this is an interstate matter. It is just as valuable from the standpoint of the coal miners of West Virginia as it is from the standpoint of the coal users in the interior of Maine.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator from Massachusetts that I think he would desire one statement he made to be corrected. He fell into an error or inadvertence when he used the name in regard to the canal across New Jersey. That is a proposed canal which is new entirely. The Senator spoke of it as the Raritan Canal. The Raritan Canal does exist there, but the proposed canal across New Jersey is to be built through alluvial land, while probably the rock-work of the old canal would make it unavailable for a sea-level ship canal.

Mr. WEEKS. I supposed it was following the route of the old Raritan Canal.

Mr. SAULSBURY. No; as a matter of fact, it takes an entirely different route. I suppose the Senator would like to correct that?

Mr. WEEKS. I am very obliged to the Senator from Delaware.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 17, line 8, after the word "document," to insert "except as to pilotage and terminal facilities;" so as to make the clause read:

Mobile Harbor and Bar, and channel connecting Mobile Bay and Mississippi Sound, Ala.: For maintenance of channel connecting Mobile Bay and Mississippi Sound, $5,000; for maintenance of Mobile Harbor and Bar and for improvement in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 1763, Sixty-fourth Congress, second session, and subject to the conditions set forth in said document, except as to pilotage and terminal facilities, $110,000; in all, $115,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 21, line 22, after the words "in all," to strike out "$153,500" and insert "$216,650," so as to read:

Toledo, Port Clinton, Sandusky, Huron, Vermilion, Lorain, Cleveland, Fairport, Ashtabula, and Conneaut Harbors, Ohio: For maintenance, $132,000; completing improvement of Lorain Harbor in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 980, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, and subject to the conditions set forth in said document, $16,500; for completing improvement of Lorain Harbor in accordance with House Document No. 985, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, $63,150; for improvement of Cuyahoga River, Cleveland Harbor, in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 707, Sixty-third Congress, second session, and subject to the conditions set forth in said document, $5,000: Provided, That the Government's share in the cost of the improvement in accordance with the final plans adopted shall not exceed $400,000; in all, $216,650.

Mr. KING. I should like to ask the Senator having the bill in charge whether any part of that is a new item or project, and if there has been an increase over the amount which the bill carried as it came from the House?

Mr. FLETCHER. There is no increase over the amount in the bill as it came from the House. There was a mistake in the addition in the amount, as I recall it, as it came from the House. This simply makes the addition correct. The items in this connection are precisely the same as in the bill when it came from the House.

Mr. KING. Is this a new project?

Mr. FLETCHER. There is a portion of it that is new in Lorain Harbor, but the Senate committee has not changed it, except to correct the addition; that is all. There is no new appropriation put on by the committee and no change in it whatever.

Mr. KING. What feature or part of the project is new and what justification is there for embarking upon a new project now?

Mr. FLETCHER. This portion is for completing the improvement of the Lorain Harbor in accordance with House Document No. 985, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, $63,150. That part of this total appropriation is for a new project. Lorain Harbor itself is not a new project. It has been developed in the past and is very considerable, but this part of the bill is new, this $150,000. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] can explain the conditions there perhaps better than I can. I see that he is present.

Mr. KING. I shall be glad to receive any explanation that the Senator from Ohio can offer in regard to this project as a war measure and as a work necessary for national preparedness.

Mr. HARDING. Probably, Mr. President, it is quite as much so as any interior harbor improvement contained in the bill. The Senator from Utah will recall, if he stops to think, that Lorain Harbor is one of the deep lake port harbors for the delivery of iron ore in the Northwest. My recollection is that Lorain Harbor transacts a business amounting to approximately fourteen or fifteen million tons annually.

This particular project is not distinctly new. It is a continuation of a jetty, if I remember correctly, which will protect a portion of the harbor from filling and give them ship room in that particularly important port.

I will say to the Senator from Utah that the House of Representatives thought sufficiently well of this particular amendment to put it in on the floor of the House after the bill had been formulated. It has the cordial indorsement of the Board of Engineers. This is an exceedingly important harbor. If the Senator is not agreeable to the amendment as provided by the House on this short statement, which I venture to offer, I shall be very glad to get the figures from the report of the engineers and also the points covered by the debate in the other House. I did not think it was going to be questioned, and have therefore given it no attention.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the statement made by the Senator from Ohio indicates that probably this project is as meritorious, or more so, than are many of the projects in this bill. Nothing that the Senator has stated would induce me to vote for it; probably nothing the Senator could offer at the present time would induce me to vote for it at this session of Congress. I intend to vote against this bill as wholly indefensible, as reprehensible in the highest degree under present circumstances, as a measure which ought not to have found its way into the House and into the Senate; but, of course, I realize——

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, if the Senator from Utah expects to get an argument out of me on that particular subject, I am obliged to disappoint him.

Mr. KING. I think, if the Senator will pardon me, that no one who is a proponent of this bill cares to argue the merits of it. Both the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] and the distinguished Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] have challenged over and over again the many iniquities and infirmities of this bill, but no one cares to reply to them; and, of course, the learned and distinguished Senator from Ohio, I am sure, would not care to reply to anything that I might say.

Mr. FLETCHER and Mr. HARDING addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio is recognized.

Mr. HARDING. I yield to the chairman of the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then the Senator from Florida is recognized.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I simply want to say, in response to the remarks of my friend from Utah [Mr. KING], that when this bill was taken up several hours were spent in its explanation and discussion regarding its various details. The reports on the bill are before the Senate, going into every single project carried in the bill. Those reports are full and complete and comprise hundreds of pages. I venture to say that the gentlemen who have indulged in these general denunciations of the bill have never read the reports and do not care to read them. They have not considered the reports.

So far as the challenge that has been thrown out here, the challenge has come from this side to the Senator from Iowa, to the Senator from Illinois, and to every other Senator to point out the items to which they objected in this bill. They have failed to do it.

One of them says that the other has done it and that his speech has not been published, but that when his speech is published you will find it there; the other one says that he will get to it after awhile; he never gets to it, but talks about provisions which have been in previous river and harbor bills, and which are not in this bill at all; about something that has been done here years and years ago.

The argument is made by the Senator from Utah, on my right [Mr. SMOOT] that this is the time to economize; that appropriations ought not to be made for projects of this kind; that there are, as the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] said, creeks of no consequence, down which ducks can scarcely float, and all that sort of thing, and it is a matter which ought to wait.

Can we not learn something from the experience of countries which are engaged in this war to such an extent that we have not yet dreamed of? Those countries have not stopped the improvement of their waterways. France and Germany are spending more upon their waterways in the midst of the worst war in all history than they have ever before spent. Canada is doing the same thing. Is it possible that the United States must take a backward step in a matter of this kind, get away from the position of every civilized country on earth, and abandon its waterways? Is that the argument?

There can be no question about what has been accomplished by the improvement of these waterways; there can be no question but what we have in the past improved more than 200 harbors in this country and more than 25,000 miles of navigable waterways, and made them serviceable and useful where they were of no use before; that upon their bosoms to-day float a commerce which aggregates more than 900,000,000 tons every year; that upon that tonnage we are saving to the people of this country from 50 cents to $1 a ton, and that the total amount of more than $450,000,000 is saved every year in the reduction of freight by reason of the facilities which enable them to enjoy water-borne commerce. Yet we hear people who talk about this bill as if it were a loot of the Treasury, as if it were a robbery of the funds of the American people; and the only logical conclusion from that argument is that we must abandon these waterways, and take a step which no civilized country in the world has ever taken.

In regard to this particular project at Lorain Harbor, I do not need to defend it. The commerce there in 1914 was 4,507,075 tons, of the value of $11,517,228. That is some commerce. That commerce consisted chiefly of the receipts of iron ore and the shipments of coal. I should like to know if it is not a wise thing to provide for the transportation of iron ore and coal in these days?

Mr. HARDING. I should like the Senator from Florida in reporting the commerce at Lorain Harbor to report it in a normal year of good fortune, and to supplement it with the estimated commerce of 1916, which is 15,000,000 tons. The normal commerce in Lorain Harbor, as reported by the engineers, was approximately 8,000,000 tons for 1912.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am very glad to have the Senator make that suggestion. I desire also to say that the commerce is of that particular kind and character that we need to provide the means of getting to market iron ore and coal. Those are the principal products moving by this waterway; but here the proposition is to appropriate $63,150 to make that improvement and to add to those facilities, as recommended by the Board of Engineers.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, just such a speech as that which has been delivered by the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] makes me feel like taking the time of the Senate, even though it might be for the balance of to-day and all day to-morrow, to point out in detail a number of projects in this bill which no living soul can defend, and I know if the American people knew what the character of the project was the Senator who votes for them would never be sustained by his constituents, but I told the Senator having the bill in charge that I would not stand in the way of this bill, rotten as it is, passing the Senate to-day, because I knew, Mr. President, that if we discussed it for a month, when it is voted upon, it would pass, and I did not want to take any of the time of the Senate, particularly under the conditions existing to-day, to discuss the bill at length.

The Senator from Florida says that the Governments of Europe have not stopped the improvements of their rivers and harbors. Of course they have not, nor has Europe ever undertaken to spend money upon projects such as are contained in this bill. When Europe expends money upon her waterways, it counts for something. Money is not appropriated by European countries for the sole purpose of having it spent in some particular State represented by a Congressman or Senator having a pull.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will my colleague yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the senior Senator from Utah yield to his colleague?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. KING. Is it not a fact that upon the Rhine River, which had an annual commerce before the war of more than 40,000,000 tons per annum, the expenditures have been very much less than have been the expenditures upon the lower thousand miles of the Mississippi River? Is it not also a fact that France, in the appropriations which she makes, requires of the Provinces that they appropriate as much as the parent Government appropriates for the improvement of the waterways?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the statement just made by my colleague is practically correct. Speaking of the River Rhine, the German Government, as you all know, protects and directs the shipments upon that river. The water rates on certain commodities are always higher upon the Rhine than the rates upon the railroads. If the German Government did not interfere to prevent it, the railroads in Germany would drive the commerce off the River Rhine, with the exception of a very few heavy commodities that are transported upon that river. The Government owns the railroads, and the Government controls the shipping upon all of her watercourses; and, as I said to the Senator from Michigan, the Government makes the railroads haul freight for less per hundred pounds than it makes the water carriers haul that same freight from the same point of beginning to its destination.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator from Utah stated a while ago that there were several, if not many, items in this bill that were absolutely indefensible, and indicated that on account of the desire to get through the bill to-day he would not point them out. I think they ought to be pointed out; I think the chairman of the committee ought to welcome the pointing out of such items, even though it may take another day's time upon the part of the Senate. I understand it is contemplated that if this bill is put through to-day we shall adjourn over until Monday. I do not believe that it is treating the country fairly to say that in this bill there are many indefensible items and yet, simply in the interest of getting it through to-day, not point them out. If they are indefensible, they ought to be pointed out.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that I could stand upon this floor and talk until I was black in the face, and every other Senator opposed to these indefensible items could do the same thing, but when the vote was taken every one of them would be voted in the bill, and they will be to-day.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the projects in this bill to which I have reference have been discussed upon this floor time and time again in connection with previous bills. Do Senators think that Germany, for instance, would appropriate money year after year for projects that it would be cheaper to purchase all commerce upon them and get it to the people?

I say now that it would be cheaper for the Government of the United States to buy the merchandise carried on some of these streams and deliver it to the port of destination free of cost to the people than to pay the amounts that have been appropriated for some of these so-called river improvements. Does the Senator want to know some of them? I can refer to them without going into details. This has been exposed time and time again, and yet they appear in every river and harbor bill; and every year there is an additional appropriation made for their so-called improvement. I tell the Senate of the United States, taking into consideration the money that has been expended for creeks and rivers in this country, taking into consideration all the commerce upon many of these streams, that it amounts to a charge paid by the Government of over $100 a ton. Can such an expenditure of public money be justified? I say that no man can justify it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am not justifying these expenditures——

Mr. SMOOT. I know the Senator is not.

Mr. JONES of Washington. But it occurred to me that, even though the Senator may be satisfied that if he points out these objectionable items, when it comes to a vote, they will be adopted, yet, in order that the country may become entirely familiar with these so-called indefensible items, they should be pointed out, and the fact that they may be voted in the bill, notwithstanding they are pointed out, should not deter the Senator from presenting the facts so that they may be available to the country.

Mr. SMOOT. I know this, I will say to the Senator, that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] yesterday spoke perhaps four or five hours, and there were not in this Chamber on the average during that time more than four or five Senators. Such addresses are not listened to; and I will say to the Senator now that just as soon as the remarks of the Senator from Iowa have been printed in the RECORD, the fact will appear that many of the projects are indefensible, and I do not want to consume my strength in repeating and adding to what has already been said concerning those indefensible items when I know it will do no good.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I made my suggestion not because of the effect it might have upon Senators here, for I know that there are not enough Senators interested in this matter, perhaps, to have any effect upon the final result, but I made the suggestion in the interest of having these facts before the country and the people. I would not want the Senator, of course, to consume even two or three hours, but I should think he might call attention to three or four of the items which are especially objectionable, and point out very briefly the reasons why they should not be in the bill. It would probably not take very much time to do that.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think the Senator should recall that the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] just now challenged any Senator to select any item that was not feasible and that should be placed in the category of those which have been so forcefully assailed. Furthermore, he stated that while the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] had pointed out item after item that was indefensible, a glance at the bill itself would show that those items were not included in the bill. Again, he asked any Senator to suggest any indefensible items in the bill. Now, if the Senator can put his finger upon them, I think it is due to the Senate that he should do so.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, Mr. President, the Senator from Florida coupled that statement with the suggestion that he did not need to defend the projects in this bill. Of course he does not need to defend them, because it is known that they are going to be voted in the bill. I will say to the Senator that the projects to which the Senator from Iowa called attention can not be defended in any way, and even the statement that they have been approved by the Army engineers in many instances can not be sustained.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, it seems to me that the Senator from Florida has admitted that; but he says that, while they can not be sustained, they are not in the bill. That is what I want to get at.

Mr. SMOOT I will say to the Senator that the Senator from Iowa did not refer to a single solitary item that is not in this bill.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think the Senator is mistaken about that. Numerous items which are not specifically appropriated for in this bill are estimated for; but the Senator from North Dakota misstates my position also if he imagines that I have admitted that the items to which the Senator from Iowa directed the attention of the Senate were without merit. I have not attempted to present the facts in regard to those items because they are not involved in this bill. Some of those items were provided in the bill which failed last February, because it was not reached on the calendar of the Senate after it had passed the House. I can take care of those when we get to them, but I thought it was not worth while to take up the time of the Senate discussing matters which were in the bill that failed, because they are not before us now. My contention is that this bill has been reduced down to an emergency proposition, and that only such waterways as can be legitimately placed in that category are taken care of in the bill.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. STERLING. It seems to me that in this discussion one factor has been in a way lost sight of, and that is the matter of unexpended balances for many of these so-called improvements. The Senator in charge of the bill criticizes Senators somewhat for not having examined the items of the bill for which appropriations are asked. Mr. President, I have started on that investigation, but it is an investigation not of hours but of days to go through these several groups, as, for example, the one found on page 12, which includes 12 different projects, and find the unexpended balances, not for 1916, but the estimated unexpended balance March 1, 1917, and beyond that the unexpended balance for any of those projects on July 1 of this year as estimated by the Board of Engineers.

I think that highly important, and what I desire by this investigation, which my secretary and myself are now trying to carry on, is to find out with reference to Manteo Bay, Scuppernong, Pamlico, Tar, South Bay, Neuse, and Trent Rivers, Fishing, Contentnia, Swift, and Smith Creeks and waterway connecting Swan Quarter Bay with Deep Bay, N. C., all in one group and for all of which a lump sum of $15,500 is asked to be appropriated.

This is but one of many groups under this so-called grouping system, and I desire to ascertain what the estimated unexpended balances on July 1, 1917, would be in order to determine whether, in times like these, when we should appropriate for necessary improvements only, we are warranted in making an appropriation for such projects in addition to any unexpended balances.

Mr. KING and Mr. FLETCHER addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. To whom does the Senator from Utah yield?

Mr. SMOOT. I will yield in a moment. I want to say to the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] that beyond question there is an unexpended balance of over $31,000,000 for the rivers and harbors of the country.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I will call attention to the report of the minority of the House committee on that matter.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, before the Senator proceeds, will he permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. STERLING. Yes.

Mr. KING. In line with the information which the Senator is attempting to obtain, I want to state to the Senator that I have had my secretary and others at work for two days trying to discover upon the map, atlases, publications, and anything else that they could find, these imaginary creeks, bays, swamps, pools, and what not, for which appropriations are sought in this bill, and they have not yet been able to find any of them.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I think I can answer the Senator's question for him, if the Senator from Utah will allow me.

Mr. SMOOT. If that is all the Senator desires, I will yield.

Mr. STERLING. I should like to call the attention of the Senate to the report of the minority of the House committee on this proposition while I am on the floor, if the Senator from Utah will permit me.

Mr. SMOOT. Very well, I yield.

Mr. STERLING. The minority of the House committee say:

> There is now in the hands of the Army engineers with which to meet emergencies an additional million dollars, which is a balance from the last lump-sum appropriation bill.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am familiar with that.

Mr. STERLING. The report continues:

> and which can be used for the necessary maintenance and improvement of such adopted projects as the judgment of the engineers may decide.

Mr. FLETCHER. I understand that; it is wholly fallacious.

Mr. STERLING. If the Senator from Florida will bear with me just a moment, I want to read this further:

> But of still greater significance are the sheets made up for office use by the engineers, a copy of which is in the hands of the minority. There is hardly an item for which there is not on hand an ample balance to care for the needs of the projects for which Congress has made appropriations.

I want to say in that connection that I have now in my office copies of those sheets, and my secretary is working over them, that I might from the facts obtained therefrom find some intelligent basis on which to vote on this bill. I quote further from the minority report of the House committee:

> These sheets, following the title of improvement, have three columns marked as follows: 2. Balance unexpended March 1, 1917. 3. Balance available, exclusive of outstanding liabilities and contract obligations, March 1, 1917. 4. Estimated balance available, exclusive of outstanding liabilities and contract obligations, July 1, 1917.
> The grand total under column 2, balance unexpended March 1, 1917, is $50,132,978.77; the grand total under column 3, balance available, exclusive of outstanding liabilities and contract obligations, March 1, 1917, $31,428,146.70; the grand total under column 4, estimated balance available, exclusive of outstanding liabilities and contract obligations, July 1, 1917, $19,838,432.37.

Now, Mr. President——

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. I should like to ask the Senator from South Dakota a question. Has the Senator from South Dakota examined the report of the majority of the committee?

Mr. STERLING. I have not read the report of the majority of the committee entirely through.

Mr. NELSON. Would it not be well to give some credit to the majority report as well as to the minority report?

Mr. STERLING. Oh, yes.

Mr. NELSON. If the Senator will turn to the majority report——

Mr. STERLING. I desire to say that I am going on the assumption that the majority report is a fair and correct report from their viewpoint. I am not criticizing the majority report; out I am trying to point out that the minority say—and I think their statement is indisputable—that certain unexpended balances exist. I desire to say further to the Senator from Minnesota that my object is to find out, if I can, what unexpended balances yet remain to the credit of any one of these projects.

It will help me to determine whether to support the appropriation for the project or seek to amend it or strike it out.

Mr. NELSON. I will read a brief extract from the majority report. If the Senator had read it himself he would not have made the statement he has made:

On July 1, 1917, there will be a balance, made up of 397 items, aggregating	$19,838,432.37
Now listen to this—
210 of these items represent localities not appropriated for in pending bill and aggregating	10,019,984.59
This leaves a balance of	9,818,537.59

If the Senator from South Dakota had taken the pains to read the report of the majority of the committee, he would have found how mistaken was the report from which he has read. Of the items which make up the amount of nearly $20,000,000 referred to, 210 are not in this bill and are not covered by it. If the Senator has not a copy of the majority report, I will lend it to him, and he had better read it in connection with the minority report.

Mr. STERLING. I trust that the Senator from Minnesota——

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. FLETCHER. I merely want to add one word.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I desire to proceed now. I have stood here about 10 minutes without saying a word, and I desire to continue.

Mr. FLETCHER. If the Senator will let me interrupt him I will be brief.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah allow me?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. What is the Senator aiming at? Does he want the railroads to have a monopoly of all the transportation business of the country?

Mr. SMOOT. No, Mr. President.

Mr. NELSON. Does he want to join in a game of freeze out against river and harbor improvements just because there are no navigable rivers in Utah?

Mr. SMOOT. No, Mr. President. That statement of the Senator from Minnesota is uncalled for. The Senator from Utah has upon every occasion when he has spoken on a river and harbor bill made the statement that he is only too anxious to improve the navigable rivers and real harbors of the United States.

The Senator from Utah is perfectly willing to appropriate all necessary money for that purpose, but the Senator from Utah is not satisfied to appropriate public money for cleaning out a lot of little creeks with no commerce upon them and no chance of commerce ever being carried upon them.

As far as the railroads are concerned, I care no more about the railroads than I do about any other business in the country. I am just as much interested in water transportation as I am in railroad transportation, and I was rather surprised to hear the Senator from Minnesota make that statement.

Mr. President, I did not rise to discuss the details of this bill, as I said; but let me call attention to one thing: We are appropriating money now with a view of hiring men and to purchase and to use material on projects in this bill that never ought to have been undertaken at a time when material is at the highest prices that were ever known in the history of the world, at a time when wages are higher than at any former time in the history of our country, and at a time when every man can be employed in some other avocation that is absolutely necessary for the carrying on of the war in which we are now engaged. Why, Mr. President, if a business man were to undertake to invest in these projects, even though they were projects worthy of investment, he never would take the present time to do it; and, as we have this unexpended balance, it seems to me that appropriation is sufficient for most of the projects here; and where there are projects that are absolutely necessary to be improved—not only the rivers but the harbors of our country—that will assist in any way in carrying forward the commerce of this country, and particularly the commerce that is needed for the advancement of the war, I would say grant the appropriation without a question.

Every Army engineer ought to be with his command, and will necessarily be there, I am afraid, before the next 12 months pass. Why take these Army engineers, that will be so much wanted in the field, to spend their time in overseeing work upon creeks and streams that will cost the Government of the United States $50 to $100 a ton for all the commerce that passes over them? No one can justify a condition like that, Mr. President.

I have said time and time again that I do not believe in this piecemeal method of appropriation. I believe that wherever there is a project—and there are a great many of them in this bill—that ought to be appropriated for; we ought to appropriate enough money to finish it. I would even go so far in such cases as to appropriate more money, if it can be expended within the year; but the projects in this bill that are indefensible I think we ought to eliminate. I know, however, that it can not be done.

Now, Mr. President, I will say no more about the bill and allow it to pass, just as I know it will.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I have sat here patiently and kept silent and avoided saying anything on this bill, but statesmen have lately made remarks that force me no longer to keep silent.

We are now in the midst of a great war. There are a great many styles and ways of putting monkey wrenches in the wheel, to use a slang expression. We had an illustration of that in the morning papers yesterday, in the form of an ostensible report from officers who had returned from Europe as to how dangerous the situation there was. So far as those newspaper accounts were concerned they aimed to put us into a state of gloom. Then we have another line of attack. It is to scare the country with the amount of appropriations—how much this is going to cost, how many bonds we have got to issue, how many taxes we will have to pay.

What is the object of that? What good can it accomplish except to unnerve and frighten the American people while they are engaged in a great war? If there ever was a time, Mr. President, when we needed water transportation more than ever, it is now. Our water transportation for the last few years, in spite of the improvements we have been making, has been hamstrung and knocked in the head by knockers of various kinds, especially on the part of the railroads, in order that they might monopolize the trade. The railroads have paralleled our great rivers; they have reached out in all directions; and their game from first to last has been a game of freeze out, to freeze out river transportation.

The other day I was down in one of the departments of the Government. I will not name the officer with whom I talked, but he had a patriotic view of the matter. He said: "If the railroads would coordinate and cooperate with our system of water transportation, there would not be the complaint of car shortage that there is now, but they will not do it; they will make such rates, where they control the sides of the river, that they drive the boats off the river. If it is a case of joint rates, although the distance by rail may be only a quarter of the aggregate distance, yet they will impose such rates for that quarter that the water end of it can not afford to run. Why," said he, "the coal from the Pennsylvania coal fields could be shipped to tidewater at Philadelphia and from there pass down by boat and be delivered at Norfolk, at Washington, at Baltimore, and at other points; but the railroads will not give such rates that the boats can afford to join them in carrying the coal on a through rate."

Less than 10 days ago a trainload of produce arrived at St. Paul from the West on one of the great transcontinental lines. The goods were to be forwarded down the river to points on both sides of the Mississippi. They tried to secure cars for shipping those goods, and they could not do it. Our people have been trying to establish, and have finally succeeded in establishing, a line of barges on the Mississippi River. They finally found that the man who ran those boats was willing to take the stuff. The next day the railroads had an ample supply of cars and took that stuff away from the barges. So the effect of the action of these gentlemen who are all the time knocking river improvements—I do not say they intend to do it; I do not accuse them of any bad motives—but I say the effect of their action is to play into the hands of the railroad companies.

Our people now, since we have gotten the big dam completed between Minneapolis and St. Paul, and the locks opened so that navigation extends up to the wharves of Minneapolis, have organized a barge line, and the Government engineers assigned to duty in connection with our river and harbor improvements have been kind enough to loan some of their barges for this transportation; and now, while we are unable to get sufficient coal from the ports on the Lakes up by way of Duluth, our people are reaching out to get Iowa and Illinois coal and Ohio coal by means of barges along the Ohio River and the Mississippi River. We feel the need of this water transportation. This war will work many changes. It will increase our shipping, and I have faith to believe that, if we do not check it or restrain it, it will be the means of increasing our water transportation, for we need it now more than ever.

Take a State like my State of Minnesota, for example, one of the great agricultural States of this Union, and, I want to say to my friends from Utah, one of the great mining States of this Union. We need water transportation as badly as any part of the country, and our people are not talking about "pork-barrel" legislation every time there is a river and harbor bill up. Over half of the iron ore—I do not know but 70 per cent of all the iron ore produced in the United States—comes from the mines of Minnesota. Unfortunately, we are not supplied with coal in Minnesota. Our iron ore is carried down the Great Lakes to the ports on Lake Erie and distributed at those ports. Among those ports is the one that the Senator from Ohio referred to, the harbor of Lorain, one of the greatest ore ports in that country. Our big ore-carrying boats have a tonnage of from ten to fifteen thousand tons, and they go down there with their iron ore and bring back coal to Minnesota. Unfortunately, however, while they bring the iron ore down there, they have not, in the last year nor this year, been able to secure a supply of coal for a return cargo; and because of that fact to-day the people of the Northwest are looking to the waters of the Mississippi River and to the advantages that that river gives us. We know that the railroads will continue to do as they have always done—to head off water transportation in every conceivable way.

Why, at St. Paul one of the railroads has the terminal facilities, the river facilities. Our steamboats are practically at the mercy of one of the old railroads there, because they own the water front. At Minneapolis fortunately the people have had the wisdom to secure the river front of the new navigation; and now to deprive us of this, just because of the war, seems to me cruel—as cruel as it can be. The idea that because a few of these engineers may be needed at the front in France all river and harbor improvements in the country must be suspended and at a standstill seems to me monstrous.

It is not only a question of the new works—and they are quite limited in this bill—but it is a question of taking care of the old works that have been completed. People ought to know that many of these improvements are completed, and it is a question of maintenance. You take a port on the Atlantic coast. It may have been dredged out to a sufficient depth. Take one of the tidal streams, what they call creeks or streams here. They are little tidal basins. Take one of those streams. It may be dredged out and put in a navigable condition, but because of the wind and tide it is continually filling up and it requires dredging.

The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] referred to an item on page 12, embracing a lot of little streams on the seacoast. If he had read along, right at the end of that he would have found that the entire appropriation was only $15,000, and it was not to make these harbors, but simply to maintain them and keep them in working order, so as not to allow them to deteriorate.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. STERLING. It was just for that object that I spoke of unexpended balances; and I wanted to examine the record of the Board of Army Engineers for the purpose of determining what were the unexpended balances with reference to these 6 items of the 12 items in the list to which the Senator from Minnesota referred.

Mr. NELSON. The Senator will find that the balances are extremely limited, because in most cases there has been no appropriation, except for maintenance, for a number of years.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, if the Senator from Minnesota will allow me, I should like to answer the question of the Senator from South Dakota.

The Senator from South Dakota quotes from a minority report in the House of Representatives. Evidently he has not read the report of the majority of the Commerce Committee. There is no minority report as to that.

Mr. STERLING. I have read a good part of the report of the majority of the committee, and I have had it before me during the last two days, more or less, comparing it with the report of the Army engineers.

Mr. FLETCHER. What I want to say is this: If the Senator will refer to page 2 of that report he will find that specific question answered, not by the committee, not by me, not by any member of the committee, but by the Chief of Engineers himself. If the Senator will just turn to that, I will read the letter to Mr. SMALL, chairman of the Rivers and Harbors Committee of the House:

In response to your letter of May 25 requesting a statement of the reasons why the existence of the available balances for river and harbor works on March 1, 1917, to which attention is called in the minority report on the river and harbor bill, does not affect the necessity for the additional appropriations proposed in the bill, I have to state that the main and sufficient reason is that these balances all contemplate different work from that proposed with the funds carried in the bill.

Now, that is conclusive. Why argue further about it? The statement is made that whhtever these available balances may be, no matter whether you run them up to forty millions or forty billions, not a dollar of the amount is available for meeting the appropriations provided for in this bill; so it will not make any difference what that available balance may be.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, if the Senator from Minnesota will pardon me——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield further?

Mr. NELSON. Yes.

Mr. STERLING. Let me suggest to the Senator from Florida that I so frequently come across this statement in the report of the Army engineers with reference to any particular item. The statement is made that so much money—$1,000, $5,000, or $10,000, as the case may be—"may be profitably expended"; not that it is necessary, but that it "may be profitably expended"; and so on, item after item. That is the statement of the Board of Army Engineers. It is not quite satisfactory to me under existing conditions to have the statement simply that it may be profitably expended, without any further statement as to the need.

Mr. FLETCHER. That is not the statement, if the Senator will listen to it. The letter says distinctly:

I have to state that the main and sufficient reason is that these balances—

These available balances that the Senator is troubled about—

All contemplate different work from that proposed with the funds carried in the bill.

So that they are entirely outside of the items in this bill.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, it seems to me that now, while we are in the midst of this war, while there is a great shortage of coal throughout the country, while it is a question of distributing the iron ore and the supplies of this country, military and other supplies, we need water transportation more than ever.

The ore from our great mines on Lake Superior comes through the Soo Canal, goes down, and is distributed along the Lake ports. Even my good friends from Indiana—I do not see them on the floor at this time—have a harbor in their State, Indiana Harbor, which is quite a beneficiary of the Government improvement that has been made at that point, and which secures large quantities of the ore from Minnesota. Take the many harbors in the State of Ohio, Lorain, Toledo, and the other places farther east of that—I do not recall them at this moment—the ore from the great mines on Lake Superior is shipped to those ports, and the boats bring back coal. As I said a moment ago, unfortunately the boats can not secure now the supply of coal that we ought to have, and we are relegated now more than ever to the waters of the Ohio and the Mississippi Rivers, and even to the Missouri River.

Great improvements have been carried on upon the Ohio River by the Government, and great advantages will inure to the country by means of the shipment of coal. The coal from the mines of West Virginia and Ohio can be carried down the Ohio River and thence to the mouth of the Mississippi River and furnished to our Navy there as cheaply as the railroads can carry it over the Allegheny Mountains to the seaboard at Norfolk and other points.

I never could see any glory in knocking at our river transportation because of late years, owing to the fact that the railroads have been knocking it, it has not shown up as much as it ought to have shown up in the matter of tons carried on the water; but here is one benefit that has come to us, and it has come to all the shippers of the Northwest: The fact that these watercourses have been open, the fact that we have had these great navigable rivers, has compelled the railroads to give our people reduced rates, and we have had the benefit of it all over the country.

If the iron ore from Minnesota had to come all the way by rail to your great places in Ohio, just think in what a fix you would be. If all the coal from the Ohio and West Virginia mines had to come by rail to the Northwest, to Wisconsin and Minnesota, where would our people be? Why, Mr. President, there never was a time when we needed water transportation more than we do in the present emergency; and I am surprised that just because a few Army engineers may be needed in Europe men now advocate the idea that all our river improvements should be brought to a standstill, and everything should be at a deadlock, and our people should not have the advantage of what we have been struggling for years to secure, and what we need now more than ever.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, is there an amendment pending?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is; on page 21.

Mr. HARDING. I did not understand that that could be the case when we are considering the bill as it came from the House.

Mr. FLETCHER. The amendment on page 21, Mr. President, is really just to correct the addition of the House bill; that is all. It is on line 22.

Mr. HARDING. I will wait, then.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 25, after line 23, to insert:

Provided, That there shall be expended, out of the $1,000,000 above appropriated, as soon as practicable, and, if possible, before June 1, 1918, $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, at Cambridge Bend, near Glasgow, Mo., from the head of said bend to Bowlers Point, in constructing all necessary new works and in putting in thorough repair existing works, so that the same shall effectively protect the banks and confine the river to its channel at and along said bend: And provided further, That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to transfer to the Missouri River for work thereon, free of cost, two dredges not necessarily employed elsewhere.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was on page 29, line 10, after the word "maintenance," to insert "in accordance with report submitted to Committee on Commerce on March 29, 1917, in Senate Document No. 57," so as to make the clause read:

Columbia and lower Willamette Rivers below Vancouver, Wash., and Portland, Oreg., and mouth of Columbia River, Oreg. and Wash.: Continuing improvement and for maintenance, in accordance with report submitted to Committee on Commerce on March 29, 1917, in Senate Document No. 57, $310,000: Provided, That of the funds herein appropriated $6,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, may be expended in completing improvement at Cathlamet, Wash., in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 120, Sixty-third Congress, first session.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. Did the Senator from Ohio desire to address the Chair? If so, I will yield.

Mr. HARDING. Not at this point. I want to offer an amendment presently.

Mr. KING. I wanted to ask the chairman of the committee, if he will kindly answer the interrogatory, whether or not any provision is made in this bill where a so-called waterway is purely local for the State to contribute anything for its maintenance or for the construction of any of the new projects which are purely intrastate?

Mr. FLETCHER. In some instances where new projects are adopted here, and reference is made to a House document of such and such a number, local contribution is provided for. That depends on the report of the engineers. Where a survey is ordered, and the report comes in, and the engineers consider that local interests are such that they ought to cooperate, they so recommend. Then, when the project is adopted, it is adopted with that condition in it, and the reference to the document carries with it that condition, just the same as if it were set forth in the act.

There is no provision in this bill requiring the States in every instance to contribute or to take care of the project, or to do anything of that sort. What is required depends on the provisions of the document that is referred to.

Mr. JONES of Washington. May I suggest that there is a general law which requires that engineers in reporting on these surveys shall make such recommendations as they deem advisable for cooperation by the locality?

Mr. FLETCHER. That is quite true; and I will illustrate what I mean to the Senator from Utah. You will find, for instance, in the bill on page 18:

For completing improvement from Mermentau River to Sabine River, La. and Tex., in accordance with the report submitted in Senate Document No. 705, Sixty-fourth Congress, second session, and subject to the conditions set forth in said document.

Mr. RANSDELL. There is a contribution of $230,000 by the local people. The Government provides $230,000 and the local people put up $230,000. It is thought the local people, having some direct interest in it, should contribute an equal amount.

Mr. FLETCHER. There is such a requirement, as the Senator from Washington says, and generally they state that such local cooperation shall be required as the circumstances justify.

Mr. KING. I wish to say to the Senator in charge of the bill that I have made some examination in the limited time that has been at my disposal and I can not find that any substantial contribution has been made by any State to the large number of little petty streams and streamlets for which appropriations have been made. For instance, in the numerous little streams in the State of Florida I can not find, with respect to those streams, that the State of Florida has made any substantial appropriation, and I do not find in this bill or in any other of the bills any provision looking to a proper and a broad and comprehensive plan of activity by which the States within which the local projects are being constructed shall make annually a certain contribution for maintenance and to pay a certain proportion of the cost of the construction of the project. Does not the Senator think, if he will permit an interrogation based upon that statement, that the committee ought to have evolved some plan and submitted it here as a part of a comprehensive system of dealing with this important question, by which the States that are aided, if there is any aid at all from any of these little streams, shall make a part of the contribution for the building of the project and pay a part of the expenses for maintaining it?

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HARDING. I wanted to answer the Senator from Utah with respect to two of the improvements carried in the bill located in the State of Ohio. There is a survey provided for the harbor of Cleveland which contemplates in the engineers' report an expenditure on the part of the Government not to exceed $400,000. It is not contained in this bill, however. The expenditure of the city of Cleveland in connection with that same improvement is expected to reach in excess of $3,000,000. On Lorain Harbor, which has raised more or less controversy, the municipality of Lorain has expended more than eight times the sum proposed in this bill in bringing about the improvement.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I wish to ask the Senator from Ohio whether it would not be very equitable and fair to the people of Ohio that there should have been a certain percentage provided for in the bill, so that Ohio would not be required to put up $3,000,000 in one instance and eight times the amount in the other, when other projects that are no more meritorious than the Cleveland project and the Lorain project are paid for out of the General Treasury of the United States?

Mr. HARDING. I can only answer the Senator from Colorado very briefly. I say I think our whole policy is wrong and ought to be modified.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does not the Senator believe there ought to be some fixed proportion between the States in which the improvement is to be made or the county or the city and the General Government, so that there will be equitable treatment all around instead of this haphazard manner of allowing at the instance of an engineer or some one else a large amount in one instance and a very small amount in another, and in another nothing at all?

Mr. HARDING. I do not think that a statutory limit could be established, nor do I think Congress is capable of equitably adjusting such allotments.

Mr. SHAFROTH. If they were to make the percentage reasonably small——

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I wish to answer the Senator from Utah before we get too far away from that point.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Very well. Inasmuch as this matter comes up on an amendment which I shall propose, I will defer what I have to say.

Mr. FLETCHER. I simply want before we get clear away from the specific question asked by the Senator from Utah to answer it. He asked me about the little creeks and streams and rivulets of Florida, why they should not pay some part by local contributions. I am unable to find any of those little creeks and streams mentioned in this bill or any other bill I have ever seen providing an appropriation for any waterway in Florida.

I presume the Senator refers, as the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] seems to think, to some of the waterways there which are classified as creeks and streams. I think the Senator from Iowa made some reference a few days ago to Banana Creek as if it was a very insignificant proposition, even though it involved the mere survey. Banana Creek happens to be three-eighths of a mile wide, and it connects a little waterway known as Indian River, which is about 3 miles wide at that point, and it is over a mile wide throughout over its entire length of almost 300 miles, connecting inland waterways extending over 500 miles. That was one of those little streams in Florida averaging a width of over a mile, and extending nearly 500 miles in length. Banana Creek happens to connect the little waterway with another small waterway known as Banana River, which is about a mile and a half wide and connects with Indian River.

Those are the sort of little creeks in Florida that have been mentioned here.

As to contributions, the first item on page 16, for the St. Johns River, the county bonded itself years ago for some $500,000 as a first contribution toward deepening the St. Johns River. The county of Duval, of which Jacksonville is the county seat, issued its bonds and commenced that improvement. The other items in that paragraph is the Oklawaha River, for which there are only $5,000 provided in the way of maintenance in this bill. That is all, $5,000, to maintain a waterway 117 miles long, connecting five or six lakes 6 or 8 miles across, carrying products from that vicinity of the farm, and agricultural stuff as well as vegetables, fruit, and the like, breaking bulk but once—namely, when getting to a larger port at Jacksonville, and from there to Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and all parts of the world. That waterway connects it.

These other items are of no consequence; for instance, half a dozen of them carrying an appropriation of $10,000 for maintenance. That is all that is appropriated for maintaining these waterways for a year.

I want to say in regard to the small creeks of Florida, which are spoken of as if they amounted to nothing, I do not feel that I ought by my silence to admit the justice of any such implication as to those streams. Sometimes a stream is called a creek, which would be called in some parts of the world a tremendous river.

I do not know that there is anything further to say except on this matter of contribution that it is largely based upon what the engineers pass upon when they report on a project.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, on page 33, after line 22, to strike out:

Inland water route along the southern shore of Long Island, N. Y., from Jamaica Bay to Peconic Bay, with a view to providing a channel of adequate width and depth.

and to insert:

The item for preliminary examination of Jamaica Bay with a view to obtaining a channel 100 feet wide and 6 feet deep to and through Great South Bay to Peconic Bay, including channels to Parsonage and Sumpawans River and Freeport and Massapequa Creeks, in the river and harbor act approved March 2, 1907, is modified to permit the consideration of a channel of suitable depth and width.

Mr. KING. I should like to ask the chairman in charge of the bill the scope of this amendment, whether or not it contemplates the entering upon a new project; and if so, the estimated cost of the same?

Mr. FLETCHER. It is merely for a survey. It does not call for any appropriation at all. It depends altogether on whether the engineer will report that it is worthy of investigation and survey. He then estimates the cost and they make the estimate of the cost finally and decide whether a commercial justification exists for it or not, and make their report upon the project to Congress. It is merely calling for an investigation as to a survey.

Mr. KING. I so understand; but is it not a fact that in the overwhelming majority of instances wherever a survey is ordered it is followed by the adoption of the project later on by the Government?

Mr. CALDER. If the Senator from Florida will permit me——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. FLETCHER. No; the Senator is entirely wrong about that.

Just in answer to this one question, I will say the facts are given in a communication from the Chief of Engineers on that very point. I am very glad the Senator alluded to it, as perhaps there is some misunderstanding about it, and this letter ought to go into the RECORD. It is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
Washington, July 25, 1917.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Chairman Committee on Commerce,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR FLETCHER: 1. In response to a request by telephone received from Senator RANSDELL, a member of the Committee on Commerce, I take pleasure in furnishing the accompanying memorandum showing the number of examination and survey reports ordered by Congress from and including the river and harbor act of June 13, 1902, the number of reports submitted thereon, and the number of these reports which were favorable and unfavorable. In the time allotted it has not been practicable to extend the table to include the examinations and surveys ordered by the act of March 3, 1899, the one preceding that for 1902.

2. As the act for 1902 is the one creating the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, all reports made since that date have been subjected to the same test, and it is believed that any figures given for a period prior to the above date would not be comparable, as the method of passing upon projects was under a different system.

3. I trust that the foregoing may serve all your needs.

Very sincerely, yours,

W. M. BLACK,
Brigadier General, Chief of Engineers.

Memorandum in re reports on examinations and surveys ordered by Congress.

That is the actual record, and I now yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, just a word as to what the Senator from Florida has said in reply to the inquiry of the Senator from Utah. You will observe that the method of making this survey has been changed. There was a survey authorized for this improvement many years ago for a 6-foot channel. The engineers were about to report against it, because 6 feet were of no value. The Legislature of New York State took the matter up this year, and they have provided for an expenditure of $1,000,000 for this waterway improvement, if the War Department recommends it and Congress finally approves the project. It is expected that the improvement recommended and authorized will cost in the neighborhood of $3,500,000, of which our State will pay substantially one-fourth.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 34, after line 22, to insert:

Northwest River, Va.-N. C.

Mr. MARTIN. I move to add an amendment giving some particulars about that survey. I send to the desk an amendment to follow it in addition to the amendment proposed by the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the amendment the following:

From at or near Woodward's bridge up stream, so flat lighters, etc., may ascend, with a width of channel of not less than 40 feet, as far as the Cornland Causeway Road or beyond that point as far as practicable, and to take into consideration any proposition for the cooperation on the part of local or State interests for the payment of one-half the expense of this project, and to report the possible utility of the whole river, from its mouth to its source, if adequately improved to meet the requirements of its connecting waters, for the national defense.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Virginia to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think that amendment is entirely proper. It merely makes the amendment a little more specific.

Mr. KING. I should like to ask the Senator from Virginia if this is a new project and what the necessity of it is at this time as a part of our preparedness program?

Mr. MARTIN. I do not know that it has any relation to our preparedness program. It is a new project. This is simply for an investigation by the engineering department of the Government to report to Congress that we may later on determine whether it ought to be undertaken by the Government or not.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 37, to insert:

Tchula Lake, tributary of the Yazoo River, Miss.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 38, after line 3, to insert:

Black River, Ark. and Mo., above Black Rock, Ark., an instrumental survey with a view to preparing plans and estimates of cost for caring for flood waters in said river and to determining whether a portion of the flood waters of the St. Francois River should be diverted to the Black River, and what additional cost such diversion would involve in connection with the works on the Black River. The report of survey shall also include consideration of any proposition by local interests for participation in the expense of said project on account of the reclamation of contiguous lands or other lands subject to overflow by said streams.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 40, to insert:

Petaluma Creek, Cal.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 41, after line 2, to insert:

East Channel, Coos River, Oreg.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 41, line 16, after the word "no," to insert "examination," and in line 18, after the word "shall," to insert "direct," so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That no examination or survey herein provided for shall be made until after the close of the war with Germany except such as the Secretary of War shall direct.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 41, after line 18, to insert as a new section the following:

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and empowered to grant leases or licenses to municipal corporations and to public service or other corporations for the use of the surplus water not needed for purposes of navigation at the United States Government dams constructed at Lake Winnibigoshish and at Lake Pokegama, in the State of Minnesota, at such rates and compensation as he may deem just and reasonable, giving to municipal corporations the preference. That such leases or licenses shall not extend beyond the period of 50 years, and that the moneys paid for the same shall go into the Treasury of the United States, to be used for the maintenance of the dams and the improvement of navigation in said river. The Secretary of War shall make such rules, regulations, and conditions as he may deem necessary to protect the interests of navigation and the United States, and the same shall be incorporated in the leases or licenses.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 42, after line 10, to insert as a new section the following:

SEC. 6. That Congress hereby consents that the States of Minnesota, North Dakota, and South Dakota, or any two of them, may enter into any agreement or agreements with each other to aid in improving navigation and to prevent and control floods on boundary waters of said States and the waters tributary thereto. And said States, or any two of them, may agree with each other upon any project or projects for the purpose of making such improvements, and upon the amount of money to be contributed by each to carry out such projects. The Secretary of War is authorized and directed to make a survey of any project proposed, as aforesaid, by said States, or any two of them, to determine the feasibility and practicability thereof and the expenses of carrying the same into effect and what share of such expenses should be borne by the respective States, local interests, or by the National Government. If the Secretary of War approves any such projects, he may authorize the States to make such improvements at their own expense, but under his supervision. That the sum of $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any funds in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of enabling the Secretary of War to make the surveys and estimates herein contemplated.

Mr. KING. As I understand this amendment—and I ask the Senator having the bill in charge if my understanding is correct—it is to provide a lump sum for making a survey for such new projects as have been included in the bill.

Mr. FLETCHER. The amendment under consideration is section 6.

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. FLETCHER. That has reference to particular projects.

Mr. KING. It is limited, then, merely to the two projects referred to in the section?

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. If the Senator from Utah wants an explanation, I can give it.

Mr. KING. I would be very glad to receive an explanation from the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. I will simply say that the Red River of the North and its tributaries are the boundary waters between the States of Minnesota and North and South Dakota. They have a lot of low and wet land they want to drain into that river, and the question is how they can utilize that river, together with the Minnesota River, which is close to it. The States proposed to make the improvement, but, inasmuch as the question of navigation may be involved, they want the Government to lay out the work and have the work done under its supervision. That is all there is in it. Otherwise, if a part of it were not a navigable stream and a boundary water, the States would go on of their own accord and do it.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator permit an inquiry?

Mr. NELSON. Yes; certainly.

Mr. KING. This does not involve any further expenditure on the part of the National Government looking to the reclamation of the lands of the State?

Mr. NELSON. No. The States will reclaim the land. They simply want it determined how the Red River of the North and the Minnesota River can be utilized to take off the surface water. That is all there is in it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I think that it ought to be stated, in addition, that by reason of a drainage system, already adopted not only in Minnesota but in North Dakota, a greater amount of water was thrown from the lowlands into the tortuous Red River than the river was capable of handling. The result was that vast stretches of that land have been overflowed with water after the grain had been seeded, destroying hundreds of thousands of acres. Neither Minnesota, North Dakota, nor South Dakota is asking one dollar's aid on the part of the Government on account of this damage; but they do ask that they may act together, even though the work covers a navigable stream over which the United States claims jurisdiction and has jurisdiction, to the end that they may at their own expense prevent a recurrence of such floods as this and may contribute to the expense of the project such amount as may be agreed upon by all three of the States, the work to be supervised by the Federal Government.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, on page 44, after line 9, to insert:

That, in the interest of the national defense and for the better protection of life and property on said waters, the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and empowered to prescribe such regulations as he may deem best for the use and navigation of any portion of areas of the navigable waters of the United States or waters under the jurisdiction of the United States endangered or likely to be endangered by Coast Artillery fire in target practice or otherwise, or by the proving operations of the Government ordnance proving ground at Sandy Hook, N. J., or at any Government ordnance proving ground that may be established elsewhere on or near such waters, and of any portion or area of said waters occupied by submarine mines, mine fields, submarine cables, or other material and accessories pertaining to seacoast fortifications, or by any plant or facility engaged in the execution of any public project or river and harbor improvement; and the said Secretary of War shall have like power to regulate the transportation of explosives upon any of said waters.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 45, after line 3, to insert:

That to enforce the regulations prescribed pursuant to this act the Secretary of War may detail any public vessel in the service of the War Department, or, upon the request of the Secretary of War, the head of any other department may enforce, and the head of any such department is hereby authorized to enforce, such regulations by means of any public vessel of such department.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 45, line 11, to change the number of the section from "7" to "9."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 47, line 3, to change the number of the section from "9" to "11."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 47, line 10, to change the number of the section from "10" to "12," and, in line 12, after the words "Betterton-Morgan Company," to strike out the word "Incorporated" in parentheses and insert "Inc.," so as to read:

SEC. 12. That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized, under such terms, including a reasonable rental, to be approved by him, to permit the Betterton-Morgan Company (Inc.) to construct a dock or docks upon lots 1, 4, and 5, block 6, Seattle tidelands, or upon such portions thereof as he may designate, the construction of said docks to be under the supervision of and all material used therein to be approved by the Secretary of War, and the necessary expenses of such supervision and construction to be borne by said company.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I want to carry that amendment a little further. I want the parentheses stricken out; but it seems as though the printer must have changed this to suit himself. The letters "Inc." are a part of the name of the company. I therefore want the parentheses also stricken out.

Mr. FLETCHER. It seems almost impossible to get that printed correctly. We have had it several times, and the printers either insert the word "incorporated" in full or put it in parentheses, neither of which is warranted. The amendment suggested by the Senator from Washington, of course, is entirely proper.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, on page 48, after line 8, to insert as a new section the following:

SEC. 13. That amounts hereafter paid by private parties or other agencies for rental of plant owned by the Government in connection with the prosecution of river and harbor works shall be deposited in each case to the credit of the appropriation to which the plant belongs.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 48, line 14, to change the number of the section from "11" to "14."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 50, after line 4, to insert as a new section the following:

SEC. 15. That Mosquito Creek, in Colleton County, S. C., be, and the same is hereby, declared to be a nonnavigable stream within the meaning of the Constitution and laws of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 50, after line 8, to insert as a new section the following:

SEC. 16. That a commission, to be known as the waterways commission, consisting of seven members to be appointed by the President of the United States, at least one of whom shall be chosen from the active or retired list of the Engineer Corps of the Army, at least one of whom shall be an expert hydraulic engineer from civil life, is hereby created and authorized, under such rules and regulations as it may adopt, to bring into coordination and cooperation the engineering, scientific, and constructive services, bureaus, boards, and commissions of the several governmental departments of the United States and commissions created by Congress that relate to study, development, or control of waterways and water resources and subjects related thereto, or to the development and regulation of interstate and foreign commerce, with a view to uniting such services in investigating, with respect to all watersheds in the United States, questions relating to the development, improvement, regulation, and control of navigation as a part of interstate and foreign commerce, including therein the related questions of irrigation, drainage, forestry, arid and swamp land reclamation, clarification of streams, regulation of flow, control of floods, utilization of water power, prevention of soil erosion and waste, storage, and conservation of water for agricultural, industrial, municipal, and domestic uses, cooperation of railways and waterways, and promotion of terminal and transfer facilities, to secure the necessary data, and to formulate and report to Congress, as early as practicable, a comprehensive plan or plans for the development of waterways and the water resources of the United States for the purposes of navigation and for every useful purpose, and recommendations for the modification or discontinuance of any project herein or heretofore adopted. Any member appointed from the retired list shall receive the same pay and allowances as he would if on the active list, and members selected from civil life shall receive compensation of $7,500 per annum.

In all matters done, or to be done, under this section relating to any of the subjects, investigations, or questions to be considered hereunder, and in formulating plans, and in the preparation of a report or reports, as herein provided, consideration shall be given to all matters which are to be undertaken, either independently by the United States or by cooperation between the United States and the several States, political subdivisions thereof, municipalities, communities, corporations, and individuals within the jurisdiction, powers, and rights of each, respectively, and with a view to assigning to the United States such portion of such development, promotion, regulation, and control as may be undertaken by the United States, and to the States, political subdivisions thereof, municipalities, communities, corporations, and individuals such portions as belong to their respective jurisdictions, rights, and interests.

The commission is authorized to employ, or retain, and fix the compensation for the services of such engineers, transportation experts, experts in water development and utilization, and constructors of eminence as it may deem necessary to make such investigations and to carry out the purposes of this section. And in order to defray the expenses made necessary by the provisions of this section there is hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as Congress may hereafter determine, and the sum of $100,000 is hereby appropriated, available until expended, to be paid out upon warrants drawn on the Secretary of the Treasury by the chairman of said commission.

The commission shall have power to make every expenditure requisite for and incident to its authorized work, and to employ in the District of Columbia and in the field such clerical, legal, engineering, artistic, and expert services as it may deem advisable, including the payment of per diem in lieu of subsistence for employees engaged in field work or traveling on official business, rent of offices in the District of Columbia and in the field, and the purchase of books, maps, and office equipment.

Nothing herein contained shall be construed to delay, prevent, or interfere with the completion of any survey, investigation, project, or work herein or heretofore or hereafter adopted or authorized upon or for the improvement of any of the rivers or harbors of the United States or with legislative action upon reports heretofore or hereafter presented.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. LODGE. Before the vote is taken on the amendment, I should like to ask if this is what is known as the Newlands amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that it is.

Mr. FLETCHER. It is very different from what was known as the Newlands amendment as presented in a former bill, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. LODGE. It commits us to an expenditure of about $600,000,000, does it not?

Mr. RANSDELL. It does not commit us to anything.

Mr. FLETCHER. This is merely an investigating commission. It does not commit us to anything. It is altogether different from the former proposition.

Mr. LODGE. It is the beginning of a $600,000,000 expenditure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the committee.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, before the amendment is agreed to I want to ask the chairman of the committee whether it is his purpose to obtain a vote upon this bill this evening? The reason that I make the inquiry is that I had intended submitting some observations upon the bill and upon the general policies of the Government in dealing with these projects. I want to state to the Senator that if I adhere to my present purpose it will take perhaps an hour or an hour and a half for me to present my views upon these matters, but if we shall adjourn until to-morrow it may be that I will defer speaking at all upon the bill. My intention is, if I speak to-day, to discuss at some length the unwise course pursued by the Government in dealing with the important subject of harbors and waterways, and to point out the millions, if not hundreds of millions, of dollars wasted under the present system, and also to condemn this bill and suggest reasons why it should be defeated.

Mr. FLETCHER. I desire to say to the Senator that if I can—it is only now half past 4 o'clock—I desire to get through with the bill this evening. I see no good reason why we can not do so.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. KING. I am very glad to do so.

Mr. MARTIN. I merely want to say, for the information of the Senator and for that of other Senators, that there has been a very general desire expressed to have the Senate adjourn over until Monday, which can not well be done unless this bill is completed. So, while I have no desire whatever to curtail the remarks of the Senator from Utah, I think it very desirable that he should make them this evening, and that the Senate should remain in session until this bill is finally voted on, in order that we may adjourn over until Monday.

Mr. KING. Would the Senator permit me to inquire what great harm would ensue to the country if this bill should not be passed to-night?

Mr. MARTIN. I do not know that any great harm would ensue; but we are here to pass laws; this one is ready for the consideration of the Senate; and I think it is up to us to proceed to consider it and dispose of it. We have nothing else to do this afternoon; it is just half past 4 o'clock, and there is no reason why the Senator from Utah should not address the Senate for such length of time as he desires. The Senate could then vote on the bill and adjourn over until Monday.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. KING. I do.

Mr. KENYON. I desire to ask the Senator from Virginia, who is the leader on the Democratic side, if he thinks the Senate should adjourn over until Monday, in view of the fact that the conferees may report on the food-control bill?

Mr. MARTIN. If I thought it was possible that the conferees would report on the food-control bill I should certainly be opposed to adjourning over; but there is not the remotest possibility of a report on the food bill before Monday, from all the information that I have.

Mr. KENYON. I do not agree with the Senator as to that.

Mr. MARTIN. I do not know whether there are any conferees on that bill present, but that is what the conferees with whom I have talked told me, that they expected a very tedious and protracted conference before they could reach an agreement.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I understand the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] himself is a member of the committee of conference on that bill.

Mr. MARTIN. All of the conferees who have spoken to me on the subject have expressed the opinion that it would take a good many days to reach an agreement. I have not heretofore heard it suggested as remotely possible that the conferees would agree between this time and Monday.

Mr. KENYON. The conferees expect to work to-night far into the night to endeavor either to agree or report back that they can not agree. While I can not speak at all for the conferees, I am inclined to believe that there will be some kind of report here before the week is over, and I do not think the Senate ought to adjourn.

Mr. MARTIN. I respectfully submit that the questions in difference will require more time for deliberation than exists between now and Monday.

Mr. SMOOT. The report must be submitted to the House first, at any rate.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, the committee amendments have all been disposed of, have they not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No. The question is on agreeing to the last committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have an amendment which I desire to offer on behalf of the committee.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida is recognized.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] really presented the amendment, but the committee has agreed to it. I send the amendment to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 24, at the bottom of the page, it is proposed to insert the following:

The Mississippi River Commission shall forthwith make an examination of the Memphis Harbor, on the Mississippi River at the mouth of Wolf River, and at the earliest practicable moment make such plans and take such steps, to be approved by the Chief of Engineers, as will remove the large sand bar in front of Memphis to such an extent as may be necessary in the interest of navigation at that point, such improvements to be paid out of any funds heretofore or hereafter appropriated for the work of the Mississippi River Commission, not to exceed, however, the sum of $250,000 for the current year.

Mr. McKELLAR and Mr. SMOOT addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee is recognized.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, the amendment that has just been read is the one that the committee has already agreed to. I desire to state to Senators that the amendment requires no additional appropriation at all. It merely directs the Mississippi River Commission to take such steps and prepare such plans, to be approved by the Chief of Engineers, as will result in removing a very large sand bar that has formed within the last four or five years in front of the city of Memphis and which virtually shuts off the city from the river front. As all the Senators know, Memphis is one of the most important cities on the Mississippi River. At present the only way that the steamboats can get up to the wharves is through a small channel that has been dug next to the bank. The steamboats have to come up that channel one at a time and load and then unload one at a time and then go out.

Gen. Black, the Chief of Engineers, has given it as his opinion that the bar can be removed without any serious difficulty, if done now. There is, however, some difference of opinion between him and the members of the Mississippi River Commission. The commission has made a recommendation in the matter, which has not yet been approved by the Chief of Engineers.

This provision will settle that difficulty. The commission is directed to go on and do the work and pay for it out of an appropriation that has already been made or which will hereafter be made for the Mississippi River Commission under a bill that has heretofore been passed by Congress. I do not want to go into the matter in any unnecessary detail, but I feel sure that it is a matter of such very great importance that the Senate will not object to the insertion of the amendment in the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield first to the Senator from Utah, as I believe he addressed the Chair first.

Mr. SMOOT. Do I understand the Senator to say that this improvement is to be paid for out of a lump-sum appropriation that has already been made?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; in part; the remainder, if any, to be paid out of similar appropriations hereafter to be made.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I should like the Senator from Utah to understand that this money is to be paid out of the appropriation for the Mississippi River contained in the so-called flood-control bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. I now yield to the Senator from Arkansas. I beg his pardon for not having yielded before.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I understood that this appropriation was to be paid out of the money already appropriated, but that there was to be a limitation of $250,000. I do not see any limitation in the amendment as proposed.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will tell the Senator why that is. The Chief of Engineers has just telephoned me that it is impossible to fix a limitation. There was a limitation originally in the proposed amendment that not more than $250,000 should be expended this year on this particular work out of the appropriation which has already been made. The memorandum which has just been sent by Gen. Black did not have that limitation in it. I thought that it would be better to have the matter left generally without limitation, and if more money is required than now contemplated it can be expended under a subsequent lump-sum appropriation.

I will say to Senators that I thought the committee had agreed to that change as indicated by Gen. Black. If the committee did not so understand, I am perfectly willing to have the limitation of $250,000 go in the amendment. I do not want any misunderstanding about it.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I have to say that the committee did not so understand. We understood that there was to be a limitation and that the words "not to exceed, however, the sum of $250,000 for the current fiscal year" would be added. If that is agreeable to the Senator, we will make no objection.

Mr. McKELLAR. After the statement made by the Senator from Louisiana I will accept that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment as modified.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. Does the Senator from Nebraska desire to ask me a question?

Mr. NORRIS. I desire to get some information.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will be very glad to give the Senator such information as I have.

Mr. NORRIS. As I understand, this amendment provides for this improvement to be paid for out of a fund that has heretofore been appropriated?

Mr. McKELLAR. To the extent of $250,000.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, that is the limitation now in the amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I was not so much interested in that as I was to find out just exactly what this particular fund was, and whether it is under the control of the Mississippi River Commission.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; a fund of $6,000,000 was appropriated in the flood-control bill for the Mississippi River, and it is out of that fund or some subsequent fund of like kind that this improvement is to be paid for.

Mr. NORRIS. Then, why is it necessary to appropriate for it in this bill?

Mr. McKELLAR. It is not appropriated for at all in this bill, but directions are merely given to the Mississippi River Commission to proceed to do the work under the direction of the Chief of Engineers. Not an additional dollar is appropriated in this bill. There has been some difference of opinion about the matter between the Mississippi River Commission and the Chief of Engineers, and it has been hanging fire for about four or five years—I think now for about five years.

Mr. NORRIS. Why is it necessary to give any direction to the commission? Do they not have authority to do it without a specific direction?

Mr. McKELLAR. The commission has authority to do it, it is true, but they have not done it, although it has been pending for a long time. There is a difference of opinion between the Chief of Engineers, who has rather a veto power over the allotments of the money made by the commission, and the commission itself, with the result that no work has been done, and the city of Memphis has practically been left high and dry, without access to the river. We want to get access, and that is the object of this instruction from Congress. I have never understood the attitude of the Mississippi River Commission on this subject.

The commission has uniformly ever since I have been in public life, been opposed to any project in or around Memphis. I sincerely hope the members of the commission will not any longer feel this antagonism against one of the two best cities within their jurisdiction.

Mr. NORRIS. Is the Mississippi River Commission opposed to this work?

Mr. McKELLAR. Well, I can not say that. All I can say is that there is a disagreement between the Mississippi River Commission and the Chief of Engineers, the Chief of Engineers believing that the bar can be removed with comparative ease and without any great expense. It seems that some members of the commission, at any rate, believe that a channel there will be sufficient and that no further steps need be taken to remove the bar.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to get the exact situation, Mr. President.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am trying to give it to the Senator to the best of my ability.

Mr. VARDAMAN. If the Senator will yield to me, I think I can explain the matter.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will yield to the Senator in a moment.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I desire to ascertain if the Senator knows whether the commission itself has turned down this proposition, and, if they have not turned it down, why they do not do the work?

Mr. McKELLAR. I can say that since I have been a Member of the Congress, which has now been about six years, counting House and Senate service, I have been steadily, in season and out of season, trying to get the commission to do this work. My colleague [Mr. SHIELDS], since he has been in the Senate, has also been very busily engaged in the same good work, but up to date we have been wholly unable to get the commission to proceed to remove that bar.

Both of us think we should have some action. There is no possible excuse for this plain neglect of the Memphis Harbor. We are entitled to relief as a plain matter of right. Now, when we investigated it in its latest phase we found that there was a difference of opinion existing between the Mississippi River Commission and the Chief of Engineers.

The manner in which the money is allotted for work there is this: When a lump sum is appropriated, the Mississippi River Commission undertakes to allot the money to the various projects along the river, apportioning it to the various points and to the various objects and purposes the commission has in view. When they have allotted the various funds, those allotments are forwarded to the Chief of Engineers for his approval or disapproval. In this particular instance they were sent to the Chief of Engineers, and only $69,000 was allotted for the purpose not of removing the sand bar but for dredging—purely a temporary work—the channel which is already there.

The Chief of Engineers disapproved of that allotment, and it is in that unfortunate situation to-day. Now, the object and purpose of this amendment is simply to settle that difficulty—that is all—to settle that difficulty and direct the Mississippi River Commission to proceed with the work. I think, Mr. President, that it is a very proper and certainly necessary piece of work to be done. Memphis, as the Senator knows, is the most important city on the river between St. Louis and New Orleans. In its present situation its wharf has been entirely removed from the river, and the only way in which it can be remedied is by the removal of this bar, which can be done with a great deal of ease and apparently a great deal of quickness, if we can just get action—we are entitled to immediate action.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. NORRIS. I thought I had the floor, Mr. President. Maybe I have lost it under the statute of limitations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The junior Senator from Tennessee has the floor.

Mr. NORRIS. Then I have lost the floor, Mr. President. All right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will be recognized soon.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; it is purely a misunderstanding. I had not yielded the floor; but I yield to the Senator from Nebraska with a great deal of pleasure.

Mr. NORRIS. I am perfectly willing that the Senator should have the floor. I have lost it by not claiming it.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator from Nebraska that I had no intention of taking him off the floor. I was simply going to suggest to my colleague to state some further facts concerning the obstruction in the Memphis Harbor that would be of interest to the Senator from Nebraska. My colleague [Mr. McKELLAR] resides in the city of Memphis and has thorough knowledge of the subject, and I merely desired that he state some additional facts to which I would call his attention.

Mr. McKELLAR. I take pleasure in yielding to my colleague for any question that may be asked or to any other Senator.

Mr. SHIELDS. I will wait until the Senator from Nebraska yields the floor.

Mr. McKELLAR. I now yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not asking anyone to yield to me.

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield the floor, then.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield the floor to the Senator from Nebraska.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi is recognized.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, having lived since my infancy very near the city of Memphis, in the neighboring State of Mississippi, and being entirely familiar with all the facts connected with the subject matter of the controversy, I shall make a very short statement to the Senate in answer to the inquiry made by the able Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS].

The Congress passed a bill some months ago providing for the expenditure of $45,000,000 for the control of the floods of the Mississippi River. The terms of that law provide that the money then appropriated should be disbursed under the direction of the Mississippi River Commission, with the approval of the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers. The Mississippi River Commission, I am advised, has made allotments for the improvement and maintenance of the river. Of these allotments sixty-odd thousand dollars are set aside for digging a canal in front of the city of Memphis, which has become necessary to commerce on account of the formation of a sand bar in the river in front of the city.

Recognizing the importance to the commerce of that splendid little city, the Chief of Engineers has insisted all along that this bar should be removed. Just why the Mississippi River Commission has opposed the removal of this bar and its failure to have it done is an inscrutable mystery to me and to every other person who lives near the city of Memphis who is familiar with conditions there. The Senators from Louisiana, Arkansas, Tennessee, and Mississippi, who have had an opportunity to observe conditions, all, I think without exception, recognize the importance to the city of Memphis and the urgent necessity for removing this bar, which year by year is growing in area and throwing the river some distance away. If the matter is not remedied at once, the business interests of the city will be seriously affected.

Now, the Chief of Engineers has no power to initiate, but he is vested with the power to veto. He can not compel the Mississippi River Commission to have this work done, but he can prevent the Mississippi River Commission from doing anything until it clears away this obstacle from the channels of commerce. There is a conflict of authority, a tangle that must be unraveled.

The committee thought it wise and prudent for Congress to cut the Gordian knot by directing that this bar be removed, and be removed as early as practicable.

Now, this amendment does not take one additional dollar out of the Treasury of the United States. It merely directs the use of the appropriation already made, and I sincerely hope that the Senate will agree to this amendment. It is entirely meritorious. If it were not meritorious, Mr. President, I can assure the Senate, being so deeply interested in the control of the floods of the Mississippi River and the prudent use of the funds already appropriated by Congress for that purpose, that I would not consent for even this much of the appropriation or for the control of the floods of the Mississippi River to be devoted to this particular project. But the city of Memphis is the largest port on the Mississippi River between St. Louis and New Orleans. It is a city composed of enterprising, wide-awake business men. Its commerce grows larger every day. It is the distributing point for probably the most fertile section of the entire southern part of this Republic—probably the most fertile soil in all the cotton-growing sections of the world. And I think it would be very unfortunate if anything should be done by Congress, or shall be left undone, which would interfere with or hinder the growth of this splendid city.

I do not think a more meritorious measure has engaged the attention of this honorable body since I became a Member of it, and I sincerely hope that the amendment may be adopted.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I hope that during the next hour or two of my remarks I shall not be interrupted, because this is the second time on this legislative day that I have had the floor on this question, and if I lose it again there will be no power on earth that can restore it to me. So I want to give this notice now, at the beginning of my remarks, so that no Senator will undertake to ask me a question or in any way take me off the floor.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I decline to yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. THOMPSON. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. THOMPSON. Under the statement made by the Senator from Nebraska, having had the floor twice to-day, he would not be entitled under the rules to speak.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from Kansas has not quoted the Senator from Nebraska correctly. I regret now that I can not be sufficiently courteous to the Senator from Kansas to permit him to interrupt me, but the facts are that the Senator from Kansas has not stated what I said. I said that this was the second time I had had the floor on this legislative day on this same question; and under the rules of the Senate, as I have read them in the days of my youth, a good many years ago, that would make it impossible for me again to address the Senate, although the Senate might be ever so anxious to have me do it. That is the excuse I am giving now when I say I must necessarily decline all interruptions.

Mr. President, I asked in the best of faith the question that has brought on this debate. It seemed to me, although I was not familiar with the law, that the Mississippi River Commission had a right, without any action on the part of Congress—and, in fact, it would be their duty without any action on the part of Congress—to handle this fund as they saw fit, and, if they believed it ought to be done, to remove this bar from the river and pay for it out of the appropriations. As nearly as I can gather the situation, the Mississippi River Commission is opposed to doing this, and this is a reversal on the part of Congress of the action of the Mississippi River Commission in this particular instance. I presume that means that when the Mississippi River Commission is asked to do something that it does not want to do, Congress will necessarily step in and compel it to do it; but if it does do it, no action on the part of Congress will be necessary.

I have been rather convinced, from what the Senator from Tennessee said and what the Senator from Mississippi said, that this work ought to be done. I only asked for information. I want to get the true situation. I am willing to take the word of the Senator from Tennessee, who lives there, and the Senator from Mississippi, who has personal knowledge of the conditions, and to vote in favor of the amendment on their statement, and I am going to vote for it. I am for it. Of course that announcement is sufficient assurance that it will pass the Senate, so that probably no further debate will be necessary.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. NORRIS. I can not yield to the Senator, Mr. President.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I just wanted to know when it will pass the Senate?

Mr. NORRIS. I can not yield to the Senator, because I have hardly started yet on the remarks that I think ought to be made on the question. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Florida.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I desire to have an amendment made on page 47. I want to say to the chairman that the War Department has called my attention to the fact that the description of the lots in section 12 is a mistake, and that instead of lots 4 and 5, mentioned in line 14, on page 47, the description should be lots 2 and 3. Therefore I move to strike out the words "four and five" and to insert "two and three."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 47, line 14, it is proposed to strike out "four and five" and to insert in lieu thereof "two and three."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I offer an amendment on page 25; and I especially call the matter to the attention of the chairman of the committee who is in charge of the bill, and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], who, I think, is rather thoroughly acquainted with the upper Missouri.

On page 25 I move to strike out, at the end of line 23, the words, "in all, $1,085,000" and to insert in lieu thereof:

For continuing revetment on both sides of the river below the bridge at Bismarck, N. Dak., $50,000, and for removing channel snags and rocks in the channel between Fort Benton, Mont., and Pierre, S. Dak., $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary; in all, $1,160,000.

That will be an increase—and I desire the attention of the Senator—of $75,000.

I want to call the Senator's attention also to the fact that the provision reads as follows:

For maintenance and continuing improvement with a view to securing a permanent 6-foot channel between Kansas City, Kans., from the upper end of Quindaro Bend, and the mouth of the river, $1,000,000; for snagging and maintenance between Kansas City and Sioux City, $35,000; for maintenance between Sioux City and Fort Benton, $50,000.

The Senator will observe that there is not one dollar granted here for any new work, no matter how much it may be needed; and I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the only freight that is now carried to any extent at all on the Missouri River is practically between Fort Benton and Bismarck. A company of Bismarck, N. Dak., are operating, I think, some dozen or fifteen boats from Fort Benton down to about the center line of the State of North Dakota. There are numbers of elevators where they take grain and other products along the banks of the Missouri all the way from Fort Benton down.

The river itself, as is well known, often shifts its channel from one point to another, which results in the inability of boats to reach the several points of discharge. This has been met by revetting both above and below wherever these landing places are. There are a number of places, however, where the revetment has not been completed, and the river, striking the bend below the revetment, creates a swirl, and that begins to undermine the revetment.

I have a letter from the president of the navigation company there calling my attention to the necessity for this protection. We are not asking for much. It involves an expenditure of some $75,000, mostly for revetting—$50,000 for revetting and about $25,000 for snagging.

I repeat, this is the only stretch of the Missouri River that is being used at all for commercial purposes, other than the little amount of sand that is taken for building purposes below this point; and while we are appropriating $1,000,000 again for this Kansas City project—a project which I am fearful will never amount to anything, and in which we have already put many millions of dollars—we are neglecting the present necessities of the only stretch of the river that is at present being used for commercial purposes.

If I may again have the attention of the Senator in charge of the bill, after receiving the information from the president of the company, I introduced this amendment and immediately sent it down to the engineering department for such information as they might give me concerning it. I have received no word yet from the engineering department. Undoubtedly they have been very busy, and they could not attend to this matter at the time.

I want to say to the Senator that I hope he will accept this amendment carrying the small amount, and when the bill goes to conference undoubtedly we will have the report from the engineering department. If my suggestions are not borne out entirely by the letter, which, I am sorry to say, I did not keep a copy of when I sent it down to the department, I shall be satisfied with whatever is done by the conferees in the matter. But I should like to have it go into the bill so that it may be protected until we can secure the information.

I ought to add here that in all these improvements I think an average of more than 50 per cent of all the expenses has been borne by local companies—by railroad companies and others—who are interested in the projects. I understand there is provision now for such distribution as may to the engineers seem proper and just, and that whatever is appropriated here will probably be apportioned between those who have heretofore given a portion of the expense of all these projects.

Mr. FLETCHER. This would appear to be a new project entirely. I ask if it has yet been passed upon by the engineers?

Mr. McCUMBER. No; Mr. President, it is not true that it is a new project. The Senator will find, on pages 436 and 437, and following down to page 438, that the project was started July 24, 1912, and it is stated what the project is covering 807 miles, and regularly there has been a small amount appropriated again and again to take care of the maintenance.

Mr. FLETCHER. Appropriated for the stretch of the river described in the amendment?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think, in view of the Senator's statement that the letter may satisfy the conferees, I will not object to the amendment going into the bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am perfectly willing to leave it to the conferees.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON. I offer an amendment to come in at page 50. At the end of line 8 I move to insert:

That Bayou Meto, in the State of Arkansas, be, and the same is hereby, declared to be a navigable stream within the meaning of the Constitution and laws of the United States.

I submitted this amendment to the chairman of the committee, and I am advised that he will make no objection to its adoption.

I ask to have printed in the RECORD in connection with my amendment a letter to me from a Representative in Congress from the district in which the stream is located.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the letter will be printed in the RECORD.

The letter referred to is as follows:

COMMITTEE ON RIVERS AND HARBORS,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, U. S.,
Washington, D. C., June 27, 1917.

Senator JOE T. ROBINSON,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: The inclosed clipping is taken from the rivers and harbors bill.

It passed out yesterday on a point of order on the ground that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce had jurisdiction of it, notwithstanding more than a half dozen such items have heretofore been carried in the rivers and harbors bill. Some citizens in Lonoke County and many landowners in Jefferson want this item passed, to the end that the legislature may authorize the creation of an improvement district and the sale of bonds to build locks and dams to hold back the flood waters on this stream, so that many thousand acres of lands may be reclaimed for agricultural purposes. As you know, this bayou has never been adopted by the Government as navigable; but

Gen. Black informed me that all streams are in a sense navigable in so far as its waters may flow into a navigable river like the Arkansas, but that he could not see why the waters of this bayou might not be controlled as a conservation proposition. If you see proper to place the amendment on the bill when it reaches the Senate, it will, in my judgment, be of great value to the lands, which are very rich and may be brought into a high state of cultivation.

I am advised that a point of order will not lie against it if it is put on in the Senate when it comes back to the House.

I hope you are well.

Your friend, S. M. TAYLOR.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Arkansas.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to offer an amendment to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Insert a new section in the bill, to be known as section 16, as follows:

SEC. 16. That each of the appropriations herein made shall become available only in the event States, counties, cities, corporations, copartnerships, associations, or individuals shall pay into the Treasury as part of the same one-third of the amount thereof: Provided, however, That the provisions of this section shall not apply to those items requiring contributions from other sources.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I do not want to have the amendment acted on without saying that I think it would be very unwise to adopt such an amendment. I am strongly opposed to it. I think the whole committee, as far as it has studied this subject, is opposed to any such amendment. It would be unfair to distribute the contributions in that way or in any definite way. One community, one State, one county, one city, one locality or district might contribute half of what the project would cost and another a third and another a tenth and so on, depending altogether on conditions. You can not make one rule that would apply to the whole country and to conditions everywhere. We are already taking care of the matter under the law; it depends upon the decision of the engineers; and I hope the Senator will not press his amendment.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I feel that I ought to press the amendment, because we have arrived at that time in regard to river and harbor bills when some kind of a provision ought to be made by which pork shall be eliminated, and there is nothing which eliminates pork in a bill as much as an appeal to the pocketbook.

Mr. President, the Senator from Florida says that it would work an inequality. It would not work one-tenth of the inequality that has been shown by the testimony that has been given by the various Senators this afternoon. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] said that Cleveland, a port which receives the commerce of various States, has been compelled to put up $3,000,000, when the Government only put up, I think, $500,000. He said the town of Lorain had appropriated eight to ten times as much as the Government had appropriated for their project. The very illustration we have had a few minutes ago shows the inequality of the way in which the river and harbor bills have been operating. Here comes the Memphis appeal that by reason of the fact that the river has changed its channel the city is likely to lose its boat landing, which is of great value to that city, and yet there is a provision in the bill which requires that the United States Government shall pay every dollar of the amount required to remedy the condition. We find that last year the same thing occurred to the city of St. Joseph, Mo., and in last year's river and harbor bill there was a provision that the city of St. Joseph should pay 40 per cent, or two-fifths, of the amount necessary to restore the channel to its usual place. Do you call that equal treatment?

Mr. President, the various enterprises that have been undertaken by the Government and by the States show the absolute anarchy in which the river and harbor appropriations are. Here arises the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] and makes a statement that the bill is full of pork. He instances a number of cases where he thinks that is the case. I have absolute confidence in his integrity. The Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] rises and says that those are meritorious measures. I have absolute confidence in the Senator from Florida, and I know that he is saying just what he believes. But, Mr. President, it is the viewpoint from which they see these things, and what appears to be pork to one appears to be a just appropriation to the other.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. SHAFROTH. I can not yield right now. I will yield later, but I want to lay down the premises for my amendment.

Mr. President, I want to ask with relation to this matter how can I, a disinterested party, determine which of these gentlemen is correct? I can not go into this matter in detail, and if I did, I would not have much of an opinion concerning it, based upon the fact that I have no knowledge concerning what is proper in the way of a river or harbor improvement. But I find that the great mass of the people are insisting that in every river and harbor bill there is what is called the "pork barrel."

Mr. President, I do not know how to vote; but if you put in this bill a provision that there shall be paid by the parties in interest, the States, counties, cities, corporations, and individuals, one-third of the amount thereof—or make it one-fourth, or make it one-fifth of the amount thereof—I would, without any hesitation, say that I will vote for the bill, because I have absolute confidence that when it comes to putting up money for an unmeritorious enterprise the people who know the conditions will not advance the money. The pocketbook test is the acid test, and it is superior to the judgment of any Senator either upon one side or the other of this controversy.

Mr. President, the appropriations are unequal the way they have been voted heretofore. Senators say that States and communities should not be required to contribute to interstate enterprises. The great Erie Canal was built by New York State. That is an interstate-commerce enterprise. Yet we find that that State alone undertook that project. If it was a matter of interstate commerce it ought to have had some aid from the United States Government. We find that many other enterprises have been undertaken by States. As the Senator from Ohio has said, the great interstate port of Cleveland put up $3,000,000.

It is not right that those ports should put up large amounts of money and then get only a mere driblet from the river and harbor bill and at the same time others get more by reason of the fact that they have very influential Senators or by reason of the fact that they may present their claims to a committee in a more impressive manner or get less because they may not have the advantage of some advocate able to present their claims in as persistent or enticing a way.

Mr. President, from these facts it does seem to me that we ought to have a test and that test is an appeal to the pocketbook. Every time that you test it that way you will determine whether the enterprise is a meritorious one or not.

Mr. President, this proposition is not without precedent. The bill that was passed last year contained appropriations that were conditioned upon the communities, the State, or the counties advancing in some instances as much as 50 per cent of the cost of the works. The State of California was compelled to put up in one instance dollar for dollar with the National Government. In the great harbor at Los Angeles they were required to buy certain property which cost them $900,000, I was told, and they obtained an appropriation of $1,100,000. Is it right that those interested in some harbors should pay large amounts and for other harbors should pay nothing? Is it possible that those interested in some rivers should pay large amounts and for other rivers should pay nothing?

It may be that this amendment will not produce an equal distribution of favors, but it will eliminate every instance of "pork" in the river and harbor bill, and it will come nearer equalizing the various appropriations.

Mr. President, this is the way it is done in a great portion of the world. Take the harbor improvements at Antwerp, costing $30,000,000: That city was required to put up 40 per cent and the Kingdom of Belgium 60 per cent of the cost thereof. That is a world commerce port, but there were local benefits, as there are always local advantages, and the Parliament of Belgium provided that the city should pay for two-fifths of those improvements.

Mr. President, the people who are interested will pay for them. If you find that by the construction of certain works your freight rates would be cheaper, you will find the people and cities that will get the benefit of those rates will offer a contribution of a fair part. You will find that steamship companies will see that they can get certain facilities by these improvements and will contribute something. You will find that railroad companies that need terminal facilities at ports will aid. The Atchison, Topeka & Sante Fe did so for its Pacific coast harbor. Railroad companies will contribute money whenever there is provided a meritorious enterprise that will benefit them. Where there is a benefit, the people reaping that benefit will do their share.

Mr. President, take the great Manchester Canal in England. That canal cost $30,000,000, I believe, and yet Manchester put it up alone without the aid or assistance of Great Britain, and she is requiring tolls by which she will get back revenue from the shipping interests.

Mr. President, these inequalities in doing such things are not right. When we have a Nation that is composed of States that contribute and help with relation to their rivers and harbors, it is right that appropriations made to the rivers or harbors of other States should if they want the aid of the Federal Government be required to contribute for the benefit received. We are not saying that one-third is the equitable amount. It may be it would be wiser to put it at one-fourth or even at one-fifth, but it should be something substantial.

Mr. President, that is the way we are doing as to our public roads. We passed a bill here for that purpose. Did anybody say that there should be $100,000 appropriated for roads in Maryland? No; they said we propose to put up dollar for dollar with the State, city, and county government, or whoever wants to contribute; and that is fair. That requires a contribution for benefits.

You will get a great deal more river and harbor improvements if you adopt such a policy. Every Senator in this Chamber would want to vote for a river and harbor appropriation if they were sure it was worthy and that the State or the community was sharing the expenses.

Mr. President, it seems to me we ought to adopt some rule, and I can not see a better rule than that of one-third for the community, State, county, and individual, and two-thirds for the Nation.

In last year's appropriation bill we had an appropriation for Trinity River, and we required the people of the locality to put up, I think, 20 or 30 per cent of the cost of the improvement. We required the city of Galveston to construct so many thousand feet of a sea wall for the purpose of improving that harbor before the appropriation for that harbor should be available. Yet when we came to other appropriations in that bill we did not require a single dollar to be expended by the locality. That is not right and is not an equal distribution of the burdens and benefit of Government.

For these reasons, Mr. President, I submit that this amendment should be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Colorado. [Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I offer the following amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 14, line 16, after the figures "$40,000," insert a new paragraph, as follows:

For maintenance and improvement of those certain parts of the Indian and Halifax Rivers of Florida which constitute links connecting and forming a part of the Florida East Coast Canal, which extends from Jacksonville, Fla., to Miami, Fla., the sum of $50,000: Provided, That said sum shall be expended only upon that part of the said canal which constitutes Government waters and is not privately owned.

Mr. SMOOT. Do I understand that this is a committee amendment?

Mr. FLETCHER. No.

Mr. SMOOT. It is offered by whom?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is proposed by the junior Senator from Florida.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I offered the amendment, and I can explain it in a moment.

Mr. SMOOT. I can not hear a word the Senator says.

Mr. TRAMMELL. The amendment was offered by the junior Senator from Florida, and we may dispose of it very quickly in one way or the other. Have I the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. All I want to ask of the Senator who has the bill in charge is if this amendment was before the committee for consideration?

Mr. FLETCHER. No; I was not advised of the amendment until it was read here.

Mr. SMOOT. Is there an engineer's report upon it?

Mr. FLETCHER. The committee have not considered it.

Mr. SMOOT. Have the engineers made a report on it?

Mr. FLETCHER. There is no engineer's report on it, I understand.

Mr. SMOOT. No recommendation of it?

Mr. FLETCHER. I am inclined to think the bill already provides for what the amendment is intended to cover. That is my impression. I think it is already taken care of, but I am not quite sure. My colleague did not show me the amendment, and I am not clear as to it.

Mr. SMOOT. It makes an appropriation of $50,000.

Mr. FLETCHER. If my colleague desires to make a statement——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the junior Senator from Florida?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly; I will yield the floor if the Senator desires to explain the amendment. I should like to hear what he has to say.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I have not had time to confer with the chairman of the committee in detail relative to this amendment. I will briefly state, however, the object and purpose of the amendment.

I will state that we have a canal which runs through the territory from Jacksonville, Fla., to Miami, Fla., a distance of 366 miles. This canal has been constructed by a canal company, which received from the State at least two or three million acres of land as a contribution from the State for the purpose of encouraging a canal through that particular section, the main object, of course, being to give the people of that section transportation competition as well as to assist in developing that part of our State. This canal connects with the Indian River at certain points and with the Halifax River at certain other points.

The law under which the canal was constructed required that the canal be maintained at an average depth of 5 feet and at an average width of from 60 to 70 feet. During my tenure as governor of the State we found it necessary to force the canal company to place the canal down to the proper depth. We did so, but during the past few months it has been found that the canal has not been maintained at the standard depth. The attorney general of the State has instituted mandamus proceedings to require the canal company to comply with the act under which the canal was constructed and under which they received certain land benefits. A communication from the attorney general of the State of Florida advises me that the court has held that the canal company can be forced to place the canal at the proper depth upon all those portions which are not held to be waters controlled by the United States Government.

The object and purpose of this amendment is that there may be an appropriation under which the Government can have its part of this waterway maintained at the same standard which the State is seeking to have the remainder of the 366 miles of the canal maintained.

I feel that this is a very meritorious proposition. It is useless, of course, to have the canal company maintain possibly 300 miles of its canal at the proper depth when the waters under the control of the Government are not maintained at an equal depth.

Mr. VARDAMAN. May I ask the Senator from Florida a question?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Certainly.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Has the Board of Engineers made any investigation or report on this project at all?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I do not know that they have. This question has arisen within the last two or three months in court proceedings there, and the court has held that the court would not compel the canal company to improve certain parts of the river now under Government control and supervision.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I have no doubt that this is a meritorious project, but the Senator understands that it is an invariable rule, as I understand, that projects of this kind are never adopted by Congress until the Board of Engineers have made a survey and have reported to Congress.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Well, Mr. President, I have voted for one or two amendments here, I think, that were not recommended by the engineers.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I can not recall an instance where a project of this character has been adopted by the Congress without having first been investigated by Government officials.

Mr. TRAMMELL. This is a question that has arisen so recently that I dare say the Board of Engineers have not had an opportunity to go into it. I only had an opportunity for a brief conference a few moments ago with my colleague [Mr. FLETCHER], the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, and his advice from the engineers was that they could take care of this under some other appropriation, possibly under some other provision for the Indian River. When I look at the bill I find that the Indian River provision for maintenance is only $6,000. If there is any other provision in the bill for the maintenance of the Indian River, I can not find it. Six thousand dollars for maintenance would be of no value whatever in the maintenance of this waterway from Jacksonville to Miami. This canal is of great value, or can be made of great value, to the people of the State of Florida. It has cost the people of that State millions of dollars in legislative land grants made many years ago.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I do.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I suggest to the Senator that he ask for a survey to determine the advisability of the expenditure he requests. It can then be incorporated in this bill.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I offer the amendment. Of course, I appreciate the suggestion of the Senator, but this is a proposition where there is a great public demand for aid, and I think the project an exceedingly meritorious one.

By maintaining this canal the east coast of Florida will derive a great benefit from having competition with the only railroad company which traverses that part of the State of Florida. We can have it maintained at a proper depth under the order of the court, so far as that part which it is the duty of the canal company to maintain; but it is connected more or less with the two rivers. The rivers, too, should be maintained at the proper depth. I had very much hoped that the special merit and the conditions existing there would justify the appropriation of a fund of $50,000 for this project.

This canal runs through one of the most prosperous and rapidly developing sections of my State. The people of that section need the additional transportation facilities and the competition which is possible by opening for them the entire waterway to required depth.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I sincerely hope this amendment may not be agreed to. The committee did not have an opportunity to investigate it, and there has been no recommendation by the engineers as to it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think I shall settle the question. I make the point of order that the amendment is not in order. It is not a proper amendment on a general appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state the rule to which he refers.

Mr. SMOOT. I refer to Rule XVI, which provides that—

No amendments shall be received to any general appropriation bill the effect of which will be to increase an appropriation already contained in the bill or to add a new item of appropriation.

This is one ground. Another is:

Unless it be made to carry out the provisions of some existing law or treaty stipulation or act or resolution previously passed by the Senate during that session—

That is another reason—

or unless the same be moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate or proposed in pursuance of an estimate of the head of some one of the departments.

That is another reason.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is sustained, taken in connection with Rule XVI.

Mr. HARDING, Mr. MYERS, and other Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio.

Mr. HARDING. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio will be stated.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. HARDING. I do.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Has the amendment which I offered been ruled out of order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did not have an opportunity to state, in view of the rule cited by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], which prohibits any amendment providing for an appropriation unless it shall have been estimated for, taken in connection with the provision of Rule XVI, which specifically classifies the river and harbor bill as a general appropriation bill, that the Chair is bound to declare the point of order made by the Senator from Utah well taken.

Mr. TRAMMELL. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President. Would it be in order to offer an amendment to provide for a survey to investigate the particular objects covered by the amendment which I have offered?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present temporary occupant of the chair is not advised as to that.

Mr. FLETCHER. An amendment providing for a survey would be in order, of course, because that does not call for an appropriation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair takes the view suggested by the Senator from Florida that the amendment would be in order.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Then I move that amendment, Mr. President.

Mr. SMOOT. It can only be in order if it carries no appropriation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is true.

Mr. FLETCHER. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio has the floor.

Mr. HARDING. I ask that the amendment which I sent to the desk be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert in the bill a new section, as follows:

That St. Marys River, Ohio and Ind., be, and the same hereby is, declared to be a nonnavigable stream within the meaning of the Constitution and laws of the United States.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, I do not desire to take up the time of the Senate to commend this amendment. The St. Marys River was investigated by the Board of Engineers as far back as 1880, and I will ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a letter from Gen. Black, Chief of Engineers, in which he recites the report of the engineers at that time, saying that the river could not be made navigable even by slack water. I may say for the benefit of the Senate that the river rises in Auglaize County, Ohio, and flows into the Maumee at Fort Wayne, Ind., and at the mouth of the river the stream is 9 inches deep.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. HARDING. I yield.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the Senator how much money the Government has expended on that stream?

Mr. HARDING. There has never been any Government money spent on it.

Mr. KENYON. None at all?

Mr. HARDING. No; and since the Senator has asked that question I will say that I am asking for this action on the part of Congress so that the landowners along the river may spend some money of their own to deepen and widen it to avoid the floods which bother them every year.

Mr. KENYON. The purpose is not to prevent its inclusion in another river and harbor bill?

Mr. HARDING. The Senator from Iowa is determined to be a little bit ironical with me, and I can not consent that the discussion on this item take that trend. I hope the Senate will adopt this amendment.

In addition to the letter of Gen. Black, to which I have referred, I also ask unanimous consent to put in the RECORD a letter from the governor of Ohio confirming the statements made in regard to the St. Marys River.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that order will be made.

The letters referred to are as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
Washington, July 24, 1917.

Hon. BENJAMIN F. WELTY,
House of Representatives.

SIR: 1. I have the honor to reply to your letter of the 17th instant regarding the question of the navigability of St. Marys River, Ohio.

2. An examination of this stream was made by this department in 1880 pursuant to a provision in the river and harbor act of June 14, 1880. It appears that the people interested in securing this legislation desired the improvement of the river, not with the view of providing facilities for navigation, but for the purpose of fixing the shore lines forming the boundaries of adjacent farms and of removing impediments and obstructions to the flow of the stream, which, in their opinion, superinduced miasmatic and other conditions deleterious to the health of communities.

3. The results of the examination are set forth in the Annual Report of the Chief of Engineers for 1881, pages 2343–2347, and the following is extracted therefrom:

"The river can in no sense be called a navigable stream, as its depth at the time of the examination prohibited its descent even in a rowboat, making it necessary to drive along its banks in a wagon. At the town of St. Marys it was found to be 55 feet wide and 12 inches deep; about 10 miles below it was 10 feet wide and 3 inches deep; 30 miles below it was 60 feet wide and 12 inches deep, while at its mouth at Fort Wayne it was 85 feet wide and 9 inches deep. The most that is claimed for it is that at a remote period, before the introduction of roads and canals, the first settlers used to convey their products by flat boats in times of high water down the river to a market, selling both flat boats and produce and not attempting to bring the boats back. The river then would naturally hold its water longer than now and freshets were probably less violent and of longer duration. Now the timber has been cut away, the land is under cultivation, many ditches have been dug, and every means afforded for the rapid flowing off of the water, so that high water, which generally comes in February and June usually lasts but four days—two in rising and two in subsiding. It is not claimed that the river could be made navigable, even by slackwater, and there are good grounds for doubting that the water, if collected into one channel, would afford a supply over evaporation and percolation sufficient for boating purposes."

4. Upon the submission of this report no further action was taken by Congress, and so far as known there has been no change in navigable conditions since that time; certainly none have been brought about by any Federal improvement.

5. Based upon the information furnished by this examination, I am of the opinion that the river is not a navigable water of the United States, and your proposed amendment declaring it nonnavigable is hardly necessary. I see no objection, however, to Congress declaring it to be not a navigable water of the United States, if this is deemed desirable, in order to clear up the situation.

Very respectfully,
W. M. BLACK,
Brigadier General, Chief of Engineers.

STATE OF OHIO,
EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Columbus, July 14, 1917.

Hon. B. F. WELTY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: There has been brought to my attention the desire of the farmers of Auglaize and Mercer Counties, Ohio, to improve the St. Marys River by deepening, widening, and straightening the channel, because their crops are constantly damaged by floods. I understand that a permit from the Federal Government is necessary for this purpose.

I am thoroughly familiar with the topography of the country through which the St. Marys River passes. The river itself, though listed as such, in my opinion, is not a navigable stream; its sole use seems to be that of drainage and water supply.

I trust there will be no difficulty in securing the proper permit to allow the improvement of the river desired by the farmers contiguous thereto.

Very truly, yours,

JAMES M. COX.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I think the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio is an entirely proper one.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment presented by the Senator from Ohio.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 33, after line 20, it is proposed to insert the following:

The Secretary of War is directed to make a survey and submit a report to Congress with a view to securing a channel 35 feet deep in the Lower Columbia and Willamette Rivers below Portland, Oreg.

Mr. FLETCHER. As I understand, that amendment simply calls for a survey, and I have no objection to it.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I suggest to the Senator from Oregon that the survey be provided for in such language as will bring it under the terms of the provision for other surveys in the bill, to the effect that no survey shall be made during the war unless the Secretary of War directs.

Mr. FLETCHER. That necessarily will be the effect of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Oregon.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STERLING, Mr. SHAFROTH, and Mr. RANSDELL addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I submit the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 11, line 24, it is proposed to strike out "$26,000" and insert "$15,000," and, in line 25, of the same page, to strike out "$72,000" and insert "$61,000."

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator state what is the object of that amendment?

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, in regard to this amendment let me say that the amount carried in the item proposed to be amended is $11,000 more, as I compute it, beyond the estimates. The item is found in the last paragraph, on page 11 of the bill. That paragraph includes the James, the Nansemond, the Pagan, and the Appomattox Rivers. For the Nansemond and Pagan Rivers no estimate whatever has been made. For the James River, instead of $46,000, the total estimate is $56,000. In offering this amendment I allow for that estimate of $56,000, but for the Appomattox River $5,000 is the only amount estimated, and hence the reduction of the amount. The amendment is to make the paragraph conform to the estimates made by the Board of Engineers, and that is all.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, the items are exactly as they came in the bill from the House. They were reported on by the Chief of Engineers, and I do not understand that there is any discrepancy between the amount proposed to be appropriated and the estimates. I think the Senator must be mistaken in regard to the item.

Mr. STERLING. If the Senator will turn to page 119 of the report of the committee he will find that the estimate for the James River is, all told, $56,000. That includes maintenance and dredging a channel at and below Richmond. Hence I include $10,000 in the provision for maintenance in my proposed amendment.

On page 121 is found the estimate for the Appomattox, and it is stated:

Amount that can be promptly expended in fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, for maintenance of improvement, $5,000.

The other two rivers included in this group are not estimated for at all, so far as I can find.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am perfectly willing, if those figures are correct—of course we can check them up in conference, for it is a mere matter of figuring out the items constituting the lump sum——

Mr. STERLING. I tried to examine it very carefully with this amendment in view, I will state to the Senator.

Mr. FLETCHER. I will accept the amendment, with the understanding that we will check it up when we have time and reach it in conference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Dakota.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MYERS. I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana proposes an amendment, which the Secretary will state.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert the following as a new section:

SEC. 19. That the Auditor of the Treasury is hereby restrained from allowing the Secretary of the Treasury, and all other officials of the Treasury Department are hereby restrained from paying any claims against the Government on account of labor, supplies, materials, or cash furnished to the contractor or the subcontractor and used in the construction of the Corbett Tunnel, a part of the Shoshone irrigation project, in the State of Wyoming, until the provisions of this section are complied with. The Secretary of the Interior shall investigate and hear evidence and determine what may be reasonable compensation to reimburse Mrs. Katherine Macdonald for time and service devoted to procuring an appropriation by Congress for the payment of such claims, and when he may so determine such sum shall be deducted pro rata from all such claims as have been or may be allowed and paid to the said Mrs. Katherine Macdonald and the residue thereof paid pro rata to the persons holding such claims.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I will briefly state the nature and object of the amendment. Senators who have been here several years are familiar with the claim of Mrs. Macdonald, of Montana. The provision embodied in the amendment has passed the Senate two or three times, on the last occasion having been unanimously recommended by the committee and unanimously passed by the Senate; but the House has always rejected and refused to allow it.

Mrs. Macdonald spent about six or seven years here, as well as a great deal of time, money, and effort, and was the sole cause of the legislation being enacted by Congress providing for the payment of the claims, amounting to about $50,000. If it had not been for her interested efforts there never would have been a penny appropriated by Congress. When, however, an appropriation, coupled with a provision similar to the one I have presented, proposing to recompense her, has been passed by the Senate it has always been rejected by the House. At the close of the last Congress an amendment was put on the deficiency appropriation bill to pay these claims, but it took no cognizance of Mrs. Macdonald's efforts. That amendment became a part of the law. I did not know anything about it when it passed the Senate. Now the money is being paid out, or is about to be paid out, and soon will be all disbursed. This is simply a final effort to do justice to Mrs. Macdonald. The woman has been denied the fruits of all her labors. The Senate has gone on record several times in favor of compensating her, and this is her last opportunity. If the House does not this time make provision to compensate her, all the money for the payment of the claims will soon be paid out and she will be without any remedy whatever.

The circumstances are so well known to Senators and are so appealing to their sense of justice that I hope the amendment will be adopted and put on this bill and that we may have a chance to try to get it brought out of conference and concurred in by the House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Montana. [Putting the question.] By the sound, the noes seem to have it.

Mr. MYERS. I ask for a division, Mr. President.

On a division, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I offer an amendment in the nature of a survey, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add to the survey items the following:

On page 37, after line 2, insert:

"Atchafalaya River, and Bayous Courtableau, Teche, and Vermilion, with a view to forming navigable connections between said streams, including consideration of any propositions for cooperation on the part of local interests."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there was so much confusion that I could not hear the reading of the amendment. I ask that it be read again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will again state the amendment.

The Secretary again stated the amendment.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, that is merely an order for a survey. I will say to the Senator that it is very much needed in connection with a food problem down there, as well as navigation.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, yes; of course the survey will do a great deal toward producing food next year! Of course it is only the beginning of another appropriation, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Louisiana.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, some days ago I offered and had printed a proposed amendment to the bill authorizing the county of Okanogan, in the State of Washington, to erect bridges across the Okanogan River in that State without regard to the navigability of the stream. There is no actual navigation on the stream, and the requirement of the Army engineers in such cases of draws in bridges, or of sufficient height of the bridge above the water to allow steamboats to pass underneath, is actually unnecessary and entails a great expense upon the people of the county. But upon taking up the matter with the Army engineers I have received a letter from the Acting Chief of Engineers of the Army which indicates a very liberal attitude on the part of the engineers toward a stream with conditions such as I have stated, in which there is no actual navigation, and no intention or prospect of improvement for navigation at an early date, so that it is probably not necessary to enact the legislation which I proposed. Therefore I will not offer the amendment, but will ask to have this letter from the Acting Chief of Engineers printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, the letter will be printed in the RECORD.

The letter is as follows:

OKANOGAN RIVER BRIDGES.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
Washington, July 23, 1917.

Hon. MILES POINDEXTER,
United States Senate.

DEAR SIR: 1. In reply to your letter of this date, inclosing copy of an amendment which you propose to offer to the pending river and harbor bill, I desire to say that although this amendment has not been forwarded to this office for report by the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, I see no objection to my giving you in an informal way my views in regard to the contemplated amendment.

2. In its present form the amendment does not meet the approval of this office in that it proposes to abandon altogether the safeguards which have been provided by law in regard to the construction of bridges across the navigable waters of the United States. The Okanogan River is a single State stream, so that under the provisions of section 9 of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1899, it is not necessary to secure an act of Congress to authorize the construction of bridges across it. It is merely necessary to secure the assent of the State authorities expressed in proper form and to make application direct to this department. Thereafter no difficulties will be experienced in securing the requisite authority for the construction of any desired bridge.

3. Furthermore, assuming that the channel of the Okanogan River is as described by you, there is no reason to apprehend that the War Department will make any unusual exactions in the case of applications of this sort. The rule has been merely to ask of those who propose to construct bridges the minimum accommodations necessary for such navigation as exists or is reasonably prospective. When there is no navigation no particular requirements are imposed other than those which are necessary for the protection of the community from floods or similar dangers.

4. In view of the attitude of the department as herein outlined, it seems to me that the amendment is unnecessary and that the best course will be to bring to the attention of the local officer at Seattle each case in which it is desired to construct a bridge. He will be furnished with a copy of this letter and will undoubtedly exercise due discrimination in arriving at his recommendations.

Very respectfully,

H. C. NEWCOMER,
Colonel, Corps of Engineers,
Acting Chief of Engineers, United States Army.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, there is another amendment which I had intended to offer and have had printed, providing for an appropriation for restoring a dike which has been washed away at the mouth of the Cowlitz River, in the State of Washington. It is an appropriation for maintaining the channel, which has already been improved. In regard to that matter I have a letter from the Acting Chief of Engineers in which he states that there is a general fund from previous appropriations intended to take care of existing projects in the case of emergency; that if the pending bill, with the various appropriations which it contains, is enacted that other fund intended for the maintenance and protection of existing channels will be available for such purposes as the restoring or protection of the channels from the mouth of the Cowlitz River. That being the case, it is not necessary to urge the amendment referred to, and I will not offer it; but I ask to have this letter printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, the letter will be printed in the RECORD.

The letter is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
Washington, July 23, 1917.

Hon. MILES POINDEXTER,
United States Senate.

DEAR SIR: 1. In response to your letter of July 20, 1917, inclosing copy of your amendment proposing an additional appropriation of $5,000 for restoring the dike and maintaining the channel near the mouth of Cowlitz River, and requesting the recommendation of this office in the matter, I have the honor to state that, while the appropriation of this additional amount would doubtless have been requested by the Department in its annual estimates if the need had arisen before the estimates were prepared, so that the appropriation of this additional amount would be in line with the policy upon which the bill is framed, including necessary amounts for maintenance, it so happens that the proposed amendment is not necessary in order to provide the small amount of additional funds required in this case. There is still a balance of nearly $1,000,000 remaining from the lump-sum appropriation of March 4, 1915, which has been held to take care of Government plant and such emergency work as the limited amount would permit in case the pending river and harbor bill should fail. If the bill passes, this fund will become available for allotment, and the additional $5,000 required for the Cowlitz River can be provided from that source.

2. In view of the effort that has been made to avoid amendments to the bill and of the practicability of supplying the additional amount needed in this instance from another source in case the bill passes, it is believed that action on the proposed amendment is not necessary or advisable at this time.

Very respectfully,

H. C. NEWCOMER,
Colonel, Corps of Engineers,
Acting Chief of Engineers, United States Army.

Mr. POINDEXTER. At the time the bill was introduced, Mr. President, I proposed an amendment asking for a survey of the Columbia River from the city of Vancouver, in the State of Washington, to the main channel of the Columbia River from the sea to the city of Portland, with a view of securing a 40-foot channel, which was the depth advocated by a number of commercial bodies there. On examining the bill, however, I find that on page 40, in lines 13 to 20, there is a provision which I think adequately covers this matter, so I will not offer the amendment referred to.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, in view of the fact that the Senate has adopted an amendment proposed by my colleague with reference to a survey of the Columbia River from Portland to its mouth, I move to strike out, on page 40, lines 4, 5, and 6, which embody substantially the same provision, though providing for a survey for a lesser depth.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 40 it is proposed to strike out lines 4, 5, and 6 in the following words:

Columbia River, from Brookfield, Wash., to the mouth, with a view to securing a channel depth of at least 30 feet.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I had intended to propose an amendment to this bill providing for an appropriation for the improvement of Yaquina Bay, Bar, and Harbor, Oreg.; but I know the temper of the Senate and the temper of Congress with reference to appropriations in this bill at this time, and I am not going to ask the consideration of the amendment now because of that feeling. I want to say, however, that here is an improvement that has been recommended by the district officer, the division engineer, the Board of Engineers, and the Chief of Engineers as well, providing for the expenditure of $836,000.

The watershed and the neighboring country within 15 or 20 miles of Yaquina Bay is hilly and covered for the most part by brush and small trees. The original stand of timber was burned off many years ago, and the drainage basin is neither populous nor rich in undeveloped natural resources or agricultural products.

There are two towns on the bay. Newport, a summer resort near the entrance, with a permanent population of about 700; and Toledo, the county seat, on the railroad, with 800 inhabitants, situated on Depot Slough at its mouth. Besides these, there is a village of about 100 people at Elk on the river 20 miles from the entrance, and a small settlement at Yaquina, about 3 miles above Newport.

Of the local industries the most important are a sawmill at Toledo and a smaller one at Elk, with a combined capacity of about 200,000 feet board measure per day. Since the improvement of the river channel the Toledo mill has shipped several cargoes of lumber to California points in vessels carrying from 600,000 to 650,000 feet board measure on a draft of about 14 feet. Shipments are not being made at present on account of the depressed condition of the lumber market. There is a creamery at Toledo and a small salmon cannery situated above Yaquina, but no fish have been packed for two years. The run of salmon in the bay, however, is not large. A good many oysters are obtained near Oysterville and shipped to market. The country is especially adapted to stock raising and dairying, and these industries are increasing. The narrow bottoms of the streams are fertile and produce good crops of vegetables, hay, and fruits.

Many halibut are taken on the fishing banks off the coast 15 or 20 miles from Yaquina Bay, and a small cold-storage plant has been established at Newport to care for the catch.

Yaquina Bay is the terminus of the Corvallis & Eastern Railroad, now a branch of the Southern Pacific Railway. This road runs from Yaquina to Hoover, in the Cascade Mountains, a distance of 142 miles, and crosses the main line of the Southern Pacific at Albany, in the Willamette Valley. The railroad owned several steamers in the eighties and operated them to San Francisco; among which were the Yaquina City, of 1,200 net tons and 14 feet draft, also the Willamette Valley, Eastern Oregon, and Yaquina Bay, drawing 15 feet, which was wrecked in entering the bay in 1888. Several years ago the Francis Leggett made one voyage from the bay, drawing 16 feet and carrying nearly 1,000,000 feet board measure of lumber.

At the time the railroad was built it was hoped by those interested that the improvement of Yaquina Bay would develop an important water route to California ports from the Willamette Valley. These hopes were not realized.

The water-borne commerce is chiefly carried on now by gasoline schooners of from 100 to 300 tons, but vessels drawing as much as 14 feet can safely use the harbor at present at high tide. The freight rate by sea between bay points and Portland, Oreg., is $6 per ton. The rate on lumber from Toledo, Oreg., to San Francisco, Cal., is $4 per 1,000 feet, board measure.

The future great resource of the region is the standing timber of the Siletz Valley, which lies from 10 to 20 miles to the north and which is reported to contain 12,000,000,000 feet, board measure, of the finest fir, spruce, and hemlock, the natural water outlet for which is Yaquina Bay.

There are two port districts in the locality, formed under State laws, the port of Toledo, with an assessed valuation of $1,364,612, which cares for the waterway above Oysterville to Toledo and has bonded itself for $50,000 for improving the river to Toledo, and the port of Newport, with an assessed valuation of $1,109,104, which attends to the commercial welfare of the bay proper. The latter port has not bonded its district, but has constructed a public wharf at Newport from direct taxes. The timber interests of Siletz Valley are not organized, but it is believed they will eventually act with these two ports in the improvement of the entrance. The total assessed valuation of Lincoln County for the year 1914 is $10,187,235, with an area of 643,000 acres.

The local interests are all desirous of having the ocean bar improved by the restoration and extension of the jetties and the removal of obstructing rock.

On September 18, 1915, a mass meeting of the citizens of Lincoln County, including the commissioners of the ports of Newport and Toledo, was held in Newport for the purpose of taking steps to secure the improvement of Yaquina Harbor. Although no definite offer of cooperation was made, this meeting, representing the local interests, resolved that the sense of the meeting was that if a feasible project at a reasonable cost can be adopted a liberal percentage of the cost of said improvement will be contributed by local interests; also that they were willing to bear one-half of the cost of a survey.

The only railroad in the vicinity is the Corvallis & Eastern, which runs down the valley of the Yaquina River from its source and terminates at Yaquina, about 3½ miles from the entrance, where vessels can be loaded directly from the cars on the company's private wharf.

The port of Newport has constructed a public wharf with 140-foot face, on 600 feet of public water frontage in the town of Newport, at a cost of about $6,000.

The port of Toledo purchased about 400 feet of water frontage on the improved channel of Depot Slough and has built a wharf with a 200-foot frontage at a cost of about $3,000. The track of the Corvalis & Eastern Railroad passes very close to this wharf, and a spur track could be run onto it at slight expense.

A charge of about 25 cents per ton is made for handling freight over these wharves, which are open to all on equal terms. There are no mechanical appliances for handling freight at either of these wharves.

The fresh-water discharge of the Yaquina River is very small, and there are no water powers in the locality that could be coordinated with any improvement of the bar or bay in this locality.

The people of the port district come here with a proposition tendering to the Government of the United States one-half of the total cost of $836,000, and offer to put up dollar for dollar with the Government for the improvement they desire. It is a very important port, Mr. President, and I call attention to it now, not insisting upon my amendment, but promising to insist upon it at the next session of Congress. In view of the fact that nothing has been done in reference to this very important improvement and others in Oregon that I might mention, I may insist later that the same conditions ought to prevail with reference to other appropriations for other sections, and that communities that are asking for large appropriations ought to do as Oregon has almost universally done—put up dollar for dollar with the Government for the improvements that are made.

I ask, Mr. President, that the amendment which I intended to propose be printed in the RECORD, and also a set of resolutions adopted by the commercial bodies in the neighborhood where this improvement was contemplated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection the matter referred to will be included in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Messrs. CHAMBERLAIN and MCNARY to the bill (H. R. 4285) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, viz: Insert the following:

"Yaquina Bay, Oreg.: For improvement in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 109, Sixty-fifth Congress, first session, and subject to the conditions set forth in such document, $100,000."

Resolution.

Whereas the improvement of Yaquina Bar in Oregon to a mean lower low water of 20 feet has been regularly and favorably submitted by the district and division engineer officers to the Board of United States Army Engineers at Washington, D. C., and approved and recommended by them, through the Secretary of War, to Congress for appropriation on condition that the port districts of Toledo and Newport jointly meet one-half of the total cost, which total cost is estimated at $836,000; and

Whereas it is of great commercial importance to Benton County and the Willamette Valley, as well as all of Oregon, to have this work commenced at an early date, and the ports of Toledo and Newport are willing (in the event Congress should fail to appropriate its portion thereof) to furnish the funds for immediate prosecution of the work, provided the Government supervises the work and said ports are given credit against the appropriation to be made by Congress for amount advanced by the ports therefor: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, by the Corvallis Commercial Club, That through the Oregon Senators and Representatives Congress be urged to appropriate the sum of $418,000 (as recommended by the United States Army Engineers) for the prosecution and completion of the Yaquina Bar project, but that if on acount of war or for any other reason it is deemed inadvisable to make the appropriation at this time that there be then added an amendment to the river and harbor bill allowing said ports of Toledo and Newport to raise their portion of the cost of said improvement and start the work in the year 1917, under the direction of the United States engineers, and that the Government provide the remaining $418,000 at a later date by appropriation: Be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to each of the Oregon Senators and Representatives forthwith.

Adopted at a meeting of the Corvallis Commercial Club this June 14, 1917.

WALTER KLINE, President.
J. A. FRIES, Secretary.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I offer as a new section at the close of the bill the matter which I send to the desk and ask to have read by the Secretary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add a new section at the end of the bill, as follows:

SEC. —. That no appropriation contained in this bill shall be available if the President of the United States, on or before September 1, 1917, shall file a statement with the Secretary of War that such particular project for which said appropriation is made is not one of a public necessity.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I am not going to take any time to discuss that amendment. It gives the President the right to end any work under this bill that may not be of a public necessity in his opinion. I merely ask for the yeas and nays on the question.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I hope the amendment will not be agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa asks for the yeas and nays on the amendment offered by him.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KENDRICK (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL]. I have no knowledge as to how he would vote on this question, and I therefore desire to withdraw my vote.

Mr. THOMPSON. The junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HUSTING] and the senior Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] are necessarily absent on public business.

Mr. GERRY. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence on official business of the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], and to state that he has a pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE].

Mr. KING. I transfer my general pair with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] to the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] and vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 26, nays 36, as follows:

So Mr. KENYON's amendment was rejected.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I should like to offer an amendment to the survey items.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In the survey items, on page 36, after line 9, insert:

Indian and Halifax Rivers, Fla.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] is unable to be here and I offer this amendment at his request. It is along the line of the amendment just voted on, and in view of the vote on that amendment I shall not ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Add to the bill a new section, as follows:

SEC. —. That during the continuance of the war in which the United States is now engaged no work shall be done or money expended on public works on rivers and harbors, except for absolutely necessary repairs thereto or preservation thereof, or for surveys, construction, or completion of public works of immediate military necessity, to be determined and specially designated by the President.

Mr. BORAH. I ask for the yeas and nays on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. FLETCHER. I would say that that would exclude some of the projects that have been determined by the War Department, as well as the Navy, as being military necessities.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays are demanded on agreeing to the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], which I transfer to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], and vote "nay."

Mr. JONES of Washington (when Mr. CURTIS's name was called). The Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] is necessarily absent on public business. He is paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK]. If the Senator from Kansas were present and permitted to vote, he would vote "yea."

Mr. FERNALD (when his name was called). I make the same announcement as before of the transfer of my pair with the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] to the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD], and I vote "nay."

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], which I transfer to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES], and vote "nay."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] and withhold my vote.

Mr. KENDRICK (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. KING (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] and vote "yea."

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). Announcing my pair as before, I withhold my vote.

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I make the same announcement of the transfer of my pair as on the last vote, and vote "nay."

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I make the same announcement of the transfer of my pair, and it will stand for the rest of the session to-day. I vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (when his name was called). Making the same announcement of the transfer of my pair as on the last vote, I vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan (when Mr. TOWNSEND's name was called). I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. TOWNSEND]. He is paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] to the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] and vote "nay."

Mr. ROBINSON. I am paired with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 23, nays 37, as follows:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read.

That each of the appropriations herein made shall become available only in the event States, counties, cities, corporations, copartnerships, associations, or individuals shall pay into the Treasury as part of the same one-fifth of the amount thereof: Provided, however, That the provisions of this section shall not apply to those items requiring contributions from other sources.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I ask for the yeas and nays on agreeing to the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ROBINSON (when his name was called). Announcing the same pair and transfer as on the last vote, I vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (when his name was called). Making the same transfer of my pair as on the last vote, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] is necessarily absent on public business. He is paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK]. If the Senator from Kansas were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. KENYON. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. CUMMINS] is absent from the Chamber necessarily. If he were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. LODGE. My colleague [Mr. WEEKS] is necessarily absent. If present, he would vote "nay." He has a general pair with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], but that applies only to the passage of the bill.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I desire to make the same transfer of my pair as on the previous vote, and I vote "nay."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I transfer my pair general with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] to the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] and vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 18, nays 42, as follows:

So Mr. SHAFROTH's amendment was rejected.

Mr. KENYON. I offer an amendment, but I shall not ask for the yeas and nays upon it. It is to strike out all of page 9 and page 10 down to line 9. It is the proposition known as the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal. I merely ask for a vote on it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. KENYON. On page 32, in section 4, I move to strike out the figures "$200,000" and insert "$50,000." I will say in explanation of that that it is the survey item now carrying $200,000 in the bill. I do this to try to aid in a mild way the Committee on Finance in cutting down some of their labors in trying to find things to tax to make up the $5,000,000,000, and no injury would seem to result to Banana Creek and to others of these consolation prizes that are found in the surveys of this war measure. On this amendment I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not think it would cost 10 cents to make a survey of Banana Creek. That can be done from the maps and plans in the office of the surveyor of the district. This is the estimate fixed by the chief of engineers as to the cost of the surveys, and, of course, if it is not necessary to use it all, it will not be used. Still it ought to be provided as they estimated, and I hope the amendment will be defeated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa asks for the yeas and nays on agreeing to his amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JONES of Washington (when Mr. CURTIS's name was called). The Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] is necessarily absent on public business. He is paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK]. If the Senator from Kansas were present, he would vote "yea" on this amendment.

Mr. FERNALD (when his name was called). I make the same announcement of my pair and its transfer as before and vote "nay."

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before regarding my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. KING (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN], and vote "yea."

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair, I withhold my vote.

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I make the same announcement of my transfer as before, and vote "nay."

Mr. ROBINSON (when his name was called). Announcing the same transfer of my pair as on the previous vote, I vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (when his name was called). Making the same transfer of my pair as on the last vote, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Making the same transfer of my pair as before, I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas, 15, nays 43, as follows:

YEAS—15.

Borah	Kenyon	Norris	Smoot

NOT VOTING—38.

Brandegee	Goff	Knox	Smith, Ga.

So Mr. KENYON's amendment was rejected.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, before voting on this bill I desire to make a brief statement in explanation of my vote. I have in the past never been favorable to river and harbor bills because they have contained so many items that were objectionable and questionable. While this bill may be subject more or less to the same objections, yet I think it is freer from such objections than any other river and harbor bill upon which we have been called to vote. In the course of the debate the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], having charge of the bill, has assured us that there is not a single item or project in the bill that has not been approved by the Board of Engineers, and that they have all been recommended by them as emergency measures and as necessary to be taken care of now. He has also stated that there is not a single item in the bill, except those purely for maintenance, that is not, either directly or indirectly, connected with the national defense.

In view of those facts, Mr. President, and not being desirous of placing anything whatever in the way of the successful prosecution of the war, I shall vote for the bill, although it is not entirely satisfactory to me, as there are a number of items I can not approve; but I regard the interest of the whole country in the present emergency as of far greater importance than the mere expenditure of money. I have voted for every amendment presented which in my judgment would have made a better bill, but simply because they have failed to pass I do not feel I would be justified in voting against the entire bill. It is conceded by all that there are many good things in the bill, and as they so much overbalance the bad things in it, I shall vote for the bill on the final vote.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I rise primarily to inquire of the chairman of the committee, who has charge of this bill, whether he will permit us to have a yea-and-nay vote on the passage of the bill?

Mr. FLETCHER. I shall welcome it, and shall be very glad to do so.

Mr. KING. I make this inquiry because I know the bill will receive so overwhelming a vote that it is very doubtful whether its opponents can secure the requisite number to entitle them to a record vote.

I had intended speaking at some length against this bill and pointing out many of its features that I regarded as highly improper and indefensible, and also giving my views on the policy underlying river and harbor bills—a policy condemned by every fair and sincere investigator of waterway problems—and suggesting a course for the present and future which I believe would be rational and productive of much needed reforms. However, it has been predetermined that this bill will pass. No argument, no opposition, whether just and reasonable or otherwise, can hinder its passage. The handful of Senators who oppose it are bound and helpless. We can only protest and register our votes in opposition. The demand is imperative for an immediate vote, so I shall not now discuss this measure. Upon some other occasion I may have the opportunity to fittingly characterize this bill and denounce its iniquities.

Mr. President, I rise for another purpose, and that is to express my hearty approval and earnest commendation of the splendid and patriotic services rendered to the country by the distinguished Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] in the able and fearless manner in which he has attacked this bill and the Government's policy in dealing with appropriations for rivers and harbors. I wish there were more Senators who had the courage and the patriotism to denounce this bill as he has denounced it and to call the country's attention to the history of legislation of this character.

I hope the day will come, Mr. President, when we will adopt a broad, enlightened, and rational policy with respect to harbors and inland waterways, a policy that will produce adequate results, provide suitable harbors, and develop internal commerce. We want a program calling for results, for efficiency, and for an abolition of the effete, condemned, and indefensible course now obtaining in our country. The present system is iniquitous and calls for some one who has power and courage enough to destroy it. Now, when we are at war and must conserve our resources, the passage of this bill, calling for millions, can not be defended. It is the rankest kind of hypocrisy to-day, as has been stated here, that this is a war measure. It is the same old wolf in sheep's clothing; it seeks to link itself to patriotism and hide its deformity behind the soldiers and the ships and the dangers of our country. I certainly shall have great pleasure in voting against a measure so unworthy.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a telegram, signed by the president of the New York Produce Exchange, in reference to certain items in this measure. This telegram was adopted by the special action of the board of managers of the produce exchange. All of the items mentioned in the telegram have been included in the bill, and the telegram commends those items.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York asks unanimous consent to insert a certain telegram in the RECORD. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The telegram referred to is as follows:

NEW YORK, N. Y., July 24, 1917.

Hon. W. M. CALDER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The following preamble and resolutions were adopted by special action of the board of managers of the New York Produce Exchange this day:

Whereas the members of the New York Produce Exchange are directly and vitally interested in all improvements in New York Harbor that will provide better facilities for the operation of the United States naval forces and for the handling of the large and increasing commerce of the port of New York: Be it

Resolved, That the board of managers of the New York Produce Exchange hereby indorses and urges the immediate enactment of the provisions of the rivers and harbors appropriation bill that authorize the removal of Diamond Reef from New York Harbor, the deepening of the channel through Hell Gate to a depth of 40 feet, thereby establishing a minimum depth of 40 feet for the entire channel from the upper bay of Long Island Sound and the removal of shoal obstructions from the Hudson River and widening and deepening the Ambrose Channel;

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be forwarded to the United States Senators representing New York State requesting that they put forth every effort to bring about these improvements in the interest of the Nation as well as the State and port of New York.

R. A. CLAYBROOK,
President New York Produce Exchange.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I ask Senators to remain for a few moments after the final vote is taken on the river and harbor bill. I intend to submit a request for unanimous consent in connection with a vote on the Nation-wide prohibition amendment, which I think will meet with no objection.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I desire to insert in the RECORD a telegram in regard to Banana Creek. I took occasion to telegraph the clerk of the court down there to ask him about this creek, and he has sent certain information in reference to it, which I desire to put in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida asks unanimous consent to insert certain matter in the RECORD. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The telegram referred to is as follows:

TITUSVILLE, FLA., July 25, 1917.

Senator DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Chairmam, Washington, D. C.;

Replying to your wire this date, the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey chart 161, Canaveral, shows Banana Creek averages three-eighths mile wide, 30 inches deep, 10 miles in length. Creek connects waters of Indian and Banana Rivers at northern end of Merritt Island, which is 36 miles in length. At present creek is used only by very light-draft boats of fishermen, fruit and truck growers, and boat from Coast Guard station at Chester Shoals. Commerce is limited partly on account of shoal water. Fishermen have lost many loads of fish through boats grounding in creek. If channel 5 feet deep, 50 feet wide was dredged through the creek the commerce of the whole district would be improved through better transportation, as loaded boats from all parts of Banana River must go around south end of Merritt Island, 40 miles south of here, for railway connections. During the past three years nearly all vacant Government land on each side of the creek has been homesteaded, and the only outlet for these entrymen is the creek, the waters of which at certain times are as shallow as 20 inches, making navigation almost impossible.

J. F. MITCHELL, Clerk Circuit Court.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I wish to put into the RECORD a telegram from the chairman of the Taxpayers' Association—a much-neglected class in this country—of Richmond, Cal., concerning the harbor there.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be inserted in the RECORD, in the absence of objection. The Chair hears none.

The telegram referred to is as follows:

RICHMOND, CAL., July 25, 1917.

Hon. WILLIAM S. KENYON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

On behalf of a large number of taxpayers of Richmond, Cal., we invite your attention to the remarks made by Representative FREAR in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of June 23 last on the subject of an item in the rivers and harbors appropriation bill called the Richmond inner harbor project. Representative FREAR protests vigorously against the expenditure of Government funds in the project on the grounds that it is unnecessary and unworthy. He has visited Richmond and made a personal independent investigation of the project, and his adverse report is based on facts and a clear understanding of the whole situation. We hope you may feel like bringing to the attention of the Senate at the proper time the facts and conclusions which Mr. FREAR has set forth. The making of the appropriation would serve no important purposes whatsoever, save those of certain real estate speculators.

LEVI BOSWELL,
Chairman Taxpayers' Association.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I now desire to ask a parliamentary question. Is the substitute which I intend to offer for the pending bill now in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is in order at this time.

Mr. KENYON. If the other amendments are concluded, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk as a substitute for this bill, and I ask for the yeas and nays on it. I think we are entitled to have a yea and nay vote on the substitute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The substitute proposed by the Senator from Iowa will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and to insert the following:

That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the United States Treasury, for the maintenance and improvement of rivers and harbors, $15,000,000, to be expended by the Secretary of War in such way as he may deem best upon such projects as have been approved by Congress or may be deemed necessary by him for war purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa, upon which he asks for the yeas and nays.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I will ask the Secretary to again read the first line or two of the proposed amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the United States Treasury, for the maintenance and improvement——

Mr. STONE. I will say to the Senator from Iowa that the amendment should contain the words "not otherwise appropriated."

Mr. KENYON. I thank the Senator for that suggestion, and I desire to modify the amendment to read in that way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment as proposed to be modified.

The SECRETARY. After the words "United States Treasury" it is proposed to insert "not otherwise appropriated," so as to read:

That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated—

And so forth.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as modified, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). Making the same transfer of my pair as heretofore, I vote "nay."

Mr. KENYON (when the name of Mr. CUMMINS was called). I desire to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. CUMMINS], and to state that if present he would vote "yea."

Mr. JONES of Washington (when the name of Mr. CURTIS was called). The Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] is necessarily absent on public business. He is paired with the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK]. If present, the Senator from Kansas would vote "yea."

Mr. FERNALD (when his name was called). I make the same announcement as heretofore as to my pair and vote "nay."

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote "nay."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair to the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] and vote "nay."

Mr. KENDRICK (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] and withhold my vote.

Mr. KING (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] and vote "yea."

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair, I withhold my vote.

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer as heretofore, I vote "nay."

Mr. PENROSE (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], who is absent, but, being informed that if present he would vote against this amendment, I shall vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. ROBINSON (when his name was called). Announcing the same pair and transfer as on the previous votes, I vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (when his name was called). Making the same transfer of my pair as heretofore, I vote "nay."

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 17, nays 45, as follows:

YEAS—17.

Ashurst	Hollis	Norris	Warren
Borah	Jones, Wash.	Pomerene	Watson

Fall	Johnson, S. Dak.	Phelan	Williams
Gallinger	Kellogg	Pittman
Goff	Kendrick	Sherman

So Mr. KENYON's amendment was rejected.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I understand the name "Contentnia" on page 12, line 13, is misspelled. The final letters should be "ea" instead of "ia." I therefore ask that the spelling be corrected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The name will be corrected according to the spelling indicated by the Senator from Florida.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. FLETCHER. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I desire to say just a word. Of course the bill will pass. The Senate can go on, and Congress can go on, throwing away the people's money, but this fight is not over; it will continue until the time comes when there will be some decent regard paid as to how the people's money is spent in this country. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). Making the same transfer of my pair as heretofore, I vote "yea."

Mr. JONES of Washington (when the name of Mr. CURTIS was called). The Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] is necessarily absent on public business. He is paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK]. If present, the Senator from Kansas would vote "nay."

Mr. FERNALD (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as heretofore in regard to the transfer of my pair, I vote "yea."

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer as heretofore, I vote "yea."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] and therefore withhold my vote. If I were permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. KENDRICK (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair with the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], I withhold my vote.

Mr. KING (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] and vote "nay."

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS]. I am informed that the senior Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], were he present, would vote in the affirmative.

I therefore transfer my pair to the senior Senator from New York and vote "yea."

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to the transfer of my pair as heretofore, I vote "yea."

Mr. NORRIS (when his name was called). Upon the vote on the passage of the bill I am paired with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS], who has been called from the Chamber. If he were present, he would vote "yea," and I would vote "nay."

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], but I have an understanding that I may vote on this question. I therefore vote "yea."

Mr. ROBINSON (when his name was called). Announcing the same pair and transfer as on previous votes, I vote "yea."

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). The transfer of my pair to the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] applies to this as to other votes during the progress of the bill. I vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (when his name was called). Making the same transfer of my pair as on the previous votes, I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. RANSDELL. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. BROUSSARD].

Mr. GERRY. I desire to announce that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] is detained on official business. He is paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE].

I also wish to announce that the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] is detained on official business.

Mr. THOMPSON. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON]. If he were present he would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 50, nays 11, as follows:

So the bill was passed.

NATION-WIDE PROHIBITION.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate joint resolution 17, for the purpose of endeavoring to agree on a date for a vote upon it.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 17) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I send to the desk a request for unanimous consent which I should like to have read for the information of Senators, in order that they may have an opportunity to make any suggestions as to the language before we have the roll call provided for under the rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed agreement will be read.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Texas asks unanimous consent that at 2 o'clock p. m. on the calendar day of Tuesday, July 31, 1917, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of Senate joint resolution 17, proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and that on the calendar day of Wednesday, August 1, 1917, at 4 o'clock p. m., the Senate will vote without further debate upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the resolution (S. J. Res. 17) through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, do not the rules require a roll call before the agreement is made?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I asked that it be read informally in order that Senators might make any suggestions that may occur to them.

Mr. PENROSE. It simply occurred to me that even the discussion of the proposed unanimous-consent agreement ought to be after a roll call.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, that is not necessary.

Mr. PENROSE. I may be wrong.

Mr. BORAH. If we finally come to the point where we are practically agreed upon it, before it is finally submitted and agreed to there must be a roll call.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If there is objection in advance, it is not necessary to have the roll call.

Mr. PENROSE. I do not say it is. I was only asking. I should like to have the request read again. I was interrupted when the reading occurred.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the proposed agreement again.

The Secretary again read the proposed unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator that he include an expression substantially to this effect: That during the time intervening between the taking up of the resolution on Tuesday at 2 o'clock and the time it is voted upon it shall be the unfinished business.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I understand that to be the effect of the language used. It says that the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution at 2 o'clock on Tuesday. If that is done, it can not be displaced unless a motion is made and carried to displace it.

Mr. STONE. If that is the effect, I have nothing further to say.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, what is the hour fixed on Wednesday for voting?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Four p. m. I ask then that the agreement be formally presented.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, this idea occurs to me and I want to suggest it to the Senator from Texas: I do not know that I care to offer any remarks upon the resolution when it comes before the Senate, but would it not be wise to have a provision in the agreement that no one Senator shall speak more than a certain length of time?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I think that matter will regulate itself.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That may be the Senator's guess about it; but certain Senators are very well prepared with voluminous documents and data upon this question, and for their own purposes might obtain the floor and keep it for the entire time, and those on the other side might have no chance to express their views.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I have no objection to the addition of a provision embodying the suggestion of the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Perhaps some Senators will want a good deal of time, and others will want very little. I suggest that it might be well if it could be arranged so that each Senator could have at least five minutes if he desired it.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I think the suggestion of the Senator from Connecticut is well worth consideration. It occurred to me when the agreement was read that the time for consideration was quite limited. I do not believe any Senator wants to make a long speech on this joint resolution, but it certainly is one of very great importance, suggesting a very radical departure from the structure of the Federal Government as it has always existed. I know that personally I want a short time in which to express my views as to the constitutional aspects of the matter, regardless of the question of prohibition or anti-prohibition.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, would the Senator object to a provision to the effect that no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than one hour?

Mr. PENROSE. I was going to suggest that the joint resolution be taken up for consideration on Monday. It can be laid aside temporarily, if no Senator wants to speak on it, and other matters taken up.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I accept that suggestion.

Mr. PENROSE. I would suggest that it be taken up on Monday at 2 o'clock, immediately after the close of the morning business.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Next Monday?

Mr. PENROSE. Yes; but not voted on until Wednesday, and that after Tuesday no Senator shall speak more than 10 minutes.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I accept that proposition. I ask that the Secretary make the necessary changes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary is now rewriting the proposed agreement.

Mr. PENROSE. It ought to be that after Monday no Senator shall speak more than once, and so on.

Mr. STONE. Leave it Tuesday.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Texas asks unanimous consent that immediately upon the conclusion of the routine morning business on Monday, July 30, 1917, the Senate will proceed with the consideration of the joint resolution, and so forth, and at the end of the agreement add this:

And further, that upon Tuesday, July 31, 1917, no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than five minutes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. After Tuesday, I think the Senator said.

The SECRETARY (reading)—

And that after Tuesday, July 31, 1917, no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than five minutes.

Mr. PENROSE. Ten minutes.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I thought the proposed agreement was that on Monday and on Tuesday no Senator should speak more than once nor longer than one hour, but that after Tuesday no Senator should occupy the floor for more than 10 minutes.

Mr. PENROSE. I think that would be all right.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I am very much interested in this matter; not with the idea of interfering with the agreement now before the Senate or preventing in any way by any objection of mine a vote on the constitutional amendment proposed, but I should like an understanding that something will be done to carry out the treaty that has been pending for something like a year at our suggestion. Laws have been passed on the part of Great Britain as to the treaty, and they are wondering why we, who proposed it, have not acted in accordance with the proposition we have already made to them.

I will ask, then, respectfully, that I may have that matter up on Monday. I am extremely anxious to get away from town, if I can; and I should like, on Monday morning, up to the hour of beginning the consideration of the joint resolution in regard to prohibition, to have an opportunity of submitting to the Senate, with a view to securing a vote, the proposition I have just referred to.

Mr. PENROSE. Let us do that in the morning hour.

Mr. SMOOT. At the close of the morning hour.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I said, in the morning hour on Monday; but then they will raise some question on me on Monday, as they have done for three different morning hours, and resolutions of inquiry and other things have constantly delayed me. If I can get two morning hours during this debate, if an adjournment is taken, I have no objection or further request to make.

Mr. PENROSE. I am unwilling to concede more than the morning hour on Monday. If this unanimous-consent agreement is made, as far as I am concerned, it is of enough importance to justify an opportunity for its consideration. If the Senator wants to have two morning hours, I should have to object.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I only want one, if I can get it.

Mr. PENROSE. I thought the Senator said something about two morning hours.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. That was only in case I failed, by the opposition to the bill of a few Senators, that I might have a second one. I am not asking the Senate to agree to that; I am only trying, as more of a personal matter than anything else, to get the matter off my hands. It has been committed to me by the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. PENROSE. Let the agreement read that after the morning hour on Monday the consideration of the joint resolution shall be proceeded with.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I shall be very glad if I can get an opportunity, after the routine morning business, in the two hours, to take up the bill to which I refer. Of course, I have no objection to any unanimous-consent agreement about a vote on the amendment to the Constitution, but in the meantime I am extremely anxious to get this particular matter off my hands. It has been pending for something like a year.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I do not like the idea of tacking two different bills together in one of these unanimous-consent agreements.

Mr. PENROSE. This does not require a unanimous-consent agreement, as I understand. The Senator from Arizona will be satisfied if the unanimous-consent agreement on the Sheppard joint resolution does not begin to run until the close of the morning hour on Monday. He will have to take his chances on getting in on that morning hour. I might want to move to take up the Creel resolution during that time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request proposed by the Senator from Texas?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, let it be stated again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the proposed agreement as modified.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Texas asks unanimous consent that immediately upon the conclusion of the morning hour on Monday, July 30, 1917, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of Senate joint resolution 17, proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and that on the calendar day of Wednesday, August 1, 1917, at 4 o'clock p. m., the Senate will vote without further debate upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the resolution (S. J. Res. 17) through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition, provided that on Monday, July 30, 1917, no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than one hour upon the resolution or any amendment offered thereto, and that on Tuesday, July 31, 1917, no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 10 minutes upon the resolution or any amendment offered thereto.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I do not understand that that carries out the agreement.

Mr. STONE. No; it does not.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am opposed to this joint resolution. I have always been opposed to it, and I expect to vote against it, but I do not desire to use any obstructive tactics to prevent a vote, and I thought we had reached a very reasonable agreement to allow it to be voted on in three days. I understood that the agreement was that on Monday and Tuesday we should have general debate, with a limitation that no Senator should speak more than once or more than one hour on those two days, and that on Wednesday the debate should be confined to the 10-minute rule. I am willing to agree to that, but I am not willing to agree——

Mr. SHEPPARD. That was the agreement.

Mr. STONE. After Tuesday.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The proposed agreement did not read that way.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Alabama is entirely right. The agreement ought to be altered so as to permit a Senator to speak only one hour on this subject. Otherwise, frivolous amendments could be offered to permit him to occupy the whole day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposal will be altered so that each Senator will be limited to one hour.

Mr. PENROSE. Let it be read as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Pennsylvania state the amendment for the benefit of the Secretary?

Mr. PENROSE. That part of the agreement which applies to the proceedings on Monday, as I understand the Senator from Alabama—and I agree with him—should be worded so that no Senator shall speak more than one hour or more than once on that day.

Mr. WATSON. And also on Tuesday.

Mr. PENROSE. And also on Tuesday.

Mr. WATSON. All you need is the 10-minute rule on Wednesday up to the time the vote is taken, so that it will be one hour on Monday and one hour on Tuesday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the agreement in the present form?

Mr. PENROSE. Let it be read, now, as finally amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the proposed agreement as amended.

The Secretary read as follows:

Provided, That on Monday, July 30, and Tuesday, July 31, 1917, no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than one hour upon the resolution, and that after Tuesday, July 31, 1917, no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 10 minutes upon the resolution, or any amendment offered thereto.

Mr. PENROSE. On Monday and Tuesday it ought to be one hour on the resolution or any amendment thereto, to make it correspond.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to that modification? The Chair hears none, and it will be made.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, before the agreement is made I only want to state that I intend to vote against this resolution, but I am fully aware of the fact that there is a majority in the Senate which can vote to bring the resolution up for consideration and proceed with it at any time the Senator from Texas has it in mind to make the effort. Realizing the present emergency in the country and the importance of hastening legislation, I do not intend to make any personal opposition to the consideration of the measure, although, as I said, I intend to vote against it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has been advised that a roll call is necessary. In the opinion of the Chair the roll should be called.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Let the roll be called.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Harding	Norris	Smith, S. C.
Bankhead	Hollis	Overman	Smoot
Beckham	Jones, N. Mex.	Page	Sterling
Borah	Jones, Wash.	Penrose	Stone

Fernald	Lodge	Saulsbury	Underwood
Fletcher	McKellar	Shafroth	Vardaman
Frelinghuysen	Martin	Sheppard	Watson
Gerry	Myers	Shields
Gore	New	Smith, Ariz.
Hale	Newlands	Smith, Ga.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. My colleague [Mr. MCNARY] is temporarily out of the Senate on official business.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] on account of illness.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I desire to announce that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] is necessarily absent on public business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-three Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. Is there objection to entering into the unanimous-consent agreement? [After a pause.] There being none, it is so ordered.

The unanimous-consent agreement is as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that immediately upon the conclusion of the morning hour on Monday, July 30, 1917, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of Senate joint resolution 17, proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and that on the calendar day of Wednesday, August 1, 1917, at 4 o'clock p. m., the Senate will vote, without further debate, upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the resolution (S. J. Res. 17), through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition: Provided, That on Monday, July 30, and Tuesday, July 31, 1917, no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than one hour upon the resolution and amendments offered thereto, and that after Tuesday, July 31, 1917, no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 10 minutes upon the resolution and amendments offered thereto.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. MARTIN. I move that the Senate adjourn until 12 o'clock on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 7 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m., Thursday, July 26, 1917) the Senate adjourned until Monday, July 30, 1917, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, July 26, 1917.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

With profound faith in Thee, O God, our Father, the same yesterday, to-day, and forever, whose mercy is from everlasting to everlasting, we come with blessings upon our lips for the past, and hope in our hearts for the future. May the achievements of the past and present under Thy guidance be the incentives to greater exertions on our part in the present crisis, that we may further our conditions as a people, and the conditions of all lovers of liberty. For Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory, forever and ever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL MONDAY.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next. Is there objection?

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, it is understood that I shall have 10 minutes to-day?

Mr. KITCHIN. I am not going to move to adjourn right away.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MCKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. KITCHIN. I will state to the gentleman that I am not going to move to adjourn until gentleman here make their requests for unanimous consent.

Mr. MCKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is it not possible that the conferees upon the food bill might agree by Saturday?

Mr. KITCHIN. What! [Laughter.]

Mr. MCKENZIE. Is it not possible?

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not think it is within the range of possibility.

Mr. MCKENZIE. It seems to me that we have no right to assume that these gentlemen can not agree, and it does seem to me that if such a thing is possible we ought to meet on Saturday, in order that the conference report may be received and printed, so that we can take it up on Monday.

Mr. KITCHIN. I can say to the gentleman that I have talked with some of the conferees, and they have no idea that they can possibly get together by that time.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Which House acts first?

Mr. MANN. This House acts first. We agreed to the conference.

Mr. KITCHIN. My understanding is there is no possible chance of their agreeing within that time.

Mr. MCKENZIE. Of course, if there is no possible chance of agreement, I do not want to object; but there are some of us who have been here for several weeks waiting for the disposition of this bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Some of us have been here for seven or eight months.

Mr. KITCHIN. Some of us have been here for months waiting for the Senate to get through certain bills and conference reports.

Mr. MCKENZIE. But some of them have not been here in the city.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that while we were in a great rush yesterday to send the food bill to conference, and statements were made to the effect that it would be impossible to give consideration to it in the House without having the public all over the United States complain about the dilatory tactics of the House, yet there is no Member who is able to say how many months, or weeks at any rate, it will be discussed behind closed doors. There does not seem to be any disposition whatever to get quick action when you get away from the House. Members of the House do not seem to have any right to consider or discuss any proposition that comes before it any more, though it can be discussed and delayed and fooled about as much as desired when it leaves here.

Mr. KITCHIN. That is natural. It is almost impossible to get the Senate conferees or the Senate to do the right and proper thing, and I think the conferees on the part of the House are going to stay there and make them do the right thing, even if it takes all summer.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I have the attention of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] for a moment? I think it is pretty well understood that we will be here for a couple of months longer.

Mr. MADDEN. We will be here until next October, a year.

Mr. MANN. Let us hope not.

Mr. AUSTIN. Well, two or three months or longer. Why not proceed to get all of the committees of the House busy and let us get to work and accomplish as much as we can in the way of general legislation, and have that much behind us, so that at the next session of Congress we may be able to get through early next year? [Laughter.]

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, the gentleman ought to have intelligence enough to know, having been so long in this House, that it takes two bodies to pass a law. We have already passed enough in the House to take the Senate three or four months to understand and get at the bottom of right now.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that I have disappointed the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] in the amount of intelligence I have, after a service here of eight years, but there is hope, if I remain in Congress as long as the gentleman, that I shall measure up then to his expectations. But here we are, wasting time, and dillydallying in the House. Why not go to work and get through with it—do something?

Mr. KITCHIN. Does the gentleman put himself in as being a party with the Senate? The gentleman means the Senate is wasting time; the House is not.

Mr. AUSTIN. We are adjourning over three days at a time.

Mr. KITCHIN. Waiting on the Senate.

Mr. AUSTIN. Why not get to work, as many of us stay around here for three days at a time with nothing to do except work in our offices and before the departments. I think we ought to get down to work and do all the people's business.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I think in some respects the less we do the better, myself, but when we meet on Monday, if we adjourn over until Monday, what will be the program then?

Mr. KITCHIN. Unless there are some little unanimous-consent requests, we will have still to wait on the Senate and on conference reports.

Mr. MANN. There will be no other business of importance——

Mr. KITCHIN. Unless there are conference reports.

Mr. MANN. Of course, conference reports would have to be printed and go over.

Mr. KITCHIN. Of course, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] was joking a while ago. He knows there is nothing in the world for us to do here, that we have done everything we have to do.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is facetious.

Mr. AUSTIN. The gentleman from Tennessee believes in working. [Laughter.]

Mr. KITCHIN. Has the gentleman just come to that conclusion after about 50 years?

Mr. ROBBINS. If the gentleman will permit, there is a very important bill pending here before the Committee on Immigration, a bill to compel foreigners who are registered and not amenable to the draft to be drafted, and alien enemies who are registered to be drafted into the civil service. Now, I would like to inquire when that bill will be brought up.

Mr. KITCHIN. As I said, it can only be brought up either by a rule or by unanimous consent, and that can be done on Monday. If it is reported, it can be brought up by unanimous consent.

Mr. ROBBINS. I greatly desire to be present when that bill is considered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

The SPEAKER. The regular order has been called for.

Mr. LONDON. The regular order is to object, I suppose?

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman desires to do so.

Mr. LONDON. I do object, and I want to state why——

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE AND EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to proceed out of order for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Dakota asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object—and I shall not object—I ask that I may proceed for 10 minutes at the conclusion of the gentleman's remarks.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want five minutes.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. That is a different thing. The Chair will put the request of the gentleman from Alabama first.

Mr. HEFLIN. And the reason I make that request is that I have to go to a committee of conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD, and gives as a reason for it that he is on the food-control conference committee. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I inquire on what subject?

Mr. HEFLIN. On the subject of the necessity of speedy action by Congress, backing up the President in these war measures.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. HEFLIN. Then, Mr. Speaker, I shall object to all the other requests.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make the same request—to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. DYER. I ask unanimous consent——

The SPEAKER. Let the Chair put the request of the gentleman from North Dakota first. Is there objection to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. NORTON] speaking for 10 minutes? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. Is there objection to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] speaking for 10 minutes? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. Is there objection to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] speaking for five minutes? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to speak for five minutes following the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] asks for five minutes following the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD]. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN] asks leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes when these other gentlemen have finished.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MORIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman from Louisiana state on what subject?

Mr. ASWELL. It is on the food situation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I inquire on what subject?

Mr. JONES of Texas. On the food bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MORIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes after these other gentlemen get through. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL MONDAY.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to renew my request that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn until Monday next.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet next Monday. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by having printed two bills passed by the Florida Legislature at the last session.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I object.

PROTECTION OF DESERT-LAND ENTRYMEN.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 3331, and ask the House to agree to the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3331) for the protection of the owners of desert-land entrymen who enter the military or naval service in time of war.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman what the Senate amendment is?

Mr. RAKER. The Senate amendment simply strikes out of the title the words "of the owners of." That is all. It is a proper correction of the title.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the title so as to read:

"An act for the protection of desert-land entrymen who enter the military or naval service of the United States in time of war."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the Senate amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for leave of absence for a period of 10 days for my colleague from Michigan [Mr. SCOTT], owing to a death in his family.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent for leave of absence for 10 days for his colleague [Mr. SCOTT of Michigan], on account of death in his family. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

NORTH DAKOTA.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. NORTON] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, my attention has been called this morning to an editorial in the Des Moines Capital, of Des Moines, Iowa, a paper owned and edited by former Senator Lafayette Young, who for five months, during 1910 and 1911, represented the State of Iowa in the United States Senate. This editorial falsely reflects upon the loyalty and patriotism of the people of the State which I have the honor in part to represent. Ordinarily I would not dignify with denial the many extravagant and foolish falsehoods shallow-minded and provincial people in certain sections of the country are wont to recount concerning North Dakota, but during the past few months there seems to have been a premeditated propaganda by a certain class of reactionary newspapers to discredit the farmers of my State in the mind of the rest of the Nation and to hold them up to criticism and contempt, and for this reason this lying editorial from the Des Moines Capital, a copy of which I hold in my hand, I can not permit to go unchallenged. The editorial is as follows:

The Council of Defense for the State of Nebraska has issued an address, calling attention to the prevalence of disloyalty in that State. The council says that the German-Lutheran preachers are unpatriotic. We are not surprised at this assertion. During the first year of the war the Capital considered it a dull day when no letter was received from a German-Lutheran preacher. The preacher generally devoted himself to asserting that the Capital was in sympathy with England. This used to be the general charge against a thoroughly American newspaper. But the German-Lutheran ministers have subsided, so far as we are concerned. They are not wasting any postage. But in Nebraska there seems to have been a lack of patriotic leadership early in the fight. We do not know what course the Nebraska newspapers have taken; therefore we do not know what responsibility rests upon the press. But we know that the general statement is true that on this loyalty question, wherever the newspapers have been right, the people have been right.

No man desires to see his name in print as a possible traitor, but in North Dakota, we are told, there is distinctly a new breed of disloyalty with which the Germans have little or nothing to do. The farmers of North Dakota are composed of Scandinavians. They have organized a political party and at the election last year swept the State. They elected their governor and filled practically every other office. A few days ago a special election was held in one of the North Dakota districts for the purpose of filling a vacancy in Congress.

Again the farmers' party was triumphant. A traveling man who lives somewhere in Iowa tells the Capital that North Dakota does not take any interest in the war and does not care who wins. They just want to live in North Dakota; to own their own elevators; to sell their own wheat at $2 per bushel; and they do not care if Germany sweeps over the entire United States.

This farmers' party is regularly organized with campaign headquarters all the year round. The movement is spreading into Minnesota, also into South Dakota and Nebraska, and the organization is soon to tackle the political situation in Iowa. The agricultural newspapers are feeling their way and winking at this big organization. Some of the agricultural newspapers have sent correspondents to North Dakota to tell all about the farmers' political organization. Our Iowa traveling man says that it sounds to him more like anarchy than politics. He says the movement is only one removed from I. W. W.'ism.

This land of the free has some strange experiences. While our boys are going out to fight to make this a safe place for democracy, thousands of people who ought to have more sense are determined to make it a safe place for anarchy.

Thousands of the farmers of North Dakota have gone into this movement with perfectly patriotic aims. They do not mean to be disloyal; but in politics they have been unable to distinguish between the good and the bad. All the politicians are glib with promises, and the farmers have learned to doubt the whole bunch. We are not going to condemn the farmers' movement in North Dakota. On patriotic lines it ought to be continued. If it has reached the hands of grafters who are even worse than the politicians whom they supplant, the real honest people of North Dakota will find it out and will retrace their steps. But the farmers of North Dakota and Nebraska have no right to select this war time as a fit opportunity for the settlement of local grievances.

I have no information as to the charges made in the first paragraph of the editorial against the German-Lutheran preachers of Nebraska, but if this charge is no more true than the charge made in the succeeding paragraphs of the editorial against the loyalty of the people of my State, there is not a scintilla of truth in it. Mr. Young, the editor of the Des Moines Capital, does not live so far from the borders of North Dakota but that he must have some fair acquaintance with the people of my State, and so I am amazed that he should have permitted the maliciously false statements and innuendoes contained in this article concerning North Dakota to be given circulation in his publication. The chief false indictments in the article are contained in the following:

No man desires to see his name in print as a possible traitor. But in North Dakota, we are told, there is distinctly a new breed of disloyalty, with which the Germans have little or nothing to do. The farmers of North Dakota are composed of Scandinavians. They have organized a political party, and at the election last year swept the State. They elected their governor and filled practically every other office. A few days ago a special election was held in one of the North Dakota districts for the purpose of filling a vacancy in Congress.

Again the farmers' party was triumphant. A traveling man who lives somewhere in Iowa tells the Capital that North Dakota does not take any interest in the war and does not care who wins. They just want to live in North Dakota, to own their own elevators, to sell their own wheat at $2 per bushel, and they do not care if Germany sweeps over the entire United States.

I have lived in North Dakota since the time when I was a very small boy. I have grown up among the people of that State. I know the people there, not only in the congressional district which I represent, but I know them from one end of the State to the other. I know how the people of my State think and I know how they feel. I have eaten, drunk, slept, and worked with them all the years of my active life. I have labored early and late on farms and on ranches in the State. I have lived in some of the largest and in some of the smallest towns in the State. I know the innermost thoughts of the great mass of the farmers in my State. I know their joys and their sorrows; I know their pleasures and their griefs. I know their successes and their failures. I know their yearly springtime hopes and expectations in newly sown fields. I know their autumnal gloom, disappointment, and final resignation when the season has been unfavorable and there is little or nothing to harvest. I know their joyful and happy plans for all the household, even to the tiniest tot, when the granaries have been filled with bounteous crops. I know their bravery, their courage, and their hardy character.

And knowing my people as I do, I feel deeply that no more foul or malicious slander could be heaped upon them than the charge that they are unpatriotic and disloyal to their country in this great war in which our Nation is engaged defending the inviolable rights of our citizens against the ruthless attacks of unbridled autocracy. No more utterly false and no meaner indictment could be made against the people of my State than to say, as has been said in this editorial, that—

North Dakota does not take any interest in the war and does not care who wins; they just want to live in North Dakota, to own their own elevators to sell their own wheat at $2 per bushel; they do not care if Germany sweeps over the entire United States.

No more brave, no more loyal, no more patriotic, and no truer American citizens can be found anywhere in this Nation than the farmers of my State. They have evidenced that at all times and they have proven it beyond any shadow of doubt whenever opportunity offered to do so——

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NORTON. I shall be pleased to yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. PLATT. I am very glad to hear what the gentleman says concerning the farmers of North Dakota, but what about that which a Senator says about a certain public officeholder in that State?

Mr. NORTON. I will say to the gentleman from New York, and I trust that he is not one of those who takes all the loyalty and patriotism of the country unto himself, that I know nothing of the case to which he refers, but it would be a very unusual flock of good sheep where one black sheep might not be found. I think the gentleman might find such among the population of the great State of New York. [Applause.]

Prior to the beginning of this war and since the organization of North Dakota our country has been engaged in one war—the Spanish-American War. In that war the men of the North Dakota National Guard were among the first to be called to the colors and among the first to quickly respond to that call. The record of the First Regiment of North Dakota Volunteers in the Spanish-American War in the field of actual fighting is second to none of the other forces engaged in that war. It is a record which has not only done honor to the State of North Dakota, but to the Nation. The First Regiment of North Dakota Volunteers was sent to the Philippine Islands at the beginning of the war. They were not parade soldiers; they were fighting men, every one of them.

From August 13, 1898, until May, 1899, the men of the First North Dakota carried the flags of their regiment and their country to victory in 37 actual engagements with the enemy, among these engagements being the most sanguinary that took place during the entire war. No braver, no more courageous men ever faced a line of battle than the officers and privates who composed the First North Dakota Volunteers of the Spanish-American War of 1898. And they, remember, nearly every one, were North Dakota farmers and North Dakota farmers' sons.

Many brave men who saw service in that war can testify to this. Only last week, in conversation with that distinguished Spanish-American War veteran of Kansas, Col. LITTLE, who so creditably and ably represents the second congressional district of his State in this body [applause], and who in his short service here has already won the highest regard and confidence of many of the Members of the House, mentioned to me the superior service of the First North Dakota Volunteers in the Philippines and the splendid work of Col. Treuman, Maj. Fraine, Maj. White, and Lieut. Lonnevick, of the regiment. During the Philippine insurrection Col. LITTLE was next in command to "Fighting Fred Funston," and I consider that no higher praise could be given to the officers and men of the North Dakota Volunteers than the commendation of Col. LITTLE, who knows whereof he speaks. A great many of the North Dakotans who saw service in the Philippines are now members of the North Dakota National Guard. Maj. Fraine is colonel of the First North Dakota Regiment, now in the service of the Federal Government. Maj. White is colonel of the Second North Dakota Regiment, now in the Federal service, and Lieut. Lonnevick is captain of one of the companies in the Second North Dakota Volunteers, now in the Federal service.

To-day and through all the trying period of this war the people of my State have stood and are standing loyally behind the President of this Nation and are giving him every reasonable support. They have responded to the fullest extent of their labors for greater agricultural production for the Nation this year. They have responded freely to the extent of their means in the purchase of liberty bonds.

They have given liberally and generously to the Red Cross organization. They are giving generously and patriotically, both of men and money, to the end that the part of this Nation in the war may be carried to final success.

The First North Dakota Regiment has for some time been in the Federal service. Only a few days ago the President authorized the organization of a second regiment of the National Guard in North Dakota. Within an almost incredibly short time the 15 new companies of volunteers authorized to be enlisted have been organized and now are in the service of the Federal Government, awaiting equipment and orders.

If former Senator Lafayette Young or the slimy saurian who gave birth to this editorial had taken the trouble to become really acquainted with the farmers of North Dakota he would have discovered that their loyalty and patriotism is in no way and in no degree less in this war than the loyalty and patriotism of the best farmers of Iowa, and would have found that, as a matter of fact, the loyalty and patriotism of the farmers of North Dakota averages higher than the loyalty and patriotism of a like number of people in almost any other section of the country.

An attempt is made by innuendo in this editorial to charge discredit and disloyalty to the people of North Dakota on account of the result of the recent election in North Dakota in the first congressional district, in which Hon. JOHN M. BAER, whose candidacy had been indorsed by the farmers' organizations, known as the Nonpartisan League, was elected by a large plurality over the other candidates at the election for this office. On account of the reflections in this editorial, and also on account of similar slurring reflections that have recently appeared in Washington and New York papers in reference to Mr. BAER's election, I am impelled to say a few words in regard to the election of Mr. BAER and in regard to Mr. BAER himself, who will soon take his place in this body.

I had hoped that Mr. BAER would be here this week to speak for himself, but I am advised that certain important engagements will prevent him from reaching Washington for several days, and since he is not going to be here for some time I can not longer pass without notice the unfair comments and references that have been made as to the reasons for his election. I have known Mr. BAER personally for about 10 years. He is a splendid type of young American manhood, who is in every way worthy of a seat in this body. [Applause.] His loyalty and patriotism needs no defense from anyone. To those who know him it speaks for itself. He comes from a long line of fighting rather than talking patriotic Americans. His father was one of those brave men who assisted in saving the Union. His father, although a staunch Democrat, carried his rifle in the front of battle, and gave the fullest measure of his support to the plans of President Lincoln for carrying on the war between the North and the South to final success. [Applause.] His brother sacrificed his life for his country as a soldier in the Spanish-American War. JOHN M. BAER himself has been, as long as I have known him, a loyal and intensely patriotic young American. His election was not won, as has been suggested, on any pacifist platform. [Applause.] His election was not won on any platform in opposition to the present war. He advocated in his campaign, as far as I know, nothing un-American and nothing disloyal or unpatriotic. In his campaign Mr. BAER announced time and again that he was in favor of conscription of men and the carrying on of this war to an early success, but that he was equally in favor of the conscription of property to meet the needed expenses of this war. [Applause.] Mr. BAER during his campaign strongly supported the plan that a large part of the revenue for the expenses of the present war should be derived from taxes on large incomes and on excess profits. This plan of financing the war is one in which the rank and file of the people of my State and of many other States as well are much interested. This plan for financing the war has been advocated by myself and by my colleague [Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota] and by a number of others in the House and Senate since the war began.

It is an issue to which the country is much alive. It is a practical and feasible way of financing the war. It is a fair and just way of securing the revenues necessary to carry on the war. It involves the policy of distributing as equitably as it is humanly possible to do so the burdens of the war among our people. It involves a fundamental principle of taxation to which I trust a majority in the Congress will give favorable heed in the final consideration of all revenue bills to provide money for meeting the expenses of the war. [Applause.]

In conclusion, let me say to the editor of the Des Moines Register and to other editors of like kind who have recently taken it upon themselves to freely criticize the patriotism and loyalty of the farmers of North Dakota, that the farmers of North Dakota need no precepts of patriotism or loyalty from them. On the other hand, these verbosely self-acclaimed patriotic editors might, to the better welfare of their country, follow the example of patriotism and loyalty already set by thousands of North Dakota farmers and North Dakota farmer boys and girls since the beginning of the war in their real contribution of those things which will most aid in bringing success to our cause in this war.

If the people throughout the rest of our country do their part in this war as well as the farmers of North Dakota are certain to do their part, there will be no occasion for anyone to fear but that monarchy and autocracy will receive a final deathblow in this war, and that a reign of real domocracy will have a new birth throughout the nations of the earth, and that after the war the whole world will be a happier, safer, and better place for the rank and file of humanity in which to live. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MARTIN of Louisiana). The time of the gentleman from North Dakota has expired. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] is recognized for 10 minutes.

THE PROPOSED COMMITTEE ON THE CONDUCT OF THE WAR.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, to the Lever food bill, now in conference, the Senate added an amendment to create a committee on the conduct of the war. It puts into effect, in substance, the provisions of the bill introduced into this House by the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. MADDEN. It was offered in the Senate by Senator OWEN and passed by a large majority, a majority consisting of both Democratic and Republican votes, and therefore no one, I assume, will hint that there is any sort of partisanship about it.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. For a question?

Mr. AUSTIN. Is it not a fact that Senator WEEKS introduced the bill in the Senate?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes, originally; but the amendment that was adopted was offered by Senator OWEN and is to all intents and purposes the same proposition.

The President, however, has announced his opposition to it, and in a letter to the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, Mr. LEVER, published yesterday in the newspapers, he states his objections in vigorous terms. Among other things he says that—

> Section 23, if enacted into law, would render my task in conducting the war practically impossible.

Then again:

> The constant supervision of Executive action which it admits amounts to nothing less than an assumption on the part of the legislative body of the Executive work of the administration.

And he concludes by saying:

> I sincerely hope that upon reconsideration of this matter both Houses of Congress will see that my objections rest upon indisputable grounds, and I could only interpret the final adoption of section 23 as arising from lack of confidence in myself.

But the main ground of the President's opposition rests upon this sentence:

There is a very ominous precedent in our history which shows how such a supervision would operate. I refer to the Committee on the Conduct of the War constituted by Congress during the administration of President Lincoln. It was the source of constant and distressing harassment and rendered Mr. Lincoln's task all but impossible.

The pertinency of this parallel between the Civil War Committee on the Conduct of the War and the proposed committee on expenditures in the conduct of the war seems to me decidedly open to question. The functions of the committee proposed in section 23 are greatly limited. They relate only to the expenditure of appropriations bearing upon the conduct of the war and the contracts relating thereto, made by officers of the executive departments, with a view to safeguarding expenditures. The functions of the Committee on the Conduct of the War in 1861 to 1865 were practically without limit and related to the entire war policy of the administration.

I do not propose to argue whether the committee was in fact the cause of "constant and distressing harassment and rendered Mr. Lincoln's task all but impossible," as the President says, but certainly there is ample authority to the precise contrary. I read the following from The Life of Lincoln, written by W. O. Stoddard, one of the secretaries at the White House during the Lincoln administration:

It was not long before the "legislative branch" of the Government began to interfere with the "executive branch" in military matters. It was little more patriotic than constitutional, but Mr. Lincoln had no manner of objection. When, in December, 1861, Congress appointed a strong and capable "Committee on the Conduct of the War," its members were at once taken into hearty and intimate consultation. What would surely have been a peril or a hindrance to a weak or selfish ruler was transformed at once into an additional and powerful guaranty of congressional cooperation. It was not so much thenceforward that Congress had assumed a part of the Executive province, but that the Executive had deftly provided himself with personal and official representatives upon the floor of Senate and House.

This committee, constantly advised with, cordially invited to investigate, to consider, to come and to go, and to know everything before it happened, became a priceless safety valve for the growing discontent over inexplicable delays. Without it there can now be little question that Mr. Lincoln would have been more seriously misunderstood and even antagonized by the body of men nominally represented by the committee.

The President of the United States is constitutionally the Commander in Chief, and Abraham Lincoln was also actually dictator; but he was entirely at ease as to all his rights and dignities when a joint committee of Senators and Representatives freely summoned before them his military officers by the dozen, and called for their views of things in general and their professional opinions of battles and campaigns. He knew beforehand that the sure result would be the strong and unanimous sympathy of that "jury" of clear-headed men, with him personally, and their approval of the general outlines of his policy, however much they might disagree among themselves or with him as to details of specific operations.

But whether the facts stated by Mr. Stoddard may be true or not, I want to point out that there is no parallel between the functions of that committee and the functions of the proposed committee. I hold in my hand the report of the Civil War committee, signed by Senator Benjamin F. Wade, and submitted at the second session of the Thirty-eighth Congress. That the scope of their activities was practically unlimited is evidenced by a number of statements contained in that report. For instance, the following:

The investigations of your committee have embraced many subjects. The results of their investigations under the directions of the Thirty-seventh Congress have already been made public. The subjects of their inquiry under the directions of the Thirty-eighth Congress, some of which have already been reported upon, include the following: Army of the Potomac, Battle of Petersburg, Red River Expedition, Fort Fisher expedition, massacre at Fort Pillow, heavy ordnance, light-draft monitors, rebel treatment of prisoners, and massacre of Cheyenne Indians, all of which are or have been specially reported upon. Testimony has been taken upon other subjects which is submitted without reports, either because of the incomplete character of the evidence or because special reports were not necessary.

A committee armed with such powers as these might be a peril and a hindrance to a President provided, as Mr. Stoddard suggests, he were a weak or selfish President, which, of course, our present Chief Executive is not. [Applause.] But no such thing is remotely contemplated in the creation of the committee we are now considering.

Mr. SHERWOOD. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Is there any record anywhere where Lincoln objected to this committee?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I believe not. On the contrary, I have always understood that he welcomed it rather than objected to it. Here is one statement by the committee:

They have taken the testimony of nearly 200 witnesses, almost entirely men in the military service of the Government, including about 100 generals.

Of course this committee is not going to take the testimony of generals. That committee even went so far as to send written questions to every general, I believe, in the Union Army, and one of the questions was this:

Q. Please state such particulars as you may deem necessary to a proper understanding of the several campaigns in which you have been engaged, setting forth the orders and instructions under which those campaigns were conducted and the principal orders and instructions given by you, with such incidents and circumstances as you consider will be of interest to the public, appending to your statement copies of your reports and those of your principal subordinates and keeping the account of each campaign by itself as far as convenient.

Now, it might be, gentlemen, that a committee which took and published testimony like this was, as the President says, a cause of constant and distressing harassment and rendered Mr. Lincoln's task all but impossible, but there is no parallel whatever between that case and the one now before us. We may or may not agree with the comments of Gideon Wells on the report of the Committee on the Conduct of the War, published in his diary, that—this method of supervising military operations by legislative committees is of more than questionable utility. They are partisan and made up of persons not very competent to form correct and intelligent opinions of Army and Navy operations or administrative purposes.

But whether we do or not, the committee we propose is not to be a partisan one and will have nothing whatever to do with "supervising military operations or administrative purposes."

The President, I think, has not been particularly fortunate in the selection of this precedent as an argument against the creation of a committee on expenditures such as we propose. Why should not Congress, through such a committee, keep itself advised as to the expenditure of the appropriations it is called upon to make? In this session alone we have already appropriated more than $9,000,000,000. The newspapers this morning tell us that we are to be called upon for not less than $5,000,000,000 more. Is it not our duty to our constituents and to the country to keep ourselves advised as to how and where this money is spent? No man here, I am assured, wants to do anything to embarrass the administration or to render the task of conducting the war more difficult. We upon this side of the House from the outset have sought no partisan advantage, though upon some occasions opportunities have been obvious. From the beginning we have cooperated with this administration in everything it asked, and no one knows better than the President of the United States that without our cooperation his task would, indeed, have been impossible. [Applause.] In asking for the creation of this committee the country will understand that we are only asking that information to which we and the people we here represent are plainly entitled. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PLATT. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have half a minute in which to answer a question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio may have one-half minute in which to answer a question. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Wilson is himself a historian, and has written pretty largely on the Civil War. Is there any place in his book where he expresses any objection to the committee of Congress to supervise the conduct of the war? I have looked for any such statement, and have not been able to find it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I must confess that I have not been a very strenuous student of the work to which the gentleman refers [laughter], but I have never heard that in that work objection was made to the committee on the conduct of the war.

Mr. PLATT. I do not believe there is any.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Has any agreement been entered into as to debate to-day?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Certain time has been allotted to various gentlemen.

Mr. GARNER. There has been unanimous consent to give a number of gentlemen certain time.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of their remarks I be allowed to speak for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to address the House before the adjournment for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] is recognized for five minutes.

THE FOOD BILL.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, our country faces a crisis which calls for immediate and vigorous action.

I voted against the war. I believed that our country had more to lose than gain by entering into the horrible conflict which is blighting the hopes of all of the white races of the earth. I thought with Washington that our safety demands that we should not engage in the broils of Europe, nor become entangled in alliances with other nations. In that view I did everything in my power to keep the United States out of the war. I was outvoted and Congress declared war against Germany. That declaration was the voice of my country, and of course when I hear my country's voice I must answer her call.

Congress declared war and directed the President to use all of the men and all of the resources of the country necessary to carry that war to a successful end. It is too late now to be talking about whether we should have entered the war. We are already in it. There are only two possible ends for us. One is victory, the other defeat. Victory must be ours. [Applause.]

I am amazed when I look around me and find that some who were loudest in their cries for turning loose the dogs of war are now those lagging and holding back in providing the things that are necessary to make the war a success. When it came to declaring war they were frantic in their promptness. When it came to conscripting our boys for the trenches of Europe they responded with great alacrity. But now when it comes to providing the money, the iron and steel, the arms and ammunition, the clothing and food necessary to sustain our boys whom we are sending out to fight and die in foreign lands, these men are quibbling over details.

Starvation is one of the weapons used on both sides in this appalling struggle. We must see to it that our soldiers are not made its victims. They must have the necessary food and clothing.

The President tells us that an early passage of the food-control bill is an absolute necessity to our success. We must rely upon what he says. On his representations I will vote for the bill. I am ready to vote now.

In giving my support to this measure it must not be understood that I approve all of its provisions. I do not. Nevertheless, I will vote for it as a war measure.

When this bill was reported to the House wheat was selling at $3.25 a bushel. In a few weeks it declined $1 a bushel. This was just at thrashing time. So the reduction in price fell on wheat in the farmers' hands. Assuming the crop for sale to be 600,000,000 bushels, the loss to the farmers by this bill on wheat alone will be $600,000,000. The loss on corn will be even greater. Heavy losses will fall on oats, barley, rye, hay, and other farm products. It would be safe to say that the losses to the farmer in the reductions in prices of his products enforced by this bill will be a billion and a half or two billion dollars. But if such conscription of the products of the farm shall be necessary to our success in the war, I am sure the farmer will not complain. He has already loyally yielded to the conscription of his boys. I believe he also stands ready, if it shall be necessary, to sacrifice himself and the fruits of his toil upon the altar of his country. [Applause.]

But I do not approve that feature of this bill which requires only the farmer to make such sacrifices. It seems to me that it would have been more just if this measure, while cutting down the prices of what the farmer has to sell, had also cut down prices of what he must buy. I have a letter from a manufacturer of machinery in which it is stated that an amount of steel which could have been bought for $25 at the beginning of the war would now cost $200, an increase of 700 per cent. This increase in the price of steel is carried into the nails, wire fencing, horseshoes, wagon tires, tools, machinery, and the hundreds of other things which the farmer must have to be a successful producer.

Another feature of the bill which causes some uneasiness is the person who has been chosen to administer it. Of course, the bill provides that the President shall have control, but everybody knows he has not the time to look after the details. Mr. Hoover has been chosen for that task. From what I have been able to learn of him he has very great ability and exalted character. But while born in this country, he has not lived here for 25 years. During all of that time he has been in the employ of the English in foreign lands. He has amassed a very great fortune and has chosen London for his home. He has a very handsome residence in that great city, to which I presume he will return as soon as he finishes his work here as food dictator. He has no particular knowledge of the farming business of this country which is to be placed so completely in his hands. It is natural that fear should be felt that in the exercise of the very autocratic powers conferred upon him by this legislation he may feel more concern for English consumers than for American farmers. It would have been gratifying if some genuine American thoroughly familiar with our agricultural interests had been selected for this post. [Applause.]

Of course, the United States and England are making war against the same country, and any strength given to the English arm would tend to weaken the common enemy. We must be careful, however, that we do not unduly weaken ourselves. I would beg our English friends to keep in mind that England has much more at stake and much more to gain in this war than have we. We went into the war simply to vindicate and enforce our rights at sea. President Wilson stated for us that we seek neither annexations nor indemnities. On the other hand, England seeks to rearrange the maps of Europe, Asia, and Africa, and make large additions to her own already vast empire.

In a recent speech her prime minister outlined what England expects as a result of this war. Among other things she is to annex Mesopotamia and the African colonies of Germany and establish a protectorate over Syria, Armenia, and Palestine. In the aggregate these territories are 18 times as large as the State of Missouri. In the face of these facts it ought not to be expected that we should impoverish our farmers to furnish cheap food for England. We should place at her disposal any surplus we may have after providing for our own people, but she should be willing to pay a fair price for it. Especially is this true in the face of the fact that our taxpayers are furnishing her the money to buy her supplies.

I realize how impossible it would be to properly balance legislation in an emergency like this. We must speed along. For the present let us rely upon the President to see to it that we are not betrayed. He has the ability, firmness, and patriotism to give us assurance that we may trust him.

Just now let us put everything else aside until we have brought this war to an honorable end. When peace shall have again spread her white wings over the world we can then take our bearings and make proper adjustments. [Applause.]

THE PROHIBITION LOBBY.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, it ought not to be necessary to call the attention of the American people to the necessity and importance of personal sacrifice at this time. We ought to—and we will, if we are decent citizens of this country—give up personal aims and ambitions, partisan advantages, and the like, for the greater interest and greater welfare of all Americans, and which is to win at the earliest possible time the war in which we are engaged, and thereby do a real service to the people of the world by ending this horrible and inexcusable European war at the earliest possible time. Yet, Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding that we ought to be patriotic and well meaning for the common good of our land and the world, there are stalking about the Halls of Congress and the corridors and rooms of the House and Senate offices the representatives of the prohibitionist organizations seeking to stir up hate, envy, jealousy, sectional, racial, and all kinds of animosity. They want to turn Americans against Americans, because it will possibly help the cause of the prohibitionists. They try to create the impression that citizens of this country of German birth or descent are not patriotic. It is easy for such un-American and unpatriotic people to ply their trade of this nature and to cause trouble because we are now at war with the German Empire. Yet the President said, when he asked us to declare war on the German Imperial Government, that we were not going to war on the German people of the German Empire, much less the citizens of our own country of German blood. Yet what care these fanaties, hypocrites, and the like for the United States of America? It is prohibition they want above everything else. They care not what the result of this war is so long as they fasten upon the people of this land their selfish prohibition ideas. The President of the United States, the Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy, the one who has the supreme responsibility in this war so far as this country is concerned, asked that these prohibitionists stop interfering with Congress and let us legislate for the whole people. He asked them to withdraw their opposition to the manufacture of beer and wine during the war.

They—the officers of the Anti-Saloon League—promised they would, but they did not keep their word. They have been lobbying just the same, but under different names, perhaps, so far as the public is concerned; but they can not fool those who are onto their workings. They are now working under the name of the International Reform Bureau, and a representative of this antisaloon, prohibitionist, and anti-American organization only a few days ago called upon me and handed to me in my office in the House Office Building a circular or bulletin, as it is called, dated July 20, 1917, and having as a lead line "Prohibition up again in the House of Representatives." This circular was taken around and handed to the Members personally for the purpose of trying to influence their votes on the amendments pending to the food-control bill as it came into the House for reference to the conferees a few days ago. They hoped to stir up enough feeling to cause the Members of the House to vote to instruct the conferees to insist upon the discontinuance of grain, and so forth, in the manufacture of beer. They want to kill beer. They knew it could not be done upon merit, so the "pro-German beer saloon" was originated with them. Without excuse, without reason—just to put one nationality against another of American citizens. Let me invite your attention to this circular.

Among the statements in it, Mr. Speaker, are, in several places, the words "pro-German beer saloons." In other words, in order to prejudice Members of the House and of the Senate against allowing the manufacture and sale of beer during the war they have coined the words "pro-German beer saloons." For what purpose, gentlemen? For no other purpose than to try to set one class of people in this country, in these serious times, against another class of people. These men representing the prohibition forces, going about trying in these serious times to put one nationality against another, and especially when we are at war with Germany, are not patriots, are not good Americans at all, and the President could do no better than to have all these people—these fanatics, these prohibitionists before they are Americans—interned during the war. [Applause.]

I told this gentleman who brought this circular to me that he was an enemy of the Republic in going about at this time charging men with being pro-German because they happened to be saloon keepers. But the fact is, Mr. Speaker, that more of the saloon keepers in this country to-day by far are of other nationalities than they are German. To try to set up a hatred and enmity to people of this country who are of German birth and ancestry, for the only purpose of gaining personal ambition and desire, regardless of justice, regardless of what the President says, regardless of the interests of the country, is low, mean, and contemptible. Those who do this are not Americans, and, Mr. Speaker, they ought to be driven out of the Capitol instead of being allowed to hang around Members of Congress while we are considering these important matters.

I saw the very man who brought the circular to me afterwards talking with a Member of the House while we were trying to get the food-control bill in conference, trying to persuade him, no doubt, to ask that the House conferees be instructed to disregard the best interests of the country. They have even passed around the Capitol statements that the breweries of the United States are owned by citizens of the German Empire. They have charged that publicly, when, as a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe it is so in any particular. I have inquired of the brewers in my city whether any of their stock was owned by any citizen of the German Empire, and I have received answers to the effect that not one dollar was invested in their business by any citizen of the German Empire. On the other hand, a great part of the stock of the breweries of this country is owned by people of the British Empire. We have English syndicates which control strings of breweries all through the country. So there is no excuse, Mr. Speaker, for making so false and villainous a charge as that, and their only object and purpose can be, and is, to try to incite enmity and ill feeling against people of this country of German blood, and who have been always and are now genuine and true-blue Americans. These citizens have bought the bonds of the liberty loan in abundance, they have subscribed to the Red Cross fund most freely, and their sons have gone to the front in the Army and Navy in large numbers. They will continue to go as long as men are needed to fight for the United States. They are not cowards. They are Americans of the right sort, and not the kind that try to undermine, deceive, and disrupt.

Yet, Mr. Speaker, these honorable and brave people must suffer at the hands of these small Americans all kinds of insults during this war simply because they are of the same blood as the Imperial German Government with which we are at war. Lies will be circulated to harm them. If a farmer's hogs get the cholera, some one will say a German poisoned them. If cattle get diseases, it will be said that Germans are responsible, and there are some people fools enough to believe it.

It is just like the stories that people of Germany own the breweries in the United States. Nobody believes it, of course, after the facts are known, but that does not stop these lies being circulated and the great harm they do before the truth is known.

To show, Mr. Speaker, how false are these charges let me call your attention to a few telegrams from breweries in my city, as follows:

ST. LOUIS, MO., July 10, 1917.

Hon. L. C. DYER, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.:

Replying to telegram, you are informed we know of no brewery stock owned by citizens of Germany. Practically all brewery stock, with the following exception, is held by citizens of the United States: English syndicates, which own millions upon millions of stocks and bonds of brewery organizations in Missouri, Ohio, Chicago, New York, and elsewhere. As an example, the St. Louis Brewing Association in St. Louis is familiarly referred to as the English syndicate. Please disseminate this information thoroughly, and oblige,

Every share of Lemp Brewing Co. stock owned by residents and citizens of the United States, to the best of my knowledge and belief. Large blocks of so-termed brewery syndicates in the United States are held by British subjects. Never heard that citizens of the German Empire owned American brewery stock worth speaking of. Mr. Lemp out of the city.

Our Mr. Koehler on way home from New York, possibly stopping off at Washington to-day. Of the 450 stockholders in Independent Breweries Co. every one is an American citizen, and all our 13 directors are American citizens by birth. We employ 750 men, belonging to organized labor unions, the rules of which require their members to be American citizens under penalty of loss of membership by any foreign-born member who fails to become fully naturalized. It is absolutely untrue that the breweries of this country are practically owned by citizens of the German Empire as alleged. On the contrary, they are owned by American citizens.

There are a number of large breweries all over the country, from Boston to San Francisco, also owned and financed by citizens of Great Britain.

DEAR SIR: In answer to your telegram of July 9, beg to inform you that no citizen of the German Empire owns any interest in this brewery, nor is there any citizen of the German Empire employed in this brewery.

Hon. L. C. DYER, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. DYER: Glad to receive your letter of the 17th instant, concerning falsehoods being circulated by the prohibition lobby as to the ownership of stocks and bonds in the breweries of the United States. These reports have been bobbing up all over the country, and just yesterday a prominent prohibitionist in Kansas City, Mo., made similar utterances. Some people swallow this fable as gospel, but as a rule, after the noise is over, there is a revulsion of feeling and the effect the prohibitionists attempted to produce is lost, together with a slice of their own small stock of self-respect.

Respectfully,

OLIVER T. REMMERS.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, the so-called food-control bill is now pending before a conference committee composed of members of the Committees on Agriculture of the House and the Senate. I regret that the parliamentary situation was such that I was not permitted to discuss the provisions of this bill, or of the Senate amendments to it, before it was so referred; but as I was not permitted to do so then, I desire now, with the permission of the House, to briefly discuss one of the Senate amendments.

The primary purposes of this bill as applied to food were, as I understand, first, to stimulate and to increase the production of wheat; second, to furnish consumers of this and the allied countries food at a reasonable price. There are some who seem to think that the purposes of the bill were, first, to urge farmers to produce large crops of wheat, and second, to penalize them for complying with the request. The first essential recognized and contemplated by the proposed legislation was to encourage next year the production of a large crop. To do that you must all know that the wheat farmers of the country will expect to be assured that they will be able to sell their wheat at a fair if not a remunerative price; that is, at or above the cost of raising it.

I have had some considerable experience as a wheat farmer and know something of the cost of its production. I know that some years ago I have raised and sold wheat at less than $1 per bushel at a fair profit, but know equally as well that it can not be done now. The cost of everything that goes into the production of wheat is much higher than a few years ago, and the price of some of them, including land, seed, and labor, have more than doubled in price.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. For a question.

Mr. QUIN. Taking into consideration the value of the land, the farmer's implements, and the high overhead charges, what does it cost to raise a bushel of wheat?

Mr. RUSSELL. In my opinion, not less than $1.75 per bushel.

Mr. W. L. Nelson, assistant secretary of the Missouri State Board of Agriculture, has made a careful investigation of the cost of raising the present crop of wheat in that State, and says that it was more than $1.75 per bushel. In this estimate he values the land at $75 per acre, while I personally know that a great majority of the land in my district upon which wheat was grown is worth in cash an average of more than $100 per acre, which, at 6 per cent on the increased valuation of the land above Mr. Nelson's estimate, would increase the cost price of the wheat 10 cents per bushel, and thus raise the estimate to $1.85 per bushel. Some insist that the minimum price fixed by the present bill of $2 per bushel is unreasonable in amount, and to those who so contend permit me to call their attention to the fact that wheat shipped from my district sold in the St. Louis market on last Saturday at $2.43 per bushel, and in the face of the passage of this bill, that had already resulted in lowering the market price of wheat throughout the country and in the midst of large deliveries of the present crop of wheat from the South and Southwest.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. For just a moment. I have only 10 minutes.

Mr. BOOHER. I would like my colleague to state, from his knowledge, whether he thinks it has ever cost $1.75 a bushel to raise wheat?

Mr. RUSSELL. I do, on land worth $100 or $125 per acre and at the present high prices of food, feed, labor, and farm machinery.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I will.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Are not the farmers being treated fairly when we place in the food bill a minimum price of $2 a bushel for wheat?

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes; I think so; but we do not know that provision will be in this bill when it passes the House, and that is the very thing I am now talking about. I believe it ought to be retained, and I hope when the conference committee reports it back to the House that their report will retain the amendment placed in this bill in the Senate, which provides for a minimum price for wheat until the 1st of July, 1919, at $2 per bushel. That is the very thing I think ought to be done, and I think it will be unfair and discourage the production of wheat next year unless we have in it some assurance of that kind.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. I agree with the gentleman and shall vote for that amendment to the bill.

Mr. RUSSELL. I am glad to know that the gentleman favors it.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask the gentleman if he does not believe the men here representing the wheat farmers ought to refuse to vote for the bill unless that provision of $2 as a minimum price for wheat is retained in the bill?

Mr. RUSSELL. Every man must judge that for himself. As far as I am concerned, I think I will vote for the bill whether that provision is retained in it or not. I have great confidence in the President of the United States, and I believe that he will have something to do with the naming of the price which the farmers will get for their wheat next year, and I hope if this provision is not retained that the President and whoever represents him, either upon the board or individually, in fixing the price of wheat will see that the wheat producers of this country are treated fairly. At the same time I think it is of importance enough that the farmers ought to be protected by the written provisions of this bill.

The farmers are asked by increased efforts to produce a large crop next year, so as to guarantee bread for our own country and her armies, and also for our allies and their armies, while fighting to a successful finish this world-wide war, and it is not unreasonable that they should want some assurance if they do so to receive at least within 43 cents per bushel of the present price paid in the open, unrestricted markets of the country. A large crop of wheat next year we all recognize as a matter of grave importance; but if you expect to successfully encourage the farmers to extraordinary efforts to produce such a crop you must expect to treat them fairly.

I am heartily in favor of this bill as a war measure and recognize it as a necessity in order to protect the American people against exorbitant war prices now paid for food, feed, and fuel by the consumers of the country. Flour has this year sold as high as $17 per barrel, but I am informed that this bill, which provides for $2 per bushel for wheat, should reduce the price of flour to $10 or $11 per barrel, which will furnish some relief.

For my part, I am not able to understand how the poor laboring man with a family who has during the last year worked for $2 per day, as many have done, has been able to pay rent and keep the wolf from the door. My sympathy is always with the man who makes his living by honest toil and who "eats his bread in the sweat of his face." I not only sympathize with him and am anxious to do what I reasonably can for his relief, but I suggest that we begin by crushing the unreasonable profits of the coal barons, the middlemen, and the speculators, who have been largely responsible for the increased cost of living of all the consumers of the country, including farmers. I warn you not to begin your reform for lower prices by inflicting injustice upon the farmers of the land by requiring them to produce larger crops and to sell them at unreasonably lower prices, while giving them no relief against exorbitant prices that they must pay for the necessaries of life that they must buy.

I am for this bill or any other bill that seems to be necessary to successfully fight, and to speedily win the present war. I am willing to make any reasonable sacrifice myself and willing to vote for any reasonable sacrifices to be borne by the American people that will help us to speedily win the war and bring back to us in the near future the blessings of peace, but I am not willing by solemn legislative act to punish our farmers, to whom we must all look for bread, by requiring them to put forth extraordinary efforts to supply wheat or other foodstuffs at prices below the cost of production.

I hope the conference committee will approve of and retain in the bill the Senate amendment providing for a minimum price of $2 per bushel for wheat and that the bill as thus amended will be promptly passed.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman from Mississippi rise?

Mr. QUIN. I want to have permission to make a little speech. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman make a request?

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have 10 minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, there will be no more talk on the food bill to-day. This House would not let us talk on it yesterday when it was up, and you will not talk on it any more to-day when we have passed the bill to conference.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN] asks unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes after the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER]. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I voted for the food and fuel control bill. I have long been in favor of enacting some legislation to effect the purpose of the bill, and especially so since a Member of the House, who is now on the floor, told me a few weeks ago that a man prominently interested in a coal mine had, in a then recent conversation, said to him: "If only this can go on as it is now for another year or two, I do not care what becomes of the mine. I shall have what I want." That anecdote merely increased my already strong desire to help enact, as soon as possible, some law to protect people who must buy food and fuel against the demands of rapacious, heartless greed. Yesterday, however when the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] made a motion by which he sought to secure a separate vote on a new section—section 23—of the bill as it came back from the Senate, I was one of the 101 Members who voted for his motion. I so voted not with any desire to delay the enactment of the bill into law, nor in even the slightest degree to interfere with the President in the discharge of his duties as Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy and as head of the executive department of the Government, but simply because I thought that Members of the House and of the Senate, chosen by the American people to represent them, and vested by the Constitution with sole power to appropriate the public money, have a right during the progress of this most gigantic of all wars to know how the money which they appropriate is being expended. I thought that by passing section 23 Congress would be doing only its duty to itself and to the country.

I then thought, and still think, that the President erred in two statements in his letter to the honorable chairman of the Committee on Agriculture. One mistake has, in my judgment, been clearly brought out by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH]. I shall not refer to it except to say that the duties of the committee of 1861 to 1865 were of far greater scope than are the proposed duties of the committee suggested by the amendment, section 23, passed by the Senate and sent here—a committee to be composed of three Democratic Senators, two Republican Senators, three Democratic Members of the House, and two Republican Members of the House, merely to keep watch during the present terrific war of the way in which the money we appropriate—the people's money, taken from them by taxation—is being expended. And yet the President says, in effect, that for us to adopt that would be a reflection upon his ability and integrity.

I could only interpret—

Says the President—

the final adoption of section 23 as arising from lack of confidence in myself.

Why, Mr. Speaker, if the President's attitude is the correct one, then the Bill of Rights in the Federal Constitution and the bill of rights in each State constitution, and every other safeguard thrown around the exercise of the power of Federal or State executive, is a direct reflection upon every President and Cabinet officer, and Member of the Senate and of the House and every governor ever in office since the adoption of the Constitution and the first elections under it. Is it possible that for the legislative department to keep track of the expenditure of the public funds constitutes a reflection upon the Executive?

Now, I speak with entire respect of the President. He is our President, and at this awful juncture no Senator or Representative wishes in any respect to interfere with him in the discharge of his onerous duties. But we have duties as well. And, in this connection, I may be permitted to say that to me the President seems mistaken in his views as to the theory upon which laws ought to be passed in a republic. He appears to think that for Congress to keep watch over the expenditure of money which it itself appropriates would be a reflection upon him.

Now, to show the other, and as I feel sure the correct view, I direct attention to a very famous authority, one with which, doubtless, Members are familiar—a master logician, Jeremy Bentham, whose famous work, the Book of Fallacies, has been so widely productive of good in legislation.

I pause here to say that one of the greatest benefits that could be conferred upon the American people would result if some competent educator were to take Bentham's Book of Fallacies, exclude all irrelevant matter, make simple some of his more involved sentences, and then the revised, simplified book were to be read generally by the people of the country, and especially by every lawmaker in the Nation.

This profound thinker gives to various fallacies various names. One he terms the "self-trumpeter's fallacy," and I ask attention to a part of what he says concerning it:

There are certain men in office who in discharge of their functions arrogate to themselves a degree of probity which is to exclude all imputations and all inquiry: their assertions are to be deemed equivalent to proof; their virtues are guaranties for the faithful discharge of their duties; and the most implicit confidence is to be reposed in them on all occasions. If you expose any abuse, propose any reform, call for securities, inquiry, or measures to promote publicity, they set up a cry of surprise, amounting almost to indignation, as if their integrity were questioned or their honor wounded.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I regret that I can not yield. I have only a few minutes.

Hear him in a few words present a truth of vital importance:

If there be any one maxim in politics more certain than another, it is that no possible degree of virtue in the governor can render it expedient for the governed to dispense with good laws and good institutions.

Let us, as American citizens, now and always remember that vital truth:

No possible degree of virtue in the governor can render it expedient for the governed to dispense with good laws and good institutions.

And now, in conclusion, and as directly pertinent to the discussion concerning this Senate amendment, I ask that you listen to this clear, powerful statement of the true theory upon which legislation must proceed in every free country that hopes to continue free. He says:

In every public trust the legislator should, for the purpose of prevention, suppose the trustee disposed to break the trust in every imaginable way in which it would be possible for him to reap, from the breach of it, any personal advantage. This is the principle on which public institutions ought to be formed; and when it is applied to all men indiscriminately, it is injurious to none. The practical inference is to oppose to such possible (and what will always be probable) breaches of trust every bar that can be opposed consistently with the power requisite for the efficient and due discharge of the trust. Indeed, these arguments, drawn from the supposed virtues of men in power, are opposed to the first principles on which all laws proceed.

[Applause.]

That is the judgment of a world-famous authority, and his logic is unmistakable and likewise unanswerable. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORIN] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MORIN. Mr. Speaker, in introducing a resolution at this time for the home rule of Ireland opposition is expected from those who will say we have assembled here in session extraordinary for the discussion of measures that pertain alone to the war. And that is true. It is because this is a question that is vitally connected with the final outcome of this war that it should now be considered.

In order to rightly estimate the future our judgment must be based on the facts disclosed by the past and the happenings of to-day. Lincoln, standing on the field of Gettysburg, viewing the greatest conflict that had ever then occurred, predicated his immortal address on the fundamental truth that no nation can exist that is half slave and half free, and in words that ever echo he reiterated the principles on which democracy must rest. Those principles were the tried corner stone on which the superstructure of our Nation was laid, and time has proven that storm may beat and break but our Nation stands and will ever stand, because it is founded on eternal right.

To-day we are standing in the shadow of a great victory. We know that what has been proven true for our country will prove equally true for the nations of the world. Stability of government can only be looked for when it rests upon laws administered through the consent of the governed. We are contending for such government of the nations of the world, for we are confident in that way only can we hope for an enduring peace. Our President has said:

We are glad * * * to fight thus for the ultimate peace of the world and for the liberation of its peoples, the German peoples included; for the rights of nations great and small and the privileges of men everywhere to choose their way of life and of obedience.

Our stand has been frankly taken, widely heralded abroad, and our allies have given, through acquiescence, their fullest indorsement to the principles we are advocating. It would therefore seem fitting at this time to urge that England should now grant to Ireland the home rule for which she has so long struggled. Then when the day comes that the nations now at war begin the consideration of world peace and broader democracy the force of England's contentions will not be diminished by these words of criticism—"Physician, heal thyself."

The "Irish question" has perplexed and vexed our British allies for more than a thousand years, and it is still unsettled. During that period it has assumed different forms and its attempted solutions have at times been marked with oppression, suffering, and bloodshed. When Rome first entered upon her career of conquest the British Isles, in common with France and Spain, were inhabited by what is known as the Celtic branch of the Caucasian race. These Celts, or Gauls, had constituted a powerful empire covering parts of Asia Minor and all of southern Europe except the peninsula of Greece and Italy. Twice they threatened the destruction of Rome itself, but finally they had withdrawn to western Europe, where they were attacked by the Roman power. First Spain was made subject to Rome; next France, or Gaul, as it was then termed, was subdued by Julius Cæsar, who, in 55 B. C., carried the Roman arms into the British Isles.

While the Celts constituted a single branch of the Caucasian race, they were divided into two classes by physical characteristics, one, the Brachycephalous—broad-headed, and the other Dolichocephalous—longheaded. The former usually have dark hair and eyes and the latter light hair and blue eyes. Sometimes these two types lived together and sometimes formed separate communities.

At the time Cæsar crossed over from the Continent there were four distinct communities—all, however, Celts—in the British Isles. They were in substantially what are known to-day as England, Wales, Scotland, and Ireland. The people were designated as Picts, Scots, and Bretons, and later as Welsh, Scotch, Irish, and English. The Romans conquered only England and Wales. The Norman conquest, too, was virtually confined to these two divisions. Still, even on the island of Great Britain there was no close union for centuries and wars were frequently waged between them until finally Wales and Scotland were united with England in what has since been known politically as Great Britain. This union was partly dynastic. Henry Tudor was a Welshman, who became Henry VII of England and founded the Tudor dynasty. The union between England and Scotland was cemented when James VI of Scotland became heir to the English throne and was crowned as James I of Great Britain.

Unhappy Ireland, however, has had a sadder fate. While among the nations of northern Europe, she first accepted Christianity and became a missionary center whence was diffused both to Great Britain and the countries on the Continent the light of both Christianity and culture, she herself, enthralled in wars, has suffered spoliation and oppression for almost a thousand years. First came the Danish Rovers, in 968, overrunning the land; then, 200 years later, the Normans undertook the conquest of the island, thus beginning the struggle which is not yet ended. To the desolation of war and the spoliation of conquest were added the rapacity of absentee landlords and the restrictions on commerce, which ground the people into abject poverty. Religious bigotry and ecclesiastical intolerance added to the bitterness of the cup that was pressed to the lips of Ireland.

Yet through it all she added to the strength and renown of Great Britain. Her poets and scholars helped render English literature illustrious. Her soldiers were among the bravest, and her generals among the ablest that fought the battles of the British Empire; and through it all, until a little over a century ago, the Irish people had a nationality of which they were proud. In matters of local government they had nominally home rule. The Irish Parliament stood for government of the Irish people by themselves. The Green flag of Erin was a symbol of a political entity. It meant that although in affairs affecting the whole Empire Ireland was a subordinate part, still it had an individuality which meant much to its sons, while in local affairs it was independent. It is true that by successive acts under the German Georges of England this home parliament was shorn of many of its powers; but in 1783 it was reinstated in its full authority. "The King, Lords, and Commons of Ireland" constituting the Irish Parliament was declared to be an "independent legislature."

It is true that with the religious intolerance and bigotry of that age, a majority of the people of Ireland were excluded from the suffrage and from a right to participate in the government. The qualifications were the same as in England—none but members of the established church could vote or hold office. But in England only a few were thus debarred, while in Ireland it shut out four-fifths of the people. Naturally the people were not wholly satisfied. The old abuses were not at once abolished, nor old wrongs redressed. Still there was a feeling of national pride that was working to bring about better feeling and friendly cooperation between the people of the two islands.

The Napoleonic wars came on, and Napoleon, like Germany to-day, attempted to profit by stirring up the unrest in Ireland. Then the younger Pitt, prime minister of England, conceived the idea of destroying the autonomy of the island and making it like Scotland and Wales, a part of Great Britain, to be governed by the British Parliament, in which it would have representatives according to its population. The plan looked fair—to Englishmen—but it filled the hearts of Irishmen with despair and hatred, as it involved the loss of the individual nationality which they prized. To make the change, however, required the consent of the Irish Parliament, and Pitt, by the most gigantic bribery and corruption, bought up this Irish Parliament and thus caused it to sell out the freedom of its own country.

The "act of union" took effect in January, 1801, and the old contest was renewed with added bitterness. Since then many a noble Irish patriot has fallen a martyr to the cause of Irish nationality. With the broadening sympathy of advancing civilization Great Britain has within the last half century done much to ameliorate social and economic conditions in Ireland. But she has not yet found the way to satisfy the Irish longing for home rule.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as I have said before, this time does indeed seem most opportune for England to take such action. It will relieve her of the charge of inconsistency which her enemies now hurl at her when she asserts her purpose to fight with us for world-wide democracy and the freedom of nations, large or small, to govern themselves. It would at once relieve a large army which she has to keep in Ireland as a safeguard against insurrection, and, still more, it would bring perhaps a million of grateful Irishmen, volunteers, to aid in fighting her battles in the war. In this country, too, there are millions of the sons and daughters of Ireland who, while at present as loyal Americans are earnestly supporting the Government, would have their hearts filled with increased joy and their zeal kindled with a new ardor in the knowledge that the great country with which we are now in alliance had proven the consistency of its proclaimed purpose and had evidenced this by beginning at home and granting home rule to long-oppressed Ireland.

The deathless cause of Ireland
Has lived through many ills.
And dauntless souls, and fearless hearts,
Strong hands and stubborn wills,
Are linked to-day
To force their way
Through gloom to freedom's light.

SENATE.

MONDAY, July 30, 1917.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we have come into the possession of a glorious heritage. Lest we forget that it is by Thy grace that we have come into this possession, we continually make mention of Thy name. We come with adoration and praise before Thee, God of all the earth, and pray Thee to lift up the light of Thy countenance upon us. Give to Thy servants in this Senate the clear discernment of the divine purpose and will. Give them the spirit to execute Thy will among us as a Nation, that the laws they write may be a transcript of the divine mind, and that the destiny awaiting us may be the fulfillment of the divine plan. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Tuesday, July 24, 1917, when, on request of Mr. MCCUMBER and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

FINDINGS OF THE COURT OF CLAIMS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the chief clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a certified copy of the findings of fact and conclusion filed by the court in the cause of Sara F. Cox, heir and legal representative of James J. Cox, deceased, v. The United States (S. Doc. No. 68), which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by G. F. Turner, one of its clerks, announced that the House agrees to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3331) for the protection of the desert-land entrymen who enter the military or naval service of the United States in time of war.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication signed by Gustave Hafer, president of the Farmers' Feed Co., of New York, in which he states that a petition from that company, of which he is president, was accredited with approval of national prohibition as a war measure. He desires to state that the Farmers' Feed Co. is irrevocably opposed to prohibition, both in times of peace and war. The communication will be placed on the files of the Senate.

The Chair also lays before the Senate a communication from Ernest Bohm, corresponding secretary of the Central Federated Union of Greater New York and vicinity, stating that a petition sent by them to Congress on June 27, 1917, and presented to the Senate stated that they were in favor of national prohibition as a war measure. The fact is that they are opposed to national prohibition most determinedly and request that the RECORD show that the Central Federated Union of Greater New York and vicinity is opposed to national prohibition as a war measure. The communication will be filed.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I desire to present petitions in behalf of the nation-wide prohibition amendment, representing some ten to twelve million people. The petitions were prepared and circulated under the supervision of Miss Anna Gordon, the able and devoted president of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, assisted by Mrs. Ellis, the faithful and effective national legislative representative. I ask that the petitions may be received and lie on the table.

Mr. POMERENE. I have received a large number of memorials signed by citizens of Cincinnati, Ohio, remonstrating against national prohibition. I ask that the memorials be received and appropriately referred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The memorials will lie on the table.

Mr. PHELAN presented a petition of the Southern District of California Federation of Women's Clubs of Colton, Cal., praying for the establishment of a moral zone around the concentration camps of the Army, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I present a resolution of the Southern Newspaper Publishers' Association, which I desire to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ASHEVILLE, N. C., July 9, 1917.

The Southern Newspaper Publishers' Association, composed of 105 of the leading daily newspapers of the South, in convention assembled, to-day unanimously passed a resolution expressing the keenest sympathy with the Government's needs in the present extraordinary financial situation; the most cordial willingness to cooperate in raising the necessary additional revenues; and their desire to stand their just and fair proportion of the increased taxation. The convention, however, unanimously voiced the opinion that the proposed extra tax on the net revenues of newspapers, which does not apply to other lines of business, is unjust, unfair, and discriminatory.

In reference to the proposed increase in second-class postage rates, this association believes that it has no place in a revenue bill, and the proper rate or rates should be determined by an impartial investigation. If, however, an increase in postage rates is absolutely necessary at this time, this association believes that the only fair and equitable basis is the zone system, the theory of which is fully outlined in Senator MCKELLAR'S amendment, with the present rate applying for the first 300 miles, which investigation has shown already affords the Government a profit, and increasing rates for longer distances in proportion to the cost to the Government for services rendered publishers.

SOUTHERN NEWSPAPER PUBLISHERS' ASSOCIATION.

Resolutions adopted by the Southern Newspaper Publishers' Association, in convention at Asheville, N. C., July 9–11, 1917.

Resolved, That the Southern Newspaper Publishers' Association, representing 105 leading daily newspapers of the South, in convention assembled, unqualifiedly approves and strongly urges the immediate adoption of the complete plans of the print-paper committee of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association to empower the Federal Trade Commission by legislative enactment to control the production of news-print paper, to pool its distribution, and to fix its price.

This action is absolutely necessary to conserve the best interest of our Government and our people under the present extraordinary emergency.

* * * * * * *

Resolved, The Southern Newspaper Publishers' Association, representing 105 leading daily newspapers of the South, in convention assembled, unanimously indorses and urges the adoption of the plans for the release and development of the water power of our country as proposed in the Walsh bill in the Senate and the Reed bill in the House.

We believe that the adoption of such measures insures the development of our country along industrial lines, and especially do they promise permanent relief to the newspapers of the country from the oppressive condition brought about by the News-print Manufacturers' Trust.

ELECTION OF PRESIDENT AND VICE PRESIDENT.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have a petition prepared by Julius A. Coleman, of Seattle, Wash., suggesting a plan for the direct election of President and Vice President of the United States. The petition shows a great deal of research and study, and I think, in connection with the amendments that are now pending relating to this matter, it would furnish some very valuable information and suggestions. I ask that the petition may be printed in the RECORD. I will also state that the petition is signed by about 30 very representative men from my State, and as the number of petitioners is limited to that small number, I ask that the signatures may also be printed with the petition in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The petition is as follows:

To the honorable the Senate of the United States of America:

Privileged by his country's Constitution, your petitioner braves the criticism of presumption in praying your consideration of the following plan to remove and prevent occasions for hurtful evil permitted in that Constitution, universally considered supreme, and, God grant, of always reverential honor.

At the same time, assuming sole responsibility for errors and imperfections in this proposal and in the argument in support thereof, he voices his petition in no tone of supplication, but with all the confidence that belongs to a coruler of a common country.

Should this proposal have the honor of your consideration, it is made with no thought that it will be submitted to the people as drawn, but to awaken your wiser effort to better its purpose in substance, phrase, and form.

To amend the Constitution of the United States so as to elect President and Vice President by a direct vote of the people.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That in lieu of section 1 of Article II of, and the twelfth amendment to, the Constitution of the United States, and to stand as section 1 of Article II of the Constitution, the following be proposed as an amendment to the Constitution, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part thereof when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States:

"ARTICLE XVIII.

"SECTION 1.

"CLAUSE 1. The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. He shall hold his office for the term of six years, beginning the 4th day of January next following his election, and shall be elected by the people of the United States. At the same time, for the same term, and in the same manner, there shall be elected a Vice President of the United States of America, upon whom, as President, shall devolve the powers and duties of the said office in case of the death or constitutional disability of the President to discharge the powers and duties thereof, or of his resignation or removal therefrom.

"CLAUSE 2. No person shall be eligible to the offices of President and Vice President except a natural-born citizen of the United States who has attained to the age of 35 years and been 14 years a resident in the United States; neither shall an inhabitant of the same State as the President be eligible to the office of Vice President; nor shall a person who has held the office be eligible to the office of President.

"CLAUSE 3. The legislature of each State shall by law provide for the establishment therein of election districts for such election, which districts shall, as nearly as practicable, be of contiguous territory and of equal population, and, as to such arrangement thereof, subject to the approval of the Congress; and, unless the Congress shall otherwise by law provide, shall be equal in number to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress. Citizens of the United States in each district who have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the legislature of such State, or who have the right in such State to vote for President, Vice President, Senators, or Representatives in the Congress, shall have the right to vote therein at this election, or at any election preparatory therefor that the Congress may by law provide to be held; they shall vote by ballot, and shall name in their ballots the person voted for as President and the person voted for as Vice President.

"CLAUSE 4. The Congress shall determine the day on which the election shall be held for President and Vice President, which day shall be the same throughout the United States; shall make uniform laws, regulations, and provisions for such election and for ascertaining and declaring the results thereof, which the authorities of each State shall carry into execution, but which in their default the Congress shall carry into execution; shall fix the day on which and the method whereby the votes, by districts, in all the States shall be counted at the seat of government and the results thereof declared; and shall, every sixth year, not less than one year before the date of such election, establish or cause to be established in each State a tribunal, which shall be chosen, designated, and compensated as the Congress may by law provide, but shall have as members thereof at least one of the judges of a United States court then established in such State, and at least one of the judges of the supreme court of such State, which tribunal shall have exclusive jurisdiction over all controversies and contests as to such election, shall immediately hear and finally determine such as are brought before it, and shall keep and publish a record of its proceedings.

"CLAUSE 5. The executive in each State shall, within 10 days after the results of such election are ascertained, make in quadruplicate distinct lists of all persons voted for as President, and of all persons voted for as Vice President, and of the number of votes for each in each of said districts in such State, which lists he shall sign and certify to under the seal of the State and dispose of as follows: One list he shall transmit sealed to the seat of government of the United States, by registered letter, directed to the President of the Senate; one list he shall transmit, in the same manner, directed to the Secretary of State of the United States; one list he shall deliver to the judge of the district court of the United States for the district in which the seat of government of the State is located; and one list he shall deposit in the archives of his office.

"CLAUSE 6. The President of the Senate on the day fixed by the Congress, which day shall not be later than 30 days prior to the date of inaugurating the President, shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes of all the districts as certified to shall then be counted.

"The person having the votes of the greatest number in each district for President shall have the vote of such district for President, and the person having the votes of the greatest number of districts for President shall be declared the President, if such number be a majority of all the districts.

"CLAUSE 7. If no person have such majority, the House of Representatives elect shall be immediately convened in special session solely for such purpose, and from the persons, not exceeding three, having the highest numbers on the list of those voted for as President shall choose immediately by ballot the President.

"In case of the death or permanent disability of either of such three persons, in his stead one of the three persons from whom such choice shall be made shall be the person voted for as Vice President in association with such person as President; and in case of either calamity to that person the person nominated by the organized national authority of the body of the people who voted for them for President and Vice President in said election.

"A quorum for this purpose shall consist of two-thirds of the whole number of Representatives elect, and in so choosing the President a majority of the whole number shall be necessary to a choice.

"CLAUSE 8. In case, however, of the death or permanent disability to discharge the powers and duties of the said office of the person so shown to have been elected President by the people, then the person shown to have been elected Vice President by the people as hereinafter provided shall be declared the President.

"And in case the House of Representatives shall not choose a President, whenever the right of choice shall devolve upon them, before the 4th day of January next following, and the right to choose a Vice President shall at the same time devolve upon the Senate, as hereinafter provided, the Vice President chosen as so provided shall be declared to be the President, as in the case of the death or other constitutional disability of the President.

"CLAUSE 9. The person having the votes of the greatest number in each district for Vice President shall have the vote of such district for Vice President, and the person having the votes of the greatest number of districts for Vice President shall be declared the Vice President, if such number be a majority of all the districts. If no person have such majority, then from the two highest numbers on the list of those voted for as Vice President, in case of the death or permanent disability to discharge the powers and duties of the said office of either of such two, in his stead, the person nominated, either by his associate voted for as President, or, if he do not act, by the organized authority of the body of the people who voted for them, the Senate shall choose by ballot the Vice President. A quorum for this purpose shall consist of two-thirds of the whole number of Senators and a majority of the whole number shall be necessary to a choice.

"CLAUSE 10. In case, however, of the death or permanent disability to discharge the powers and duties of the said office of the person so shown to have been elected Vice President by the people, or thereafter holding the said office, the President in office for the term wherein such vacancy shall occur, shall nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint a Vice President.

"CLAUSE 11. The Congress shall by law provide who shall temporarily discharge the powers and duties of the said offices in case of the death or permanent disability of both persons so shown to have been elected President and Vice President, or of both, while in office, and their duties, and shall fix the day on which the election of a President and Vice President to fill the unexpired terms occasioned by such calamity shall be had, which day shall not be later than six months after the date that such vacancies occur, the day on which the votes of all the said districts shall be counted at the seat of government, and the results thereof declared, and such other proceedings had, as are herein provided for, that may then be necessary, but no such election shall be had in case the date of the same would fall within one year of the date of the regular succeeding election of President and Vice President by the people of the United States.

"CLAUSE 12. The President and Vice President shall, at stated times, receive a compensation for their services, which shall neither be increased nor diminished during the period for which they shall have been elected or chosen, and they shall not receive within that period any other emolument from the United States, or any of them.

"CLAUSE 13. After the expiration of their terms of office and during their lives each of them shall be privileged to frank all correspondence through the United States mail, and shall be paid a pension as their compensations have been paid; to the former, of an amount not less than one-third the compensation paid the President; to the latter, of an amount not less than the compensation paid the Members of the Congress; which amounts the Congress shall determine: Provided, That in case either of such persons shall hold an office of profit under or be paid any other pension by the United States his pension herein provided for shall cease and abate during such time to the extent of the emolument of such office or the amount of such pension, and one-half of such pension shall be so paid to their widows, if any, during their widowhood.

"CLAUSE 14. The provisions of this amendment shall apply to all persons who have filled or now fill either of said offices, and to their widows, if any, who are not now paid a pension by the United States.

"CLAUSE 15. Before either enters upon the execution of his office he shall take the following oath or affirmation: 'I do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will faithfully and impartially execute the office of President (or Vice President) of the United States, and will to the best of my ability obey, preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States.'"

PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

While the test of time, its use as a pattern by every Republic and federation formed since its adoption, and the consensus of earth's ablest opinion stamp our Constitution as the wisest document ever framed by man, that part of it which earliest provoked complaint, and sought remedy in the twelfth amendment to it, is yet a matter of debate—the method of electing our President and Vice President.

Even more widespread and constant has been the discussion by, and the deep interest of, the people in the proposal to limit the tenancy of any individual to one term for President.

ONE TERM FOR PRESIDENT.

Since President Jackson in his every annual message urged one term of six years for President, his ineligibility thereafter, his election direct by the people, sentiment in favor thereof has constantly grown. The presidential year is dreaded by every business interest; its less frequent recurrence desired for universal tranquillity. The great majority feel that a term of six years is long enough to test a proposed policy and prompt its preservation, yet a term within which both Senate and House can be so changed as to check, if not wholly change, mistaken policy, while ineligibility to a second term would choke off the mortal greed for personal power that has ever gained appetite on what it fed, and insure patriotic effort for permanent good, instead of scheming for reelection.

Mankind has seen earth's apostles netted from common fishermen, a surveyor boy father of his country, a rail splitter rescue it from destruction. There never has been, never will come, a day when the American people can not say, as our second martyr said when the great grasp of the first was stricken from the helm of our ship of state, "God rules, and the Government at Washington City still lives." As long as liberty and culture last this country will be crowded with splendid capacity for presidential or any other exalted service. As long as the people rule and follow the lead of the Statesman of all time—the Nazarene—from the people will come the needed leaders when the crisis calls for their coming. God Almighty knows what He is about, and His children never did and never will need to rest their safety, their continued progress, on any one man.

History rings no truth in louder tone than that the most consuming curse of all time has been hero worship, the frenzied following of the one-man power. It has dragged nations to dishonor of plighted faith, drenched them with blood, and devastated them with wreck and ruin. It is doing this to-day.

The most nagging detriment to, unmitigated nuisance in, every business, organization, and community is the unfortunate who opinionates himself into the delusion that he is indispensable to it; and when a country reaches the stage where it imagines any one man indispensable it has ripened to the rottenness that is ready for despotism.

Self-educate, community-educate or people-educate a man to that delusion and he is given a diploma for universal fitlessness for public or for any other service.

No man ever has been or ever will be blunderless; no pattern mortal framed to form the flawless man; no vital service needed for man by man that man's Creator left, either to one alone or to the few of asserted nobility or of claimed superiority.

Obsess a people with the faith that there is but one man to lead, and the first foundation stone is laid for autocratic government—for a dictator or a monach.

These historic teachings of common knowledge and of spreading sentiment tell the doom of autocracy and plutocracy—the destiny of democracy.

With the same emphasis they tell that the check for and cure of autocracy is in the limitation of highest authority in any individual; that such authority is ever prone to dethrone the best judgment of, and to enthrone in, the man a conceit disastrous to him and hurtful to his fellows; and, if long continued, to debauch the spirit of independence and of self-reliant confidence on the part of the people in their own ability for self-government.

This must have been the reason, when providing for a vacancy in the office of President, for inserting in clause 6, section 1, of Article II of the Constitution the word "removal" first, both as a protective provision and as a reminder that the people retain the right to remove one who might forget that the rule of "masters not men" can never exist in this country.

The same is retained in the proposed amendment, but the abhorrent thought of removal placed last instead of first.

This provision, coupled with the pension provision of this proposal, would make our ex-Presidents more serviceable servitors of our country than when in office.

Let one of them go where he will among us, and throngs of honoring fellows will greet him with heartiest and sincerest acclaim; yet, at the same time, his potential power for good will be neutralized if not killed, if the impression prevails that he is an aspirant for office, for it is impossible to prevent those of hereditary or other convincing sentiment from feeling—the maggot-minded from vociferating—that all he says and does is tainted with a personal political purpose.

He may have given the most unquestionable proof of patriotic devotion in having staked his life, and readiness to stake it again, for his country's ideal of service for humanity; there may be superlative wisdom in what he advocates; still, when the telepathic fervor of the throng has faded, this home second thought will arise, will persist, and will damn his actions and his utterances.

There is not one of you but knows and laments this fact.

These men have been schooled and fitted for advice to and service of our country; been informed in national and international affairs as but few others could possibly have been; they carry a gratitude obligation of ever-glorious burden that no man could ever discharge. We should put them where no one could feel or say they "would wade through slaughter to a throne," not to "shut the gates of mercy on mankind," but to glut, though never sate, an insatiable ambition. Put them where what they said or did for avowed public good could be neither misinterpreted nor impugned. Put them where their suggestions would be given utmost service as the suggestions of unselfish and impersonal patriotism. Put them where, if beneficent public results appealed to them more than the pomp and power of official place they would know the supreme stimulus for effort and supreme satisfaction in making it. Put them above rivalries, beyond envies, and on the highest plane of public service we could place any private citizen.

ABOLISH ELECTORS; ELECT BY THE PEOPLE.

The amendment changes what is far more important than the term or reeligibility of the President—the method of his election.

Do not electors of unlimited and unlimitable powers, as now, create a menace to national welfare that demands removal? Should not that menace be removed before the explosion comes rather than then, mid blinding smoke and falling débris, rush to repair the rents in our national walls?

Our presidential electors are our only national officials for whom, by our national authority, no qualifications are prescribed, no oath or bond binds, no precedents guide. To permit the limitless power that they possess to exist in any other, from President to poundkeeper, would be thought the limit of madness. Not even citizenship is made a qualification. Any incompetent from Alaska to Cape Horn, or anywhere else, is eligible, if his bray be loud enough, political pull be strong enough to land the prize, and there is no legal hand to stay his kicking over the traces of instruction or scotch any other outbreak of inborn asininity. The national risk is too great to permit such power in incapacity; still more dangerous to permit it in unscrupulous or designing capacity.

In the last election there were 531 electors and not 10 men in all the country can to-day name the electors of his own State. We are trusting the election of our highest officials to men no one ever heard of before or will hear of again unless for conduct that provokes humor or indignation. Could the qualifications of these electors within living memory be collected it would raise a roar of ridicule from border to border. But the continued farce some day may—will—turn into a tragedy.

Is it not high time that we cart off in some garbage can and dump in a place of safety these dynamite sticks of transient, irresponsible, unqualified, autocratic electors of unlimited powers, bury them beyond the power of harm, and give to the owners of our Union home the safe and sane right to choose the chief stewards thereof that they have to choose in the Congress the best qualified, the mightiest ministers of their lawmaking?

This amendment will for the first time require by national authority qualifications for presidential electors.

It is economy. It would wipe out all the expense of the election of these worse than useless electors, and of transportation to herd them in some common corral for action, while it would cost less to transmit the two certificates of the people's election by the governor than it now costs to send the straw-drawn messenger of a motley body with its certificates 1 mile, and be less risk. At the same time, it would relieve our Representatives wasting valuable time in what we, the people, sent them to do, over the nagging for office by the misfit whose only recommendation was the windfall of some political gust.

When Horace Greeley died the electors chosen by the people who voted for Greeley and Brown, instead of obeying their voice, voted 3 for Greeley, 42 for Hendricks, 18 for Brown, 2 for Charles J. Jenkins, 1 for David Davis.

This established a precedent, not contrary to the Constitution, however contrary to any sort of intelligence, but consonant to the eternal fitlessness of electors destitute of all qualifications, so far as any national law was concerned. A precedent that they could vote for whom they pleased, dead or alive, nominated or not, and regardless of the people's vote—a precedent from which evil will flow unless the system be changed.

HISTORIC EXAMPLES OF RISKS RUN.

Under the present system the following States have been disfranchised by the throwing out of their electoral votes: Indiana, in 1817; Missouri, in 1821; Wisconsin in 1857; Georgia, in 1869 and 1881; Arkansas and Louisiana, in 1873: while the same year Texas lost half of her electoral vote. A snowstorm prevented the meeting of the electors of Wisconsin on the day fixed; probably the intelligence of the electors in some States during the reconstruction days made it difficult for them to understand when, where, or how to cast their ballots, for no national law required or presumed them to have qualifications for anything.

In 1820 a "Monroe" elector voted for John Quincy Adams in order that Washington should live as the only unanimously elected President.

In 1892, one North Dakota Republican elector voted for Cleveland and another for Weaver.

This last year, in Washington, Mr. Stream, Democratic nominee for elector, died during the campaign, and Mr. E. M. Connor was placed on the ticket in his stead. Mr. Stream received 47,977 votes; Mr. Connor, 134,481; Mr. Warren H. Lewis, highest Republican elector, 167,244. This gave Mr. Lewis the seventh highest vote for this State's electors. He, while convinced that he was legally elected, displayed an American manhood and patriotism worthy the Nation's honor by refusing to attend on the day of casting the State's electoral vote, the other electors filling the vacancy by the selection of Mr. Connor. Can this country endure a system where either accident to or ignorance of (unqualified) electors shall disfranchise the intelligent people of a State?

ABSURD DISQUALIFICATIONS.

Disqualifications were designated. Any Member of Congress who had made and was making glorious history, or any citizen who had brains enough to hold an office of trust or profit under our Government was, and yet is, barred—as near as possible assurance that no judgment or discretion should ever be expected of or exercised by an elector. In view of their faithful living up to the specifications of their political architecture in these latter years, it may be a merciful provision that such was the case, but most of us deem it an unwise oversight.

In an election as close as that of the Tilden-Hayes day, where one vote would decide the election, suppose one bought or bull-headed elector should exercise his uncontrollable constitutional power to vote for whom he pleased, what are we going to do about it? Dare we continue such risk? Not by congressional enactment, solely by constitutional provision, can we avert it.

REPRESENTATIVES WITH DISCRETION AGAINST AUTOCRATIC ELECTORS WITH NO DISCRETION.

There is sense in sending to legislate for us men of gained and gaining wisdom, special qualifications, who will have time and opportunity to study great questions of public concern, ferret through the plausible pretexts of seductive self-interest to the very bottom for accurate information, and from the clash and conference of kindred competence and character evolve laws of lasting and equal benefit to all. They can phrase our wishes as we can not. They can pour into the mold of cast and enacted law the melted heart hopes and wants of the people as we can not. They can make us profit by that Pilate who might have had eternal honor, instead of eternal infamy, had he coupled the courage of his own conviction with the matchless justice that could say, "Father, forgive; they know not what they do." Their informed conscientious courage can resolve us from frenzied, thoughtless mobs of thinking men. It was the greatest of Lawgivers who earned and has the lasting gratitude of mankind for rebuking the call for a golden calf. The truth is not a golden nugget for which the lone prospector with bare hands digs, but the fairest of all the fair in all life's castles, for whom the days of chivalry never die, devoted suitors ever abound, and for whose winning the best and bravest of knight-errants must forever fight, and fight with best and bravest rivals. They must strain not only the born strength of strongest muscle, but be armored with the equipment of best advancement, and must ever carry the consciousness that no weak-hearted wavering ever won. The Representative who has given matters of universal concern that study that we have had neither time, environment, nor opportunity to give and stands by and tells us his honest convictions, gives reasons for his stalwart stand, has been, is, and will be the sheet anchor, the salvation of republican institutions.

This is utilizing the same developed skill and ability that is utilized in every business. There is much sense in it. But there is no sense in delegating to others the power to reexpress the expressed decision of the people. When they have made a choice, what need to have that choice retold by indiscriminate third parties whom we do not know, never heard of before, and most probably will never hear of again? Worse, what sense in setting aside our choice and giving another, and independent, irresponsible, autocratic choice to 531 out of a hundred million people? Should not such impeachment of the sense of the people for self-government, such denunciation of the very theory of government that we so loudly proclaim as the best, that is so repugnant to our entire political sentiment, existence, and experience, be eliminated from the Constitution?

Will not the adoption of this amendment do it?

"MAKE REVERENCE FOR THE LAW THE POLITICAL RELIGION OF OUR COUNTRY."

There is another reason for the change of tremendous moral significance, of governmental significance.

A law that is a dead letter is a detriment. A law that is universally disregarded, a more dangerous evil. It teaches to despise and disregard all laws.

Our Constitution says that our electors shall choose our President and Vice President—commands them to do it.

Our practice says that they are so many automata—wooden Indians—to register the vote of the people.

We disregard and trample upon the letter and spirit of our highest law in the most mighty act of a great people. Our Government itself is teaching contempt and disregard of the law.

None of our statesmen ever left us wiser advice than Abraham Lincoln when he said: "Make reverence for the law the political religion of our country." Clothe our laws with sanctity and there will be fewer infractions of them. Let us either follow and enforce this law or repeal it.

We preach that government of, by, and for the people is the best of governments, yet make our Constitution say that the people are unfit, incapable of themselves, to choose their own President.

If incapable of themselves to choose their own President, they are unfit for, incapable of, self-government.

We are making our constant and continued practice give the lie to our professions; something that our Government can not, our people will not, stand for.

PROMPTINGS OF OFFICIAL POWER.

No possessor of power ever studied over that possession without a growing disposition to exercise it, especially if that power be official.

Energize that disposition by coupling with the official power the command of the supreme voice of the entire country that conferred it, and what have you?

These electors have the right to say that our supreme law—our Constitution—imposes upon them an exalted obligation, a duty next to divine delegation, and that they should discharge both with the same patriotic independence that you should, and generally do, discharge yours.

We, the people, at times may chafe under and cruelly criticize your independence, due to your better information; yet at the same time we glory in it, and know in our hearts that in it you are giving our country its best and most needed service.

Such action on the part of our electors would naturally lead to the disregard of all party dictation, and the exercise of their conferred powers, the discharge of their directed duties according to the very letter of the supreme law that commands their manliest, most independent, and patriotic action.

Would the people of this country suffer that? Do not these possible and probable perils loom larger and larger with every year's renewed study of our Constitution as it stands?

On the other hand, with growing indignation, will the people feel that empowering the "chosen," the "select," the "elect" to choose the people's highest officials is the only that crept into their Constitution; and more and more insistent will be their demand to remove that blot from the supreme law of the land.

HISTORIC TEACHING.

Never since the parable of the "wise and foolish virgins" was pronounced has the need and power of preparedness so appealed to all mankind; preparedness, not only to promote progress, but also to preserve achievement and to prevent wrong.

Never since our Government was founded has there been such study of democracy on the one hand, plutocracy and autocracy on the other, of our own governmental system and history.

This will force an enlarged recall of these almost forgotten facts.

The Congress of the Confederation never sought, but always strenuously fought such convention as framed our Constitution, the Magna Charta of Magna Chartas to confirm the rights of the "common people"; to set and mark the limits of executive, legislative, and judicial powers; to people-control the control of the powers that be.

After the people had forced the call of that convention, despite their Congress; after its assembling was a foregone conclusion and beyond the control of that Congress, that Congress ignored all recognition of that convention and called a convention of proclaimed kindred purpose to meet at the same time and place, restricting its functions to "revising the Articles of Confederation," thus sending a sort of notice or message of limitation of authority to that inevitable convention, and making such proposed "revision" effective only "when agreed to in the Congress," as well as by the legislatures of the several States.

They did not propose to loosen the collar they had on the country's neck, and they accurately foresaw what might and did result. For under the then supreme law—the Articles of Confederation—any agreement to amend or revise that law had to be by the unanimous approval of the States; and Rhode Island never had anything to do with that convention; North Carolina rejected its work; that Constitution came into being by the actual secession of 11 of the original 13 States—by a peaceful revolution.

When the immortal work of that Convention was most respectfully, if not humbly, submitted to the people, and submitted to them not directly but through their State legislatures, led by two men of our country's lasting and deserving honor—Richard Henry Lee, who made the motion for the Declaration of Independence; and Nathan Hale, the New Englander of masterly ability and merited power—for eight days the opponents of even such submission bitterly fought it and did their utmost to defeat the work of that Convention, and continue in the hands of your congressional predecessors—and of you—the legislative control of the country.

At last, grudgingly, not daring to denounce, unwilling to commend, the proposed constitution was, without note or comment, so submitted by that Congress; and, opposed by Patrick Henry and copatriots of power, it never would have been ratified but for the promise to speedily incorporate therein the people's part thereof—the first ten amendments that redeemed that promise and stand as monuments to the people's wisdom.

When the "people's" convention assembled, the vast majority thereof dreaded as much the rule of the people as they did the creation of a supreme central Government. Many of its most eminent members desired the election of the President by the Congress and for life; the election of Senators by the House of Representatives and for life; even the choice of governors of the States by the Congress.

The entire trend of thought of those then in authority was to keep the rule of the country in their control. The question, with many conscientiously and patriotically, with others cunningly, was, How could this be done?

In some States the Senate was chosen by a select body of "electors" whose personal contact and acquaintance with the leading men of their State qualified them to judge of the qualifications of their fellows for the upper house of their legislature. This had worked well, and such selection of our President and Vice President by the select appealed to those who had never known and had no historic or home precedent to prove the worth of the rule of the people at large, and so could not weigh its value.

To some of the far-sighted and cunning, this plea made a different appeal, and opened a door that their fellows never saw. This enabled the creation of an "electoral body" from which were carefully excluded the very men who would have had that personal contact and acquaintance with public characters that enabled them correctly to choose, to "size up," the men most fit for these exalted stations. They secured the further hedging of their (apparently covert) desires by compelling the electors to meet and cast their ballots on the same day in their several States, thus barring them from that common conference absolutely essential for national action.

Had the anticipations of the artful who cunningly enwebbed to their aid the honest doubters of the safety of the people's rule been realized, what would have been the result?

Uninformed of the qualifications of leading characters without their own States, there would have been balloted for as many "favorite sons" as there were States, no election by the electors, and the two Houses of the Congress made the resultant choosers of our President and Vice President.

Is it not plain, that if this was so planned, and had worked out as planned, and had been kept up, your predecessors, you and your successors, would have "divided the spoils," giving the election of the President to the House of Representatives, the election of the Vice President to you? That, thus, the Congress would have had their prepromised and suppliant tools in these great offices, and the people shorn of their apparent "select" choice of their highest officials?

It was a very "smooth" proposition, but "The best laid schemes o' mice and men gang aft a-gley." It failed to work.

Concede to these framers of our Constitution, meriting immortal and grateful memory not only by our own country, but by all mankind, the most conscientious of motives, we must, at the same time, concede the view of the vast majority—indeed almost all—of them, that the masses were not qualified for, were not capable of, self-government, and government by the country's best ability was the best for all. They must have felt that that "best ability" would always be found in the Congress, as they had found it.

Of the framers, 55 of whom attended the convention, 42 remaining to its close, 18 then were, and 12 had been, Members of the Congress; two, Nathaniel Gorham and Thomas Mifflin, former presidents thereof; two, Washington and Madison, became our Presidents; Oliver Ellsworth a candidate for President in 1796; Charles Cotesworth Pinckney such candidate in 1800, 1804, and 1808; Elbridge Gerry our sixth Vice President; Jared Ingersoll a candidate for Vice President in 1812, and Rufus King the same in 1816; 19, Abraham Baldwin, Richard Bassett, Pierce Butler, Jonathan Dayton, Oliver Ellsworth, William Few, Nicholas Gilman, John Langdon, Alexander Martin, Robert Morris, Gouverneur Morris, William Paterson, George Read, Charles Pinckney, Roger Sherman and Caleb Strong, became Members of your illustrious body; while Abraham Baldwin, Daniel Carroll, George Clymer, Jonathan Dayton, Thomas Fitzsimmons, Elbridge Gerry, Nicholas Gilman, James Madison, John Francis Mercer, Charles Pinckney, Roger Sherman, Richard Dobbs Spaight, and Hugh Williamson served in the House of Representatives; and a large number became Federal judges (Oliver Ellsworth, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court), Cabinet members, governors, and holders of other distinguished positions.

These men are not alone in American history of those eminent in place and in achievement who fancied the Nation unable to dispense with their official services. In our own day some are obsessed with the same conceit, though our ballots show the people's sentiment is generally in inverse ratio to their obsession. Nor can we forget that among them were the shrewdest of partisan manipulators. For instance, while John Jay was governor of New York the legislature elected these electors, and the Federalists in legislative majority, the anti-Federalists proposed a law whereby the electors should be elected by districts (as is proposed in this amendment.) The Federalists, confident of a majority in the coming legislature, defeated this. When it was seen that the next legislature would be anti-Federalist, Alexander Hamilton wrote to Gov. Jay urging him, for this very reason, to convene the legislature and have it pass that law. After Gov. Jay's death, that letter was found among his papers indorsed "Proposing a measure for party purposes, which I think it would be unbecoming in me to adopt."

It may not be far-fetched to feel that in this electoral provision our Constitution, with sincere intent for good, was actually degraded by what, in common parlance, is called a "joker."

The unsafe, impolitic part of clause 3, section 1, of Article II of the Constitution, awarding the Presidency to the person receiving the highest number of electoral votes, the Vice Presidency to the person next in number of such votes, provided the same were a majority of all such votes, taught such a dangerous lesson in the Jefferson-Burr contest, wherein Alexander Hamilton rose from transient partisan to always patriot and became a leading factor in favor of his old-time enemy, Thomas Jefferson, that your predecessors started the reform that was consummated in the twelfth amendment to the Constitution; but they did not touch the election of Senators of the United States by "the chosen," "the elect," "the select." This grew to be so rank in offense that you yourselves initiated the movement that, speediest of all our constitutional amendments, ended in your election by the people, who honor you and whom you honor.

If the people are the fittest to elect you, are they not equally the fittest to elect those who outrank you in, and only in, the dignity of station?

Are you content to adhere to an unused, useless, and dangerous system whose establishment was due to lack of example, historic or at home, if not to the cunning of those who anticipated and calculated upon control of our country's destinies in its Congress; a system that had, and yet has, all the possibilities of being so worked out as to have kept your predecessors, and to keep you and your successors, in masterful control of a free and a competent people? With the glorious home history of over a century blazing in your faces, will not your self-respect indignantly recoil from longer maintenance of a system that would give occasion for such a reproach upon a congress that we, the people, pay our heartfelt homage to, and proudly hold as the manliest, noblest legislative body that honors and serves this globe?

If you are not in favor of a system that could, and may, lead to such result, then help to change that system, as this amendment proposes, or, as you doubtless can, devise a better system to effect that change. Do something that will enable an apprehensive people to act toward an end universally desired before such exasperation as drove them to the Constitution's framing drives them to its amendment.

In this world struggle between democracy and twin-cursed autocracy and plutocracy that may last beyond the next national election, we can not stand any internecine conflict at home.

This is a nonpartisan affair, a people's affair, a home affair, a measure from start to finish to preclude and prevent many preventable occasions and opportunities for inflamed controversies; a measure to preserve the people's control, to insure obedience to the people's voice from primary ballot to final result, however that result may be accomplished: and right now, when preparedness is the theme of every tongue, is the time to put our house in order.

As time has worn on the people have moved up in your esteem, oh worthily honored and trusted Members of our American Congress!

Manhood has more and more appealed to your confidence, you to its.

In the immediate view our people may magnify the Congresses of other days, but from future historic heights they will give the Congress of to-day the same honor—homage that you and they give to the cherished line that goes before you—that glorifies our congressional history.

One and all, people and Congress, have moved up in the comprehension of national affairs; the people in an intimacy of understanding of their Representatives in the Congress, whether Senate or House.

Even better than you, yourselves, vision obscured by contact with the charm of personal virtues, they clearly see the motives that move your advocacy of or opposition to public measures; whether or not you would rather be right than Senator—are counting on the country's present and historic approval, or the local vote that will (may) keep you where you are.

Through the flames of the Civil War you—all of us—saw the fidelity of a race enslaved to the masters who owned them; a race that never knew a Judas Iscariot or a Benedict Arnold; a race that never, even when agonized by galling shackles, betrayed the trust of "their people"; their people who left their wives and children in the keeping of these sons of fidelity; a fidelity that never failed while their mental and moral systems were free from the infection of the parasites of partisan demagoguery; a race that has its Washington as well as ours.

While partisanship had, probably, more to do with it than gratitude or patriotism, you initiated the call to the ballot of millions of these men who, not to their discredit, did not know the difference between the Constitution and a concordance for the doctrines of some creed.

Nearly half a century later it began to dawn upon "us lords of creation" that our mothers, wives, and daughters who had managed and made our American homes, our American manhood, our American character, were about as fit for the ballot as the men we had, larger and larger, called to its exercise.

May we not, with national profit, recall the preacher's one-sentence prayer that rescued a synod from turmoil—the wisest prayer, save one, ever uttered—"O Lord, give us more common sense!"

This amendment retains the same qualifications for electors of President and Vice President that have always been required "for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature"; and, in addition, in those States wherein women are given the right to vote for National, but not for State, officials, it bows to the conceded right of the State to exalt its own, and without wounded pride accepts that State's estimate of those competent to vote for the Nation's highest in station.

DATE OF INAUGURATION.

We all agree that amendment of our Constitution should be dictated by only long-debated and disclosed imperative demand, and never even attempted when there is already a provision to accomplish what such amendment would; and we are all fully aware that clause 2, section 4, of Article I of the Constitution empowers the Congress to change its date of assembling. The only need, therefore, is your own action in accordance with your own oft-repeated, and the country's unanimous, opinion. Win that country's applause by exercising the courage of your own convictions.

The whole country has come to realize that the inauguration in March is a menace to comfort, to health, to life. That the assembling of Congress in December, with the confusion of the holiday break, is a waste of time and money. Should Congress, as it can, change the day of assembling to January, uninterrupted work would supplant the always useless effort of the short December session, which could be held only every six years and solely to count the Presidential vote, and declare the result.

ELECTION DISTRICTS.

All recognize that we hold a dual citizenship, National and State, and vote accordingly. This election is a matter not of State but of National concern. Therefore the common, universal—the national—authority should make the laws and regulations therefor the same in each and every State. The one common action of the whole people should be uniform. The dignity of the State, the universal convenience, are subserved by leaving the execution of these provisions to the States, respectively, but keeping the power of self-preservation in national hands should any State prove derelict in this high duty.

It is impossible to hold an election, National, State, or county, without election districts.

This amendment provides for the establishment of election districts in and by each State, but of a common uniformity throughout the whole country, which, "unless the Congress shall otherwise by law provide, shall be equal in number to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress."

This gives a wide range to the tested and honored discretion of our Congress.

Requiring that such districts "shall, as nearly as practicable, be of contiguous territory and of equal population" appeals to fairness and propriety; and making "such arrangement thereof subject to the approval of the Congress" enables the correction of such "gerrymanders" as have dishonored the partisan powers that made them.

To make this election decisive by a plurality or a majority of the entire country's vote makes strong appeal to many of the most thoughtful, and might be best. The better ability of the Congress, and the still better ability of the press and people of the country, should debate this.

In such method is there not this danger: A populous State of large majority, or two or three States of such majority with special interests in common, could so pile up the majority as to overwhelm the small majorities in 20 or more smaller States, or as many of such States wherein the respective majorities were small.

The country-wide sentiment is what is wanted. Is it not better that this choice should be made by the major diverse sentiment of all than the congested and controlled sentiment of one, or of a few States, whose special interests dictated their votes for local advantage and thus made this more of a State than a national election?

This would give the sentiment of large parts in every State, whose expression would otherwise be suppressed, and of every section, and more nearly represent the major sentiment of the separate, yet entire, country.

It is far easier to swell majorities in particular States, to debauch and corrupt the electorate of one State than to do the same thing in so many districts. The people of districts in small States having only three votes would thereby find expression of their sentiments which an entire State vote would suppress, and the very same thing would be the case in the more populous States. The tremendous vote of New York has been decided by a majority of but little over a thousand, or wherein a change of 500 votes would settle the election for over a hundred million people.

These districts, being distinct from State and congressional districts, give a more distinct character to the vote, and prevent those local combinations that carry the election of either State or congressional candidates. Then, too, witness the diverse votes for President and Vice President and for United States Senators in California and Washington in the 1916 election.

There will be frauds, controversies, and contests in this election. In districts so arranged, under the proposed system of election tribunals, home tribunals in each State could more promptly, nonpartisanly, and justly adjust these; the final result be more readily ascertained and established.

All maintain that ours is a Union of indestructible States as well as an indivisible Union. Where the line of demarcation between the rights and functions of the two can be clearly drawn, does it not behoove us to draw that line? Can it not be clearly drawn here?

The people of the Nation at large have no business to meddle with the elections of State officials; per contra, they should equally distinguish between their functions as national and State citizens, functions entirely different though inseparably interblended and perpetually interdependent.

PRIMARY ELECTIONS.

President Wilson has suggested a primary law to more definitely decide the people's choice. This would be wise were this amendment in force, but as no law of Congress can abridge or enlarge constitutional powers, so long as presidential electors have the constitutional power both to nominate and elect President and Vice President, they can defy such primary instruction and set at naught even the ultimate voice of the people.

Under clause 3 of this amendment primary laws could be enacted that would bar betrayal thereof, and which, if preventive provisions against fraud and cunning were escaped, could undo such designing schemes when discovered.

It would make the primaries decisive, bar all opportunity for a recreant representative to crucify the hopes of a community that had long heard his loud advocacy of honor for the expressed will of the people, and stay the hand that would Arnold-encrown a State's entrusted agency, a party's basic principle and an American confidence.

It would preclude place for one who would pervert an intrusted vote, not because of personal preference for another than instructed for (whom, with impartial treachery, he would equally betray; with habitual blunder, only move to mislead) but because of cold-blooded calculation upon resultant service to a morbid ambition, oblivious of gratitude, incapable of instruction by uniform disaster, and, consumed with greed for self-glory, grown callous to the fate of a loyal faith dragooned into a disheartened following.

ELECTION TRIBUNALS.

The Tilden-Hayes eight-to-seven tribunal, a resort to avert revolution, had no warrant in law. It disclosed the explosive perils that yet confront us—the risk of the last resort by an outraged electorate. It reiterated the lesson of all time—a tribunal hastily instituted at a time of universal, intense excitement is certain to be the subject of intrigue for present advantage, of action for the occasion, and to have carried into it the passions and partialities of the hour.

Some tribunal of highest qualification that would command the confidence of all should be prearranged to settle the always heated questions over this election that are certain to arise and to stir States and Nation in the future as they have in the past.

Should the Congress, or designated national or State authorities, a year in advance of this election select in each State a tribunal of five, seven, or nine members, to be composed of one judge from a Federal court, one from the State supreme court, the others from those benches or from citizens of the State of equally eminent qualifications who held no office, we would have at trifling expense tribunals whose decisions would command universal confidence and avert partisan contests and decisions in the Congress called to count the votes of these districts.

It could be made too large to tamper with; its proceedings, made of record, would be an additional safeguard for honesty and independent intelligence; and its immediate action subserve a demand always of urgency. Its home composition would appeal to the universal sentiment of the country, no matter of what political complexion, and it would start with such exalted character as to assure independent and honest action by tested learning.

If absence of provision for appeal from the decision of such tribunal be error, that error can be readily remedied in the fourth clause by striking out the word "finally" and adding to that clause:

"Appeals may be taken from the decisions of such tribunal to the Congress in the manner that the Congress may by law provide."

The records of such tribunals would certainly lessen the labor of and furnish aid to prompt justice by the Congress, as well as prerebuke partisan action.

This clause leaves the major construction of this tribunal to the best thought we have—the advised discretion of our Congress.

RISK REVEALED BY THE 1912 ELECTION.

It was the evident intent, and is yet the universal desire, that both high offices should not be held by inhabitants of the same State, yet the provisions of the Constitution, instead of precluding, make this calamity possible and probable. Instance the 1912 election.

The Democratic Party had 40 States; could easily have spared the electoral vote of any one State. Had the electors exercised their constitutional power both to nominate and elect President and Vice President, those from 40 States could have voted for Marshall for President; those from Indiana for some equally eminent statesman for Vice President; those from the other 39 States for Kern for Vice President; and thus lawfully elected both from the same State.

Had either wing of the divided Republican Party nominated an inhabitant of New Jersey for Vice President, and, as was much dreaded and predicted, the election been thrown into the House for President, the Senate for Vice President, the House being Democratic would have elected Wilson President, and, had the divided Republicans united in the Senate, they would have elected the New Jersey nominee Vice President, electing both from the same State, for the only prohibition on the Senate in such case is, not that the man it votes for shall not be an inhabitant of the same State as the President, but that he shall not be "constitutionally ineligible to the office of President," and the only qualifications of eligibility therefor are that he shall be native born, 35 years of age, a resident within the United States for 14 years, and not come under the inhibition of the fourteenth amendment.

The proposed amendment settles that intent and universal desire.

That this will never be done is no answer. What can lawfully be done will be done, if the occasion calls for it. Indeed, like conditions as above would compel partisan policy to do this very thing.

ANOTHER PERIL.

This election also disclosed a far more ominous, more probable, and a hitherto unconsidered impending injustice, if not peril.

In event the failure of an election by the electors forced the choice of the President by the House of Representatives, their ballot is limited to "the persons having the highest numbers, not exceeding three, on the list of those voted for as President."

After the electors had cast their ballots and their powers had become functus officio, had either of the three leading presidential candidates in that election died or suffered permanent disability, this choice would have been limited to the other two. Had either calamity befallen Mr. Wilson, a Democratic House would have been compelled to choose between two candidates, both of eminent ability, but neither of whom represented the political convictions of that House.

In event the same conditions compelled the Senate to choose the Vice President (similar calamity to either of the two persons having "the two highest numbers on the list" of those voted for as Vice President), the Senate would have had no choice and been compelled to vote for the survivor.

Under this amendment both misfortunes are averted. In case of the President, his vice presidential associate would be one of the three persons for the House of Representatives to choose from; and in event of either calamity to him, the national committee of his party would have the right to name the third person from whom that House should make its choice.

In case of such calamity to one of the two candidates for Vice President, should the presidential candidate of that party survive, he would have the first right to nominate the candidate to be voted for by the Senate, and if he declined to exercise that right it would be vested in the same national committee.

Is not this a needed provision, if such occasion arise, in case of a contested election?

CALAMITY WHEN ELECTION NOT CONTESTED.

In case of the death or permanent disability of the President elect after the vote had been cast, the Vice President elect is given the vote and the voice of the people obeyed the same before as after the inauguration of their choice.

THE VICE PRESIDENT.

In case of either calamity to the Vice President, the President elect is empowered, when he comes into office, to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint a Vice President, and is also empowered so to do in event of a vacancy in that office at any time thereafter.

This provides for the continuous occupancy of the office by a method that has worked well with the Federal judiciary and the Cabinet.

The President now so appoints a Cabinet, seven members of which may succeed him in event of his death, and there being no Vice President. There is no greater risk in so appointing a Vice President who may in a similar, yet more definite manner, succeed the President.

We have elected 28 Vice Presidents of the United States. Of these, five—John Tyler, Millard Fillmore, Andrew Johnson, Chester A. Arthur, and Theodore Roosevelt—by reason of the death of the President, became President; seven—George Clinton, Elbridge Gerry, William R. King, Henry Wilson, Thomas A. Hendricks, Garret A. Hobart, and James S. Sherman—died while in office; and one—John C. Calhoun—resigned when elected United States Senator.

Thirteen vacancies out of 28 incumbencies!

Does not this large proportion of vacancies call for either abolition of the office or provision for keeping it filled?

If this office is superfluous and merely ornamental it should be abolished. If not so, the Constitution should provide for keeping it filled. It will never be abolished. Too many in Congress hope—expect—to get it to ever start such proposal. The same reasons exist for its continuous filling as do for the continuous filling of our other offices. The office has its essential and important duties, and the people should have some say beyond the life of one man for their President.

These offices are simply cogs in our national wheel that should never lack a single cog, nor have one too many. If this be one too many, let us save material and complication of machinery by recasting the wheel without the needless cog and get simpler machinery. If not too many, provide means for prompt replacement in case of loss.

The whole history and teaching of our Government is that, while man is everything, the man is but little, purposes much; that the best are but mites in an Almighty hand, giving place to others when the purposes of their creation are accomplished.

OATH OF OFFICE—COMPENSATION.

There is no provision now, either for the oath of office or the compensation of the Vice President. This amendment provides for both. The induction into both great offices should be directed with the same solemnity.

SETTLING A MINOR DISPUTE.

The twelfth amendment provides, where there is no election of a Vice President by the electors, and such election is had by the Senate, that the person elected Vice President shall "act as President," and there has been debate as to his title and attestation of documents, whether as President or as Acting President. This amendment removes that debate.

INTERREGNUM—SPECIAL ELECTION.

In the same accident, 2 of President Tyler's Cabinet and 12 others were killed. Such repeated calamity might wipe out the executive authority and all succession, as at present provided for. The act of 1886 provides, in case of Cabinet succession, if Congress is not and will not be in session within 20 days, a special session thereof shall be called, but it does not say what for, nor does it say for how long this succession shall last. A capital arrangement for a political squabble that would convulse the whole country and stir up all manner of schemes, hurtful to every interest. Yet this was the best that could be done by Congress without more definite constitutional authority.

In event that, pending the election and the date of declaring the result, or of the inauguration of the newly elected officials, or of both President and Vice President while in office their death should occur, election by the people can be had, provided the same shall not occur within one year of the next regular election by the people. This gives a speedy restoration to the people of their chosen, at the same time avoids the turmoil and expense of near elections.

PENSIONS FOR BOTH.

It adopts the growing practice in the business and industrial world as well as with the educational world, of life pensions for deserving service. When learning, labor, and capital practice a policy, government may well take heed to it.

It is the sentiment of by far the majority of the American people to-day. They are as free from snobbery as any people, yet they do not wish to see those whom they have chosen to head the Government mix in the common struggle to maintain their families any more than set an example of stilted idleness.

They have reached the places where they belong more to the people than to themselves and should be kept in a more exalted service than even when in office. Were they to devote their after lives to travel among the different States, and the dissemination of trustworthy information about each to all, they would render one of the most needed and useful services to this country. Despite the facilities of travel and communication, how little the people of the different States and sections, even, know of each other!

Their visits would make them missionaries for American patriotism, for fair play, for better understanding by the people of each other, for study of our great system of government.

They would differ on policies to remedy what was esteemed evils in the different States. All the better. Men of similar minds learn but little from each other. The people would get what was better than from either, what was best from both.

There is not a toil-hardened hand in a factory or industrial enterprise in all this country but would applaud this policy as a teaching example to the industries to which they were giving their lives.

Continuing a proportional share of these pensions to their wives comports with both American chivalry and American discretion. From Martha Washington and Abigail Adams until to-day, with scarce, if any, exception, these women have been exemplars to American—aye, to world-wide womanhood—have been women whose unaffected American simplicity, domestic devotion, Christian character, and gracious womanly graces have made the home lives of our highest honored ideal home lives of honor to and honored by a whole home-loving country that would gladly give them the tenderest devoted adoption if bereft of their stay and support.

IN CASE OF CONTEST, WHICH HOUSE SHOULD CHOOSE THE PRESIDENT?

The House elect will represent either ratification or rebuke of the sitting House.

If ratification, its choice of the President would be a more fitting and emphatic voicing of the people's vote than the choice of the sitting House.

If rebuke, a displaced and resentful House would naturally choose a President who stood with it, rather than with the people who condemned it, and would, wholly or partially, thwart the final voice of the people and balk their desired change of policy.

Of necessity the House elect will represent that final voice, and its choice give the incoming President one House in harmony with the policies the people and he stood for.

Whether ratification or rebuke, the choice by the latest elect of the people conforms to our theory of obedience to the voice of the people.

Therefore this amendment changes the existing rule and transfers such choice from the sitting House to the House elect.

The majority of the House elect always has, and probably always will, come from the sitting House, be on hand ready for instant action, and the temporary organization of the new House for this one purpose be of prompt and economic accomplishment.

There could be no conflict between the two Houses, for the House elect would be convened for the sole purpose of choosing the President—have no powers of legislation.

NO BELL OF ALARM.

This petition seeks to ring no bell of needless alarm. The marvel of our country's progress and prosperity has given scant time, the personal and political fidelity of our people have given scarce occasion, to consider the "might have beens" and the "might bes" in our national life.

The starting step of our Nation in 1776 was made with primal recognition of the people's power in the heart avowal of "a decent respect to the opinions of mankind," to which our "fathers" made that first appeal for judgment upon the step wherein they pledged their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor.

Then and there we cornered our national creed on the eternal foundation "that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That to secure these rights governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed."

We created the complement of the enabling supplement to this creed in our fundamental law to "establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity."

With unswerving and unswervable faith, our people look for guidance, not to the arrogant egotism, the sacrilegious and vaulting vanity of any mortal claim to rule "by the grace of God," but to that Creator Himself to whom alone they bend their knee of adoration and in deathless gratitude charge the gift of the unsellable rights of our highest and our humblest.

Our Nation, so beginning, has continued its career. It may point with truthful finger to this bloodless history—that it never fired a shot to shackle the independence of another nation, to enforce its rule upon another people, and, at the same time, to those blood-written pages that tell where American valor has, in unstinted measure, poured out its blood and its treasure for the God-given rights of humanity, for the common good of the human race, to its oft-tested pledge to sister American Republics that it would stake its all with them in the maintenance of their governments of, by, and for their people with the same fervor and fidelity that it would battle for its own.

It does not need, it will never need, clangor or note of any bell of frightening alarm.

This petition seeks to point, however feebly point, to the pebbles in the path of its governmental machine—pebbles that may jar and transient scar but never fracture that machine—and seeks their brushing aside for a smoother running, for a better example to peoples of kindred faith and common purposes.

The Congress guiding our destinies in this crucial hour of the world's onward progress feels the great responsibility that rests upon this Nation; see the globe study that will be given its Constitution by mankind grappling for government of the people, by the people, and for the people; the need to make it as free from flaws as it can be made.

Our Nation claims, and will ever claim, its leading place among the noblest, the proudest nations of this earth; but it ever claims, not place ahead, but place aside its sister nations in an equal and independent march up being's piled gradation to the realization of a perfect government that is by all and for all and is just to all at home and abroad.

It seeks leadership, if leadership at all, in a common world progress; in an appeal by precept and example to the ripened conscience, the refined intelligence of mankind; and to make this appeal disdaining hope or wish for mastery of any nation.

This petition prays for this precept and example in what will prove a not for a part of but for all our people; a declaration of the complete rule of the people in this the country of their proclaimed rule.

It is made in the faith that this amendment will simplify and make safe our electoral system; give us a more nonpartisan and independent Executive; lessen the frequency of country-wide agitation; be a measure of economy in dispensing with the expense of a useless and dangerous piece of electoral machinery; dispose of menacing questions of dispute; provide tribunals of highest character to settle electoral disputes in the States of their origin, and keep them from the broader and more dangerous theater of national controversy; give a settled system for the continuous filling of our highest offices, bar an interregnum that could only excite and injure; continue in our service the schooled ability that has been nearest the head and heart of our Government; make our Constitution and our national conduct voice the same sentiment—the people are competent to rule, and they do rule—self-government is not a veiled profession but an actual fact; make our Government teach respect for and obedience to law, and increase the reverence in which all law should be held in making our highest law say what it means and mean what it says; put this election where it belongs—in the direct hands of the people.

WAR WITH GERMANY.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I have an editorial from the Detroit News of July 28. This paper holds a leading place in American journalism and represents a circulation daily of 234,800. The editorial bears upon the present international situation and deals with the question in a large and patriotic spirit. I should like to have it printed in the RECORD for the information of the Senate.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

IS THERE NO VOICE FOR PEACE?

Is there nowhere in this world a strong voice that dares raise itself for peace?

Has it become a crime to deplore the death of human beings?

Is it cowardice to have a living hope that 600,000 young men of this land may be saved from death in the trenches?

We, the people of the United States, through our representatives in Washington, have declared that we must fight back at Germany. We are taking 600,000 of our best young men, picking them from the arts of peace, and pushing them to the front to fight our fight, if needs be to die for us.

Theirs not to say aye or nay; theirs but to go forth to kill and be killed.

There is civilization left in the world.

Is it unpatriotic to say that all this slaughter is needless?

Have Governments so failed that they can do naught but set men at each others' throats to take life?

Does real service to humanity—to one's country—lie in taking life or in saving life?

Has every last effort to secure an honorable peace been exhausted? Are any efforts at all being put forth now to secure an honorable peace?

Are we so taken up with our preparations to kill that we give no thought to efforts to spare?

Are we sure that we are right in the belief that there is nothing left to this Nation but sacrifice—the sacrifice of 600,000 of our best young men, and 600,000 more to follow them, and they to be followed by still another 600,000. and each of these 600,000 to take a life for a life?

Are we sure that we are doing our full duty to our God, to our country, and to ourselves when we accept it as settled that there can be a lasting peace only through the shedding of more rivers of blood?

Has it become a disgrace to love to live, to want to save those near to us? Is there nothing left that is ennobling except to pierce a man's heart, to gouge out an eye, or to blow off a leg or an arm?

We, the people of the United States, are a self-governing Nation. We have the right and the power to have our Government conducted as we wish. Let us make our representatives at Washington understand that we have no hatred in our hearts, no false pride to be gratified, no desire but that of service to humanity.

Hatred others may have, but it is not for them to say to us: "The killing must go on; this is no time to talk peace."

Let our President and our Congress understand that they can have back of them an army of 600,000 men, or 1,200,000 men, or 1,800,000 men, or 2,400,000 men, but it must be an army that demands peace and is ready to back the demand with arms. Let the preparations for war go forward on even a greater scale, that the nation which understands the language of war better than any other language may know that our efforts toward peace are not efforts of weakness nor cowardice, but of a deep love for humanity.

Let those who represent us understand that while we will give of manhood and money for war it is done only to secure a lasting and honorable peace, with the least possible sacrifice of manhood, let the cost in money be what it may.

Is Germany ready for a peace that should be acceptable to other nations, a peace that means a drawing back of the German militaristic arm?

Germany started out with its junkerism with its pan-German policy, a policy that would have Germany control to the sea every river that rises in Germany, with its hand of trade and commerce grasping everywhere for more.

In the Reichstag Germany now declares that it wants peace without indemnity and without conquest.

Let us reason it out.

In Germany the family tie is as strong as in any other nation. The love for father and son and brother is as great as in any other people.

While Germany has been reducing the man power of France the French fighters have been hitting blow for blow and have reduced the man power of Germany. England, too, has killed hundreds of thousands of Germans; so has Russia.

Behind Germany are the rivers of blood that we see rising before us. With Germany are the dead, the maimed, and the blind.

With three great armies and some lesser ones in the conflict Germany sees rising before it another nation that can send 10,000,000 men against its army, if need be, and furnish countless supplies.

Sturdy young men in Germany have been killed or crippled to a number that runs into the millions. She must send her youth and her older men also against our Army, if they are not already in the trenches.

Germany must be weary of the slaughter, of the privation and suffering, of the debt mounting higher and higher.

We know in our hearts that we are not a blood-lusty people.

We know in our hearts that we would not kill if killing could be avoided.

Do we know in our hearts that we have done all we can do to avoid killing?

Provocations? Yes.

Patience tried? Yes.

Time for calling to arms? Yes.

Time to fight? Yes; if necessary.

But while shouldering the arms should we not still let it be known that we would prefer to stop the flow of blood rather than to cause more to flow; that we would prefer to heal the wounds rather than to cause fresh wounds; that, rather than take life, we would prefer saving the lives of our enemy, as well as the lives of our own young men?

We know that we would rejoice with all the world if peace were declared.

While encouraging our officials in equipping armies and navies and ambulance corps, let us encourage them also in steps of peace, steps that will avoid the heavy toll of lives that war exacts.

PROHIBITION IN PORTO RICO.

Mr. GRONNA. I have here an editorial from the Washington Evening Star, under date of July 24. This is a very able editorial, and I wish to have it read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read the editorial.

The Secretary read as follows:

[From the Evening Star, Tuesday, July 24, 1917.]

PORTO RICO SHOWS THE WAY.

Porto Rico has just voted by a large majority for prohibition. The wets made their campaign largely on the economic feature of the question. Eleven millions of revenue are necessary for the annual support of the government. Estimates placed the collections from the drink traffic at two millions—almost a fifth. And so the wets asked the drys—as they thought, triumphantly—"Where else will you turn for this money?"

The drys, nothing daunted, thought they could find it elsewhere. For one thing, they declared a purpose to lay a heavier tax on tobacco. They easily carried the day, dwelling on the evils of drink and urging their extinction in the island.

The result is ascribable to American influence. It is not easy to imagine a dry Porto Rico under any other influence.

Shall continental American learn from this small ward in the sea? The drink paragraph in the food-control bill goes to conference with the economic feature uppermost and emphasized. The wets insist that the Government must have the revenue assessed against the drink traffic; that the sum is so large that finding it elsewhere would be difficult, if not impossible, at a time when assessments on other things are heavy.

The sum is large and assessments on other things are heavy. But, relatively, the sum is not much larger than that involved in the case of Porto Rico. The evils of drink are the same in both countries. If, in order to banish those evils, the Porto Ricans are willing to assess themselves heavily, should not we?

The economic feature of the question is all that remains to the wets. Every other feature has been decided against them in this country. A long campaign has been waged, and State after State has declared against drink. Churches, social organizations, political organizations, and business organizations have thrown their influence against the barroom and all that it represents.

But, notwithstanding, the traffic has hopes centered in the conference. It will fight there to save something for itself. Just how much is not known, but enough probably to answer as a foundation for the post-war efforts which will be inaugurated to restore the traffic to its old power and make it again a financial and political influence throughout the United States.

ADDRESS BY WALTER LIPPMANN.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have here a copy of an address delivered by Mr. Walter Lippmann, taken from the Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science on the subject of the world conflict in its relation to American democracy. It is a very admirable address on the larger issues, and I think it ought to be printed as a public document. I ask to have it referred to the Committee on Printing for action.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The address will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

PETITION OF ALIENS.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, on Tuesday, July 24, 1917, as appeared in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] presented "a petition signed by Edward de Valéra, member elect of the British Parliament, and other officers of the Irish republican army, praying for the complete liberation of the Irish nation." That petition was printed in the RECORD. Such action was contrary to paragraph 5, of Rule VII, and therefore, Mr. President, I ask that in the make-up of the permanent RECORD this petition be eliminated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

DRAFT FOR ALIENS.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred a joint resolution (S. J. Res. 84) authorizing the drafting of aliens, except alien enemies, into the military service of the United States, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 94) thereon.

ENLISTMENT OF ALIENS.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am directed by the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which was referred Senate joint resolution 83, looking to the enlistment of certain alien residents in the Army of the United States, to report as a substitute the following Senate resolution, and I submit a report (No. 93) thereon.

The resolution (S. Res. 108) is as follows:

Whereas there are in the United States a vast number of subjects and citizens of the several European nations now waging war against the allied central powers of Europe; and

Whereas nearly all of said subjects and citizens have emigrated to this country either for the purpose of becoming citizens thereof or for the purpose of securing the benefits of the greater wages and better opportunities afforded in this country, which opportunities have been created, defended, and maintained by the energies and sacrifices of the American people; and

Whereas it is the moral and patriotic duty of said subjects and citizens to support the several Governments to which they owe allegiance in the desperate warfare in which such Governments are engaged; and

Whereas the United States is also engaged in war against the said central powers for the protection of the rights of the several nations so waging war against the said central powers as well as its own sacred rights; and

Whereas it is most unjust to ask or require the American people to sacrifice their sons, their brothers, and their treasure in battling for the mutual rights and welfare of all the other nations prosecuting this war against the said central powers while their own subjects and citizens in vast numbers enjoying in this country the special and wonderful industrial opportunities which this war affords them are wholly relieved from service or sacrifice: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to propose to all European nations engaged in war against the said central powers and, if possible, secure from them an agreement authorizing and empowering the United States to apply the provisions of the act entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917, to all such subjects and citizens domiciled in this country in the same manner and to the same effect as such provisions are applied to the citizens of the United States in selecting and raising an army or navy for service in the present war.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be placed on the calendar.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask that a letter from Hon. Frank L. Polk, Counselor for the State Department, concerning the resolution, be printed as a part of the report of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

LITTLE RIVER BRIDGE, ARK.

Mr. SHEPPARD. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 2695) to authorize the construction, maintenance, and operation of a bridge across Little River, Ark., at or near the foot of the gar hole about one-half mile south of the Jonesboro, Lake City & Eastern Railway bridge across Little River, Ark., and I submit a report (No. 91) thereon. I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BRADY;

A bill (S. 2698) granting an increase of pension to Charles Richter (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 2699) granting a pension to Sarah Van Doozer (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CUMMINS:

A bill (S. 2700) for the relief of the Philippine Scouts; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. NEW:

A bill (S. 2701) to provide for the awarding of campaign badges to the members of the Dental Corps, United States Army, and fixing the regulations for awarding same; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. SMOOT:

A bill (S. 2702) to reimburse Susan Sanders for expenditures and expenses incurred in prosecuting the intermarried white cases on behalf of the Cherokee Indians; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

DONATION OF FLAGS.

Mr. POMERENE. I introduce a bill authorizing and directing the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy to make and furnish to the households and families of soldiers, sailors, and marines flags emblematic of said service. I ask that the bill be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill (S. 2703) authorizing and directing the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy to make and furnish to the households and families of soldiers, sailors, and marines flags emblematic of said service was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PAPER ON PROHIBITION BY HON. JAMES T. LLOYD (S. DOC. NO. 67).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Concurrent and other resolutions are in order.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, under that head perhaps as well as any other, I ask leave to have printed a paper presented to me by Hon. James T. Lloyd, formerly Member of the House of Representatives from Missouri. After some 18 or 20 years' service in that body he voluntarily retired from the service at the end of the last Congress. The paper is a discussion particularly of the constitutional features of the amendment for national prohibition which is to come before the Senate to-day, giving some sort of a historic résumé of other amendments that have been proposed and acted upon. I ask that this paper may be printed as a Senate document. It will not cover more than six or seven pages, and if this request is agreed to I should like to have the young gentlemen who have charge of the pages have this document laid on the desks of Senators to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SMOOT. I could not hear the Senator very well. He presented a paper on the general prohibition question?

Mr. STONE. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, as that question is to be considered to-day and voted upon not later than Wednesday, I have no objection to the paper being printed at the request of the Senator, but the Senator knows that the rule generally is that such matters go to the Committee on Printing. However, I have no objection under the circumstances.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is no objection, it will be so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 1553) to give effect to the convention between the United States and Great Britain for the protection of migratory birds, concluded at Washington, August 16, 1916, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arizona moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 1553, known as the migratory-bird bill. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. REED. What is the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill known as the migratory-bird act.

Mr. REED. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arizona moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 1553. The question is on agreeing to the motion.

Mr. REED. Is the morning business closed?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business has closed.

Mr. STONE. Will both Senators who are standing yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I yield to the Senator.

AURELIO COLLAZO (S. REPT. NO. 92).

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, the President of the United States sent a communication to the Senate some days ago transmitting a request from the Cuban Government that a certain young man, a citizen of Cuba, might be received at the Military Academy at West Point for instruction. This has been done frequently, both with respect to the Military and Naval Academy. The Committee on Foreign Relations, having considered it, directed me to report the joint resolution, which was introduced in compliance with the recommendation to which I have alluded. It will take only half a minute, and in order that it may be sent over to the House and considered there, so that the young man be received at the academy when the next session begins, I ask that the joint resolution may be considered and disposed of.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the Chair will receive the report from the committee and put the request of the Senator from Missouri, and he will then recognize the Senator from Arizona. Is there objection?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The only point I would like to make in this connection is, if no objection was made and the Chair decided no objection had been made to taking up the treaty bill, and, if I have the floor, I would be very glad to yield it to the Senator from Missouri for this purpose, not displacing the order that had been made by the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not the case that the Chair decided conclusively that there was no objection. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] addressed the Chair before the Chair made that decision.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I have no objection, then, to the request of the senior Senator from Missouri.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]? If not, the Secretary will read the joint resolution reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The Secretary read the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 86) authorizing the Secretary of War to receive for instruction at the United States Military Academy at West Point Aurelio Collazo, a citizen of Cuba, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to permit Mr. Aurelio Collazo, a citizen of Cuba, to receive instruction at the United States Military Academy at West Point: Provided, That no expense shall be caused to the United States thereby, and that the said Aurelio Collazo shall agree to comply with all regulations for the police and discipline of the academy, to be studious, and to give his utmost efforts to accomplish the course in the various departments of instruction, and that the said Aurelio Collazo shall not be admitted to the academy until he shall have passed the mental and physical examinations prescribed for candidates from the United States, and that he shall be immediately withdrawn if deficient in studies or conduct and so recommended by the academic board: Provided further, That in the case of the said Aurelio Collazo the provisions of sections 1320 and 1321 of the Revised Statutes shall be suspended.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to ask the Senator from Missouri a question. Is it contemplated that this cadet shall pay to the Naval Academy the amount which foreigners whom we have heretofore admitted to the academy have been required to pay?

Mr. STONE. The joint resolution expressly provides that there shall be no expense to the United States.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Well, does that mean that the cadet shall pay his pro rata of the cost of tuition there? At the Naval Academy at Annapolis, I will say to the Senator, I understand that to foreigners who are permitted to enter there the cost is about $13,500 for a four years' term.

Mr. STONE. I know nothing about that, Mr. President.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I think at West Point it is considerably less than that amount.

Mr. STONE. I know that the Committee on Foreign Relations since my service on that committee has reported bills or joint resolutions similar to this on several occasions, and they have been considered and passed without objection, as I supposed would be the case with this joint resolution.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I suppose it is the intention that this cadet shall pay his tuition?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] for the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had approved and signed the following acts:

PROTECTION OF MIGRATORY BIRDS.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 1553) to give effect to the convention between the United States and Great Britain for the protection of migratory birds concluded at Washington August 16, 1916, and for other purposes.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, is that motion subject to discussion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the rule the motion is not open to debate.

Mr. REED. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will refer the Senator from Missouri to Rule VIII, where provision is made that—

All motions made before 2 o'clock to proceed to the consideration of any matter shall be determined without debate.

The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arizona to proceed to the consideration of the bill named by him. [Putting the question.] The ayes seem to have it.

Mr. REED. I ask for the yeas and nays, Mr. President.

The yeas and nays were ordered and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and vote "yea."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I transfer my general pair with the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] to the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] and vote "yea."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX]. In his absence I transfer that pair to the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] and vote "yea."

Mr. WATSON (after having voted in the affirmative). I am informed that the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT], with whom I am paired, is not present, and I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. GERRY. Has the junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He has not voted.

Mr. GERRY. I transfer my pair with that Senator to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] and vote "yea."

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM], but I transfer that pair to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] and vote "yea."

Mr. GERRY. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM] and the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] are necessarily detained on important business.

I also wish to announce that the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] is detained on official business.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] is detained from the Senate on account of illness. I ask that this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH];

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN];

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]; and

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] with the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS].

The result was announced—yeas 53, nays 4, as follows:

So the motion of Mr. SMITH of Arizona was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1553) to give effect to the convention between the United States and Great Britain for the protection of migratory birds concluded at Washington August 16, 1916, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is before the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, and open to amendment.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I inquire why this bill is not read?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will reply to the Senator from Missouri that the bill has been read twice, once on June 28 and again on July 9, and also an amendment has been adopted by the Senate. The bill is still before the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, and open to amendments.

Mr. REED. I desire to inquire of the Senator in charge of the bill whether the Canadian Parliament has passed an act in conformity with the treaty in pursuance of which this present pending bill is offered?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The whole action of the Canadian Parliament was printed in the RECORD the other day. That action is of record in this body now.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, what evidence has the Senator that the Canadian Parliament has taken any action at all? Has the Government received any official notice?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I do not know.

Mr. REED. I saw a document which was offered here and sent to the desk as indicative of the action of the Canadian Parliament, at the top of which in pencil was a notation indicating that it was a draft of a bill as introduced. I should like to have that paper presented to me.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I have a telegram from Mr. E. W. Nelson, chief of the biological survey, under date of July 23, as follows:

Hon. MARCUS A. SMITH,
United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR: I take pleasure in informing you that I have this morning received a telegram from Canada announcing that the migratory-bird treaty enabling act finally passed both houses of Parliament July 21 without amendment. I inclose herewith a copy of the telegram.

Mr. REED. Now, Mr. President, I am inquiring for the document that was sent to the desk, and which purported to be the act passed by the Canadian Parliament. [A pause.]

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I ask for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will say that——

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I do not think a Senator has the right to occupy the floor in absolute silence.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will say that he has instructed the Secretary to procure from his files the paper desired by the Senator from Missouri. The Chair does not think that a Senator has a right to occupy the floor when he makes a request of this kind in silence while the officers of the Senate are attempting to supply the paper.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. They may be two hours getting it.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I am getting so accustomed to reprimands from the Chair that I take them quite as a matter of course. I maintain that any Senator has the right to rise in his place and call for a document which was filed at the desk only a few days ago, and which touches directly and immediately upon the matter under consideration, when he does it in good faith, and I take it that my good faith in this inquiry will hardly be challenged. I believe that I have a fair knowledge of the rules of the Senate and of the rights of debate; and, among things, when I make an inquiry as a Senator from this floor, I have the right to a courteous reply.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks that the Chair may say properly, when the Senator from Missouri makes such a statement, that if he had observed the RECORD and knew what order had been made by the Senate, it was that the document he desired was ordered printed in the RECORD. Under the rules and practices of the Senate in such cases the document is sent to the Public Printer and is printed in the RECORD; and the Chair now has knowledge that the RECORD has been pointed out to the Senator from Missouri by one of the secretaries. The paper is not in the possession of the Senate at this time, except possibly by construction.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I am very much obliged for that illuminating statement. I called attention to the document which was filed, and a copy or purported copy of which now appears printed in the RECORD, and to the fact that there was upon it a pencil notation tending to show that the substance of the document had not yet been made a law by the Parliament of Canada, but that it was a preliminary draft which had been forwarded here to some Senator and sent forward and by him presented at the desk. That original document, with that original memorandum on it, I wanted. I did not need to have the Chair tell me that a document presented at the desk and read at the desk would appear in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD; neither did I need to have the Chair tell me or tell the country that the Chair now had official knowledge that the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD had been presented to me. I wanted that original document. I have inquired from the Senator in charge of this bill whether there was any evidence that the Canadian Parliament had ever ratified or confirmed our treaty by enacting a law in pursuance of that treaty, and the Senator replies that he has seen a telegram sent to some subordinate in the Agricultural Department to the effect that the Canadian Government has acted.

Now, Mr. President, I should like very much, if I can, to get the attention of the Senate to what I regard as a very material matter in connection with this legislation; and I do not care how much you may be in favor of legislation of this character, or how earnestly you may desire the immediate enactment into law of a statute ratifying and confirming our treaty with Canada and carrying it into effect by statute. Indeed, the more you may be in favor of legislation of that character, the more the appeal I am about to make to you ought, it seems to me, to address itself to your judgment. It is this:

We have made a treaty with Canada by which it is agreed that Canada shall pass a certain class of legislation to carry out the provisions of that treaty, and to stop the slaughter or the killing of certain birds, migratory and otherwise; and now we are asked to pass a statute carrying out what it is claimed is our part of that agreement. We are asked to do that, not upon the receipt of a certified copy sent here by the Canadian Government to advise us what the action of the Canadian Government has been, but we are asked to do it upon a fugitive paper that was presented by a Senator, and upon the strength merely of a telegram received by a subordinate in the Agricultural Department stating that the Canadian Parliament has acted.

The ordinary and proper method of procedure, as everybody must know, would be to await the receipt of a certified copy from the Canadian Government, and then to refer that document to the Committee on Foreign Relations and let the Committee on Foreign Relations examine and determine whether or not the Canadian Government had passed a statute in conformity with our treaty and of such a character as to require legislation by this body.

Mr. President, whenever we fail to proceed in that way we are bound to fall into all kinds of error. Understand, if we were proceeding regardless of the action of Canada, if we were taking the initial step, and if we were legislating from that standpoint, what I may say now might not be of any considerable force; but this question is presented to us now to be acted upon on the basis that Canada has acted, and that we are to take the second step, responding to the action of the Canadian Government, and yet there is no official notice here from the Government of Canada. There is no kind of notice whatever except that which comes in this irregular way, and there has been no reference of the action of the Canadian Government upon this legislation to the Foreign Relations Committee, where it ought to go for the sake of checking up the two bills, for the sake of ascertaining whether their legislation fits our legislation; because, if that is not done, it may appear that Canada has not carried out her part of this treaty. Moreover, it may appear, even if Canada has carried out her part of this treaty, that the pending bill does not properly articulate and fit into the Canadian legislation.

So, Mr. President, I move that this bill be recommitted to the Committee on Foreign Relations, with instructions to that committee to ascertain whether or not the Canadian Government has acted in ratification of our treaty and to report to the Senate whether the present bill articulates with the Canadian legislation, if such legislation shall have been had.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the Committee on Foreign Relations—I see the chairman is here——

Mr. STONE. Go ahead.

Mr. LODGE. The Committee on Foreign Relations considered this bill carefully and reported it. I can see no reason for its recommittal. So far as what the Canadian Government have done is concerned, if they had done nothing it would be just as much incumbent upon us to carry out the treaty we had agreed to; and as for getting certified copies of the laws of another country, there are some things of which courts take judicial notice and I think we might take judicial notice. There is no doubt whatever of the fact, and I see no possible reason for referring this bill again to the Foreign Relations Committee.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. REED. There are some things, as the Senator says, of which courts and legislative bodies take judicial notice, although a legislative body can hardly be said to take judicial notice of anything; but I know how the Senator employs the term.

Mr. LODGE. I use that as a simile.

Mr. REED. But does the Senator from Massachusetts mean to say that a legislative body ought to take notice that a bill has been passed by the legislative body of a foreign country when there is not a living man in the body who can say that he knows the legislation has been effected?

Mr. LODGE. I understood differently, and I understood it had been printed here.

Mr. REED. I know; but that has been explained. If the Senator——

Mr. LODGE. And I understood the department had been informed of it, and I do not think there is any doubt of the fact. But when we dealt with the question of the fisheries we did not require certified copies of the acts of Canada. We took them as a matter of public information, and dealt with them accordingly, and legislated.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, if I will get the information that the Senator wants within 30 minutes, will he let us have a vote on this bill?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, that sort of bargaining on the floor of the Senate does not appeal to me.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. A man is justified in doing any sort of bargaining under conditions of this kind. I certainly am not violating any rule or infringing on the courtesy or dignity of the Senate or kind feeling toward my friend. I recognize his rights. I am extremely anxious, as he knows, to pass the bill; and I would suggest to the Senator another proposition:

Inasmuch as we were the proponents of this treaty, inasmuch as the United States initiated it, why should we wait for Canada's action in that case? We proposed it. Whether Canada has acted or not, it is our duty to carry it out; but we are informed that she has acted, and the Canadian bill has been printed in the RECORD.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, that is a point that I have made perfectly plain. If we initiated the treaty, it might be said that we ought to follow it by taking the first legislative action, and that thereupon Canada, having our action before it, would act in the light of our legislation and would make its legislative act fit onto or coordinate with our legislative act. That, of course——

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to his colleague?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. STONE. If my colleague will permit, I would like to say that it is not so much a question as to whether acts passed by the Canadian Parliament and by the Congress of the United States coordinate or articulate, as he expresses it, as it is whether they coordinate and articulate, both of them, with the provisions of the treaty itself. If they do not do that, if either is not in accord with the treaty, and especially if either is in contravention of the treaty, then one or both, as the case may be, will not conform to the treaty, and the act not so conforming would be ineffective, in so far as the treaty is concerned, for the treaty is the foundation, the basis, upon which the legislation in both countries would be constructed. Now, if the act that we are proposing is in accordance with the terms of the treaty, is not that all we have to do? We perform our part. Canada must take care of her own legislation. If Canada has passed or should pass a law that does not conform with the treaty, it would be of no effect, so far as this country is concerned.

Mr. REED. I do not agree with all that my distinguished colleague says. I hold, of course, that if this treaty has any binding force, and in so far as our Government could make it without impinging upon the Constitution itself, it is our duty, having made the treaty, to enact legislation in accordance with it; and it may have been, in due course, a sort of obligation upon us to act before Canada acted. But if Canada has acted, we have an interest in knowing whether the action of Canada is in conformity with the treaty, if it is desired to put it in that form. There is not a man in the Senate who can stand here and say that he knows what Canada has done; and we are asked to pass a law here in relation to a solemn treaty, thought to be of sufficient importance to negotiate, without any official notification and without any of that kind of notification which the Senator from Massachusetts calls judicial notice, because judicial notice is based upon a common and general understanding of matters, and not upon a condition such as we find here this morning, when no man can say that the act has taken place, and where there is no common or general understanding about it.

There is not any doubt in my mind, notwithstanding all the efforts that have been made on the side for this bill, notwithstanding the temper of many Senators here to press it through without consideration, that the proper course for this bill to take is to go to the committee, and let the Committee on Foreign Relations tell us what the Canadian Government has done, and tell us whether the bill, if any was passed by the Canadian Government, does conform to the treaty, because if it does not conform to the tre[illegible] then it would become perfectly manifest that we would be [illegible]rested in knowing what the intentions of the Canadian Go[illegible]ment might be.

So, Mr. President, I insist upon my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri to recommit the bill to the Committee on Foreign Relations, with instructions.

Mr. REED. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when Mr. GOFF's name was called). I desire to announce the absence of my colleague the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] on account of illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day. My colleague has a general pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM] and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. VARDAMAN (when his name was called). I desire to inquire if the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY] has voted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He has not voted.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I have a general pair with that Senator. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. WEEKS (when his name was called). Has the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He has not voted.

Mr. WEEKS. I have a general pair with that Senator and withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GERRY. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] and vote "nay."

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I will transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM] to the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] and vote "nay."

Mr. ROBINSON (after having voted in the negative). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HUSTING] and let my vote stand.

The result was announced—yeas 7, nays 43, as follows:

So the Senate refused to recommit the bill.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the motion which I made, and which has been so overwhelmingly voted down, was made in good faith and not for delay. It is absurd, in my humble judgment, to the last degree to ask the enactment of a law to carry out the purposes of a treaty which requires similar action on the part of a foreign Government and to take that action upon a mere rumor that the foreign Government has passed a certain law, a true copy of which no man can assert has arrived at the Senate. It is not in accordance with the dignity and decencies of governmental action, in my humble opinion.

If this bill were presented wholly regardless of the Canadian Government's action, presented upon its merits and in disregard of anything the Canadian Government had ever done, I would not make the remark I have made; but it has been asserted and argued here that we ought to pass the bill at this time because Canada has taken certain action, and yet nobody can vouch for the fact that Canada has taken that action. If we are to take into consideration any action by the Canadian Government, then what the Canadian Government did ought to be before us in some authentic form, and that should be referred to the proper committee of the Senate, to the end that when we come to act we shall act in the full light of what the other Government shall have done. But that was submitted to the Senate, and it has not been the opinion of the Senate that that course should be followed. Consequently, I have no further complaint to make about it. If the Senate wants to transact its business in that way, it is for the Senate to say; and, of course, no one Member can prevent it. I venture the hazard of the prediction that if that sort of loose way of doing business is followed, there will come a day when we shall regret having adopted that method of doing business.

Mr. President, I am perfectly aware that my opposition to this bill and this class of legislation has been regarded as somewhat stubborn, and I am going to say now for the relief of the Senator in charge of the bill that I am going to give him a vote before 2 o'clock, because I shall have done my full duty, and I only want time enough to make my position perfectly clear.

This legislation is the result of a persistent lobby that has been at work for a number of years; that has been backed undoubtedly by a large amount of money. The evidence of that I put in the RECORD many months ago. It has been put before the people of the United States upon a false basis from the first. Paid agents have haunted the corridors of this Capitol to advocate this legislation, and some of them have been called by name from this seat. They have not hesitated to defame and malign every man who has opposed their purposes. They have asserted that every man who opposed this class of legislation is a game hog; that he desires to slaughter all the game there is. They have described him as a pothunter, and so forth.

The originator of this legislation I portrayed from his own book in the Senate, where I read passages in which he described the great glee he experienced when he was skinning an orang-utan and told what a thrill went through the heart of the hunter of orang-utans as the knife pierced down through their flesh, and at the same time he described the orang-utan as so nearly a human being that the mothers carried their young as a woman carries her babe, and set forth other human attributes.

The fact is there are two classes of men opposed to this legislation. One of them is that class of sportsmen who believe that when you undertake to turn over to the Agricultural Department of this country the right to make rules and regulations prescribing when and how and where game can be killed, you have put the job into the hands of incompetents, who do not know how to administer it. The demonstrations up to this day are to the effect that the Agricultural Department do not know how to administer this law, a fact which they confess by going outside of the departments of the Government and outside of any authority of law and organizing what they please to term an advisory council. This advisory council has undertaken to divide the country into zones and to specify when it shall be legal and when it shall not be legal for a sovereign citizen of a sovereign State of the United States to take game within the boundaries of his own State.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair desires to inquire of the Senator if he still desires the paper he requested to be brought to the Secretary's desk?

Mr. REED. I do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The officers of the Senate have just been able to procure the paper returned from the Printing Office. The Chair will send it to the Senator, if he desires.

Mr. REED. I thank the Chair.

This advisory committee is composed of men the majority of whom, if I recall aright, live in the city of New York. I have no doubt that a number of them have never visited the important States which they have assumed to divide into zones and precincts. Some of these men are connected with the manufacture of shotguns and other hunting paraphernalia. Funds to carry on this propaganda were gathered from the great manufacturers of arms in the country, a fact which I have also demonstrated, and in demonstrating it I did no very great task, for the evidence was furnished to me by others, but it has never been disputed, and I challenge any man to dispute it now.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I do not know anything about it, but I suggest that if the men who manufacture shotguns were doing that they were acting very much against their own interests.

Mr. REED. Oh, no; not at all.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Because if you allow shooting all the year, summer and winter, I imagine what they manufacture would be in great demand.

Mr. REED. Oh, no; these gentlemen have plenty of ways to make money out of it, and one is this: During the close season they sell vast quantities of clay pigeons for trap shooting to people who can not be permitted to get into the field. The correspondence is extant, showing how they expected to make the money and where they expected to line their purse through this legislation.

Mr. President, the principal opposition to this bill coming from sportsmen has come from that class of men who advocated remedial and protective legislation for game when Hornaday was hunting monkeys and orang-utans and boasting of the pleasure he obtained from killing them. They comprise that body of men in my part of the country who have been the advocates of stringent legislation in the State legislature; but they comprise also a body of men who have insisted that a man who will make the rules and regulations promulgated by the Department of Agriculture giving an open season for ducks at a time when every pond is frozen over and every river frozen 8 or 10 inches thick is not competent to make regulations.

But there is another class who have opposed this legislation, and in that class I include myself. It is that class of men who hold that there are certain fundamental rights and privileges and duties which belong to the several States of the Union, and that those rights and duties under the Constitution of the United States can not be taken away, and that when Congress undertakes to take them away Congress violates the Constitution that it ought sacredly to uphold.

This legislation is akin and apiece with the bill that was passed some months ago in Congress, a bill to which I have already referred. That bill was believed to be unconstitutional by a great many lawyers; I will not say by every lawyer in the United States, but I think by nearly every good lawyer. Of course, I must make some exceptions among the good in order to allow the few advocates of this bill who are lawyers to be classed as good lawyers. It was held by those lawyers that the bill was unconstitutional, first, because it had been decided time out of mind that game, until taken, is the property of the State, and not of the Federal Government. The authorities with reference to this point I have already given to the Senate, and I shall not weary the Senate by again referring to them more than in this passing way?

It is sufficient to say that that principle of law was established more than 50 years ago—I think, if my recollection serves me aright, quite 75 years ago—and it has been steadfastly adhered to from that day to this. Therefore the men who believe that the Constitution ought to be upheld and who believe that the Federal Government ought not to try to take over to itself rights and powers that belong to the respective States have contended against this class of legislation. That they were warranted in their contention is demonstrated by the fact that three Federal courts, having this question presented squarely to them, have held the law unconstitutional, and that no Federal court of record up to this time, to my knowledge, at least, has ever held otherwise.

The principal one of these cases arose in the State of Arkansas before the Federal court of that State, and in an illuminating decision the judge of that court, citing authorities running back almost to the very origin of our Government, held the statute unconstitutional and void; held it unconstitutional and void upon the broadest grounds, and in the most certain terms. The same question came before his honor, Judge Pollock, of the Federal court, sitting for the State of Arkansas, and in a decision equally lucid Judge Pollock held the doctrine I have just announced. The case in the State of Arkansas was entitled "United States against George L. McCullagh." Now, observe what the court has to say with reference to this matter. The court does not treat it as a trivial thing that can be passed upon by Senators who refuse to hear argument and who leave the Chamber. I say it now, in all pleasantness, and by way of parenthesis, the day is going to come—and come soon—when men who do not stand by the Constitution of the United States will find other men occupying their seats in Congress, for, just as certain as the old sun will lift its head in the east and disappear at eventide in the west, just as certain will the day come when the people of the United States will discover that this much-maligned Constitution is their Constitution; that it is their charter of rights; that it is their harbinger of safety; and that those who strke it down or lay unholy hands upon it are worse than anarchists, because the anarchist parades his infamy in the open, while those who undermine the Constitution do it under the pretense of performing a public service; but whoever undermines the Constitution will some day find that the people will rise and say: "This was our Constitution; we wrote it in blood and in tears; we inscribed it as the charter of our rights; and we demand that obloquy and disgrace shall be visited upon every man who has assisted in debasing that Constitution." Make no mistake. We shall be held to a strict accountability.

Now, let me call attention to just a phrase of this opinion of his honor, Judge Pollock:

> In ruling this question certain fundamental principles so firmly established in the laws of this country as to become truisms must be borne in mind. As the act assailed on constitutional grounds expresses the deliberate action and intent of a coordinate branch of government, it must be either upheld and enforced or its invalidity must be made to appear so clearly as to be beyond all question of doubt.

Omitting part of the opinion, it continues:

> In the present case the Government asserts the power by Congress exercised in the passage of the act challenged is found in either what is commonly called the general-welfare clause, subsection 2 of section 3, Article IV, of the Constitution, which reads as follows:
>
> "The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States; and nothing in this Constitution shall be so construed as to prejudice any claims of the United States, or of any particular State."
>
> Or to be authorized by the commerce clause, which reads:
>
> "To regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes."
> It is quite evident the thought in the mind of Congress which gave rise to the passage of the act in question, and the common good thereby sought to be accomplished, was the preservation of the migratory bird life of the country from extermination as has in past been the lot of some species of its wild game, animals, and birds. However, no matter how laudable the purpose of Congress in the passage of the act in question may have been, or how great the ultimate end sought thereby to be attained for the common good, such end does not justify the means employed if it be found on examination to lie beyond constitutional bounds. In such event the only proper course lies in amendment of the Constitution.

Mr. President, I do not intend to read this very learned opinion, although it is not very long, in which the court goes over the entire line of authorities. It is sufficient for me to say that the court expressly holds that the act is violative of the Constitution. The concluding paragraph of the opinion is as follows:

> Not only is this true, but the argument of necessity, so strongly urged on the part of the Government at the hearing, to preserve the migratory-bird life of the country from extinction, would seem to the thoughtful mind more fanciful than real, and for this reason: The several States, as has been seen, possess the most absolute and plenary power of control over the subject matter of wild-animal and wild-bird life within their territorial domains it is possible to either conceive or to grant. In the exercise of this unlimited power the States acting together may, beyond all question, prohibit absolutely and unconditionally the taking of any such wild life in any part of this country either temporarily or for all time. Hence, it turns out, the argument of necessity for action on the part of the Government arises not so much from any want of power to control on the part of the several States as from dissatisfaction as to the manner in which such plenary power possessed by the several States is exercised. It is quite obvious differences of opinion and difficulties of the nature involved are inherent in the very form and structure of this Government, subject to change or correction, however, only in the manner prescribed by its founders.

And the same decision entered in this case, which was that a demurrer to the information be sustained, was rendered in another case then pending.

Mr. President, the Arkansas case in due course reached the Supreme Court of the United States. Something over a year ago I believe it was argued, and the court took the question under consideration, as is customary. After having held it for some months, the court asked a reargument of the case. That reargument took place, and the question is now in the mind of the court. The decision may be expected within the next 90 days. If the decision should be that the States have control of bird life and that the question, therefore, is not one for the consideration of Congress, this bill can not, of course, be enacted in its present form. It might be that some power could be exercised by the Federal Government touching the matters named in the treaty, but they would be of an entirely different character from those which are now written in this bill. If, upon the other hand, the Supreme Court should hold the law constitutional, overturning the decisions of all the Federal courts that have decided the question up to this time, then, of course, we would understand what has never been understood in the history of the world before, namely, that the wild birds of this country belong to the Federal Government, and not to the several States. Then we would be in a position to legislate in the light of that revolutionary decision.

But the advocates of this bill, Mr. President, are not willing to wait. I know why they are not willing to wait, and they know why. They fear that the Supreme Court of the United States will declare that law unconstitutional. They hope by some process of reasoning—I do not know what it is—that the United States Supreme Court, in deciding the case now before it, will in some way take into consideration the fact that we have made a treaty with Canada. They seem to be obsessed with the idea that Congress can do by treaty an act in violation of the Constitution of the United States which it can not do by statute—a remarkable kind of logic, which, I think, can only be indulged in by a man who has become thoroughly obsessed with this bird legislation.

Mr. President, we are passing through a time when every man who ventures to mention the Constitution makes of himself in a way a subject of ridicule. We are passing through a time, which I hope and pray we shall pass through safely, when the ordinary rules of life are brushed aside, when the ordinary powers of government are treated as though they could be extended without limit. We are passing through a time when men are permitted to stand on the floor of the Senate, without rebuke, and practically to declare that the Constitution of the United States has ceased to be.

I am not a pessimist or alarmed because of this, for I know that the great American people always discover the virtues of a question in the end. It may take two or three months for the truth to filter out; it may take six months or a year, but in the end the facts reach the brains of the American people, and when the facts do reach the brains of the American people the decision is nearly always, if not quite always, a wise one; at least, it is one which we all must cheerfully accord with and obey.

But I protest that it is a pitiable thing that there can be created in Congress a spirit that seems to be willing to ignore the Constitution whenever, in the opinion of some Member of Congress, it is for the public welfare, the Congressman forgetting that it is not for him to decide whether a thing prohibited by the Constitution be for the public welfare or not; that the very purpose of all written constitutions is to make a rule for the people that can not be set aside by men who are temporarily invested with the powers of government.

In the vast majority of cases the liberties of the peoples of various countries who have had liberty and have lost it by men who permitted the rights of the people to be impinged, and who at the time thought they were doing a good service; but, sir, they made a precedent that lived to become the instrument in the hands of others to bring about evil for their country. And so I still have the temerity to stand here, although I stand alone, with nothing back of me except the unbroken decisions of half a century of the courts of the United States and the courts of the several States, with nothing back of me but the decisions of at least two Federal courts rendered recently with reference to a law exactly like the one now before us—I have the temerity to stand alone and to protest against this legislation.

It is called up here in the morning hour. I could talk for 15 or 20 minutes longer, and the bill would go over, but the Senate, by an overwhelming vote, has expressed its desire to vote upon this bill. I have never yet engaged in a filibuster. I hope I shall never be obliged to do so. So, with what I have said, registering my protest not only to deaf ears but to ears of those who leave the Senate and refuse to listen; with the fact before me that the only Senators paying any attention are the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD], the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK], the Senator in charge of this bill [Mr. SMITH of Arizona], the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA], the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND], and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW]; knowing that the Senate does not intend to consider this bill, that it has not considered this bill, that it does not know what is in the bill, and that it proposes to pass it non obstante, I close my remarks, and let the vote be taken.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is still in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment. If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Brady	Kellogg	Overman	Smith, Md.
Chamberlain	Kendrick	Page	Smith, Mich.
Cummins	Kenyon	Poindexter	Smith, S. C.
Curtis	King	Ransdell	Smoot
Fletcher	McCumber	Reed	Sterling
Gerry	McKellar	Robinson	Stone
Gronna	McNary	Saulsbury	Sutherland
Hardwick	Martin	Shafroth	Swanson
Hollis	Nelson	Sheppard	Trammell
Johnson, Cal.	New	Sherman	Underwood
Jones, N. Mex.	Newlands	Shields
Jones, Wash.	Norris	Smith, Ariz.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-six Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of the absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. FERNALD, Mr. HALE, Mr. WARREN, and Mr. WATSON answered to their names when called.

Mr. FRANCE, Mr. LODGE, Mr. BANKHEAD, Mr. PITTMAN, Mr. PHELAN, Mr. WEEKS, Mr. POMERENE, Mr. LA FOLLETTE, and Mr. VARDAMAN entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

Mr. KING. I desire to announce that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] is necessarily absent on account of public business. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-nine Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, just one word before we vote.

I called for the original of a document that was sent here, and it reached me during the latter part of my remarks, and therefore I was not privileged to say why I wanted it. I want the Senate to understand that I did not call for this document out of any mere caprice. I had a reason for wanting the original, and it is this:

At the head of the document which is presented as the act of the Canadian Legislature is this pencil memorandum, which has since been erased, but, nevertheless, it can be read:

Advance copy of Canadian migratory bird treaty enabling act. Introduced in Parliament June 21, 1917.

If the bill was only introduced on the 21st of June, the inquiry naturally would arise whether it had been enacted into a law; and it was because of this memorandum being on the original papers that I desired their production. However, I have said now all that I wanted to say in reference to this bill, which I believe to be unconstitutional, and I am willing that the vote shall be taken.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator having charge of this bill whether section 5 was amended in consonance with the suggestions made by the Senator from Idaho several days ago?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Yes; that amendment was agreed to. The Senator from Missouri, the Senator from Idaho, and myself took up the matter, and it has been agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

The bill was passed.

NATION-WIDE PROHIBITION.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution providing for nation-wide prohibition be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas asks unanimous consent that Senate joint resolution 17, subject to the unanimous-consent agreement which goes into effect at 2 o'clock, shall be laid before the Senate. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 17) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following amendment to the Constitution be, and hereby is, proposed to the States, to become valid as a part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of the several States as provided by the Constitution:

"ARTICLE —.

"SECTION 1. The manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into, and the exportation thereof from the United States and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof for beverage purposes are hereby prohibited.

"SEC. 2. The Congress shall have the power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation, and nothing in this article shall deprive the several States of their power to enact and enforce laws prohibiting the traffic in intoxicating liquors."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There are several amendments proposed by the committee.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, as I understand, under the unanimous-consent agreement we are to vote on the joint resolution and the amendments at 4 o'clock Wednesday afternoon.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, was it the understanding that the votes on the amendments were to be had to-day, or are the votes to be taken Wednesday after 4 o'clock p. m.?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not think there is anything to prohibit a vote being taken before that time.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I ask unanimous consent that we take the resolution up now for the purpose of discussion until 2 o'clock, and after 2 o'clock the unanimous-consent agreement will be in force.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I trust the Senator will not insist upon taking up the amendments at this time.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I do not. On the other hand, I suggested that we do not consider the amendments until 4 o'clock on Wednesday afternoon.

Mr. GRONNA. I did not hear the Senator.

Mr. CURTIS. I did not hear the Senator make that suggestion, either. I think that is the proper course.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I think the amendments ought to be considered before 4 o'clock, but ought not to be voted upon until the day of Wednesday.

Mr. SHEPPARD. That was what I meant to say—to vote on them at 4 o'clock. Of course, they may be discussed between now and then.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Certainly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. We have come to a definite agreement for the consideration of this measure. I do not think it ought to be changed in any respect; and, although I do not desire to propose any amendment myself, I understand that at least one important amendment will be proposed. I think it ought to come up at a time when it can have some discussion and consideration; but, without changing the agreement, I think it would be very well if we reached an understanding—not an agreement but an understanding—between ourselves that the general debate shall run to-day and to-morrow, and when we reach the 10-minute rule on Wednesday that the amendments shall be considered. As I understand, the unanimous-consent agreement which has already been made contemplates that procedure.

Mr. SHEPPARD. It is contemplated under this agreement that all amendments and the joint resolution itself may be discussed until 4 o'clock on Wednesday afternoon.

Mr. STONE. It is understood, I presume, that amendments may be offered at any time, to be pending.

Mr. SHEPPARD. That is correct.

Mr. STONE. From this date until the final disposition of the bill.

Mr. SHEPPARD. That is true; until 4 o'clock Wednesday afternoon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that any question regarding what this unanimous-consent agreement provides for, the present occupant of the chair, if in the chair, will leave to the Senate for determination under the rule.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, this is a historic occasion. For the first time in its annals the Senate is to vote on the submission of a constitutional amendment for nation-wide prohibition. The method ordained by the Federal Constitution for its own alteration is being strictly followed. If the proposed amendment should be adopted by three-fourths of the States, the traffic in intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes would be forbidden anywhere within the American Republic. Prohibition would be imbedded in the organic law of the Nation.

At the outset an inquiry may arise as to why a subject of this kind should have assumed such importance as to justify the proposal of an amendment to the Federal Constitution.

Let Abraham Lincoln give answer:

The liquor traffic is a cancer in society, eating the vitals and threatening destruction, and all attempts to regulate it will not only prove abortive but will aggravate the evil. There must be no attempts to regulate the cancer. It must be eradicated, not a root must be left behind, for until this is done all classes must continue in danger of becoming victims of strong drink. * * * Slavery is abolished. The next great question would be the overthrow of the legalized liquor traffic. And you know, Merwin, that my head and my heart, my hand and my purse, will go into that work. In 1842, less than a quarter of a century ago, I predicted that the day would come when there would be neither a slave nor a drunkard in the land. I have lived to see one prediction fulfilled; I hope to see the other realized.

Senators, a vote for the amendment now pending will help to realize the dream of Lincoln.

Let one of the foremost scientific and professional bodies of the Nation, the American Medical Association, give answer. At its sixty-eighth annual session in the city of New York, in June of this year, the following resolutions were adopted:

Whereas we believe that the use of alcohol as a beverage is detrimental to the human economy; and

Whereas its use in therapeutics, as a tonic or a stimulant, or as a food, has no scientific basis: Therefore

Resolved, That the American Medical Association opposes the use of alcohol as a beverage; and be it further

Resolved, That the use of alcohol as a therapeutic agent should be discouraged.

To make the second resolution plainer, let it be said that therapeutics is that branch of medicine dealing with the treatment of disease.

Let Arthur Mee and Stuart Holden, noted students of the drink problem in England give answer:

The drink trade in these 50 years has deprived the country of man power equivalent to the whole of the British Army under arms. * * * If you would know how we destroy our children, there is a little new book that will tell you. It is Dr. Norman McLean's noble book, "Stand Up, Ye Dead." * * * You will learn from it that we sacrifice one-third of our possible growth of population losing in the way of France, which cries in vain to-day for her best men. There are other causes than drink for these things, but there is tragic meaning in the words of one of our great medical officers of health, Dr. Millard, of Leicester, which says that were he offered the abolition of drink alone or of all the other enemies of public health put together, he would choose the abolition of drink. * * * Is it nothing to us that these social Zeppelins of ours, not content to have stolen our man power in the past, not content to imperil our land to-day, not content to turn the happiness of millions into misery through all the years they live, saps the very foundations of our future and writes across the entrance of the world for millions of children who come through its gates—"All hope abandon, ye who enter here"?

Let the New York Tribune give answer:

Upon what does the liquor traffic depend? Upon debased manhood, wronged womanhood, and defrauded childhood. It holds a mortgage on every cradle, a deed written in the heart's blood on every human life.

Let Dr. Howard A. Kelly, medical professor of Johns Hopkins Hospital, give answer:

(1) Alcohol is nonefficient as a food, a most awful, wasteful substitute.
(2) May be classed as a drug and a poison.
(3) Has no rightful position as a medicine.
(4) Destroys individual, domestic and civil felicity.
(5) Increases taxation by filling prisons, madhouses, and workhouses.
(6) Greatest foe to civilization in heathen lands.
(7) Therefore could be wholly abolished with profit.
(8) Therefore, as one of the human family, an individual member has no right to introduce into the household or use for his own pleasure that which hurts even one other member or set at work an evil influence he has no well-grounded hope of controlling. * * * It is clear in the light of experience and of recent research work that alcohol ought to be classed in the list of dangerous drugs, along with morphine, cocaine, and chloral, a drug which may so affect the will power as to gain the complete mastery over a patient and in the end destroy him. * * * As a citizen, I note that it is alcohol which fills our prisons, whether taken in the form of a strong beverage as whisky, or beer, as a representative of milder beverages. It is at the bottom of most crimes, domestic infidelity, poverty, seductions, murders; it is allied to all that is evil and destructive of the high aims of civilization.

Let Rudyard Kipling give answer. He had seen two young men in a concert hall in one of our American cities get two young women drunk and then take them into a dark street. He had not been a total abstainer himself, nor had he commended temperance in his writings, but he wrote as follows of that scene:

Then, despite previous opinions, I became a prohibitionist. Better it is a man should go without his beer in public places and content himself with swearing at a narrow-minded majority; better it is to poison the inside with very vile temperance drinks and to buy lager furtively at back doors than to bring temptation to the lips of young fools such as the four I had seen. I understand now why the preachers rage against drink. I had said: "There is no harm in it, taken moderately;" and yet my own demand for beer helped directly to send these two girls reeling down the dark street to—God alone knows what end.

Let the following facts also give answer:

Alcohol is a liquid poison. It attacks the tissues that compose the various parts of the human organism. These tissues are immersed in water containing salts, and from the water and the salts the organs of life obtain nutrition. Alcohol absorbs this vital fluid, without which there can be no normal life, and then attacks the organ itself. It thus disturbs, impairs, and finally destroys the vital functions, the process being slow or rapid in proportion to the amount consumed, the regularity and persistence of the drink habit. Six or eight ounces taken at one time may produce death very shortly, even in those long accustomed to intoxicating liquors. It produces structural changes in the tissues, making them more and more dependent on its presence, as disintegration and decay proceed. A forced and abnormal activity follows, a temporary sense of warmth, vigor, comfort, congeniality, requiring larger and larger quantities to restore it. And what is at first a mere craving for this drug becomes in the end a clamor so resistless that the victim would sacrifice anything—honor, hope, self-respect, position, wife, children—for its satisfaction.

The most delicate tissues are those composing the brain and nerves. Here alcoholic poison works especial havoc. It impairs the highest functions of the brain, the sense of right, of moral conduct, of proper obligation to society and to God. It thus imperils virtue, integrity, respect for law and order—all that is sacred and pure in civilization. It is a chief source of immorality and crime.

Madame Tarnowsky, in her famous study of "female offenders," says that 82 per cent of fallen women were brought to ruin by alcohol. In a recent investigation the Massachusetts Bureau of Labor Statistics found that 84 per cent of the convicted criminals of that State were made criminals by drink. A lord chief justice of England said that if sifted, nine-tenths of the crime of England and Wales could be traced to drink. Col. L. Merwin Maus, who served 41 years in the Medical Corps of the United States Army, who organized the Public Health Service in the Philippines, and who has made a profound study of the effect of alcoholic liquors on the human race, says that probably all the crime committed in the Army, directly or indirectly, can be traced to alcohol. He says, further, that nearly all crime may be traced to alcoholic drink. He calls alcohol "our racial poision" and holds it mainly responsible for our 200,000 insane, our 250,000 feeble-minded, our 100,000 deaf and dumb, our 100,000 blind, our 50,000 juvenile delinquents in institutions, our 100,000 paupers, our 150,000 prisoners and criminals. Vance Thompson, who has written a stirring and impressive indictment of alcohol under the ironical title "Drink and be sober," says:

But alcohol is a curious thing. It is often as erratic in its manifestations as electricity. Its ordinary way of work is to degenerate its man, making for general organic degeneracy, with progressive waning of the intellectual faculties. Now and then it has another way. Instead of slowly murdering its man it attacks him furiously at intervals. Now and then, at an unforeseen moment, out of the blue a drinkstorm beats upon him and sweeps him away from his usual moorings. * * * The best man who drinks is never sure that crime may not get him; that when his moral discrimination is put to sleep by the drug a strange new criminality may not start up in him. The chance is one in a hundred? If it be only one in a thousand it is a bad chance to take, and it is on the edge of this peril that one finds the most awful and the most sad tragedies of life. One such adventure in life haunts me. The youth I loved most was an undergraduate at one of the English universities. Destiny had given him birth in a famous English family—near the head of it. * * * Once, I remember, we had wandered far afield, debating the old Utopian idea, and a winter night shut down on us. We went into a little wayside inn for dinner and took what we could get. It was an alehouse and there was no wine to be had. And I remember his pathetic exclamation, "How can a gentleman dine without a half pint of claret?"

Let me interrupt here to say that a few days ago a Senator who has everything the world can give to make life beautiful, useful, inspiring, and worth while, who has eloquence, genius, and charm, who has in him the making of a President, said in my hearing, "What possible harm can come from a glass of sherry in the home?" And that Senator is going to vote against this amendment. He is going to vote to continue a traffic which will send millions of men and women to careers of crime and shame because personally he can see no harm in a glass of sherry in his palatial home.

But let us return to Vance Thompson and the story of his ill-fated friend. He continues:

Now, in the horoscope of this grave and gentle lad was the maddest night ever written by the stars. I did not witness it. I was not even in England, but what happened I know, and I know the end. He had been studying hard and late and in the afternoon he rode out for an hour or so—those were the days when youth took its pleasure on a horse—and he came back and dressed to dine in town with some friends. There you have him at a trifle before 8 o'clock. He had never been drunk in his life; he was the half-pint-of-claret sort of a man; the man who wets his pipe with a glass or two of whisky and soda; a clean-mannered man who had as soon think of drinking to excess as of rolling in the kennel like a dog. Where he went that evening I do not know. The bolt from the blue struck him. At 10 o'clock he was a drink-mad maniac, scouring the streets of the town with an American revolver—Heaven knows where he got it; I have forgotten—in his hand, and five minutes later he shot and killed a constable who expostulated with him in the kindly British way. They hanged that boy. In spite of the mighty weight of his family name, in spite of his dazed defense, in spite of the evident madness of that drink storm they hanged him on a gallows. "I don't remember anything about it" was all he could say. How could he? Science would have made clear to-day that he was in an alcoholic trance. When he went out to kill the real man in him—the man I knew and loved, the dreamer of Utopia—was deaf and blind. I do not care to write any more about this boy's life and death, only this: No man who plays with the lawless force of alcohol knows when or where the bolt from the blue will strike. No man knows. For inexorably as a triangle is imbedded in a circle there is hidden in alcohol the swift potentiality of crime.

Other disasters follow the presence of alcoholic poison in the brain tissues. Quickness and accuracy of judgment, memory, perception, coordination, ability to receive and transmit impulses, appreciation of the highest standards and motives of human conduct, faculties of initiative and originality, thrift, energy, all are affected at the very fountains of their being. The resulting loss to the individual and to society is beyond all estimation. In an age of machinery and of business transactions on a scale more enormous and complicated than ever before the clear eye, the quick brain, and the steady nerve are imperatively demanded. Society is more dependent to-day on the man at the machine than at any previous period. We are coming to understand that the engine of the body must have the same care as the engine of the aeroplane, the battleship, the railway train, the steamship, or the automobile; that the trade in alcohol is a form of sabotage which the human machine can not endure; that it is no more to be tolerated than would be the business of making and selling scrap iron to be dropped into the delicate and complex machinery of modern manufacture, transportation, and commerce.

But alcohol does not confine its devastations to the brain. Nor are its ravages limited to the production of inefficiency, immorality, and crime. Permeating all the organs of the body and attacking their component tissues it weakens them to such an extent as to invite and hasten the inroads of disease. It finds its way into the blood vessels that carry nutriment to every part of the human anatomy. It paralyzes, more or less, both the red and white corpuscles in the blood, injuring the disease-resisting power of the former, the microbe-destroying function of the latter. Entering the stomach, it produces, with continued use, gastric catarrh and disturbs the entire digestive apparatus. It alters the tissues of the liver, dilating the cells, interfering with the liver's basic functions, producing cirrhosis, with possible complications of dropsy, swollen veins, and jaundice in its train.

A prominent authority tells us that regular and moderate drinkers are more liable to cirrhosis than those who indulge in occasional sprees. It attacks the tissues of the heart, causing in time a fatty degeneration and leaving that vital organ weakened and imperiled. In the kidneys it becomes one of the principal agencies of Bright's disease. According to Prof. Woodhead diseases of the heart, arteries, and kidneys are usually found in moderate drinkers. Prof. Strumpell avers that to alcohol may be traced nearly all cases of chronic inflammation of the stomach and intestines. Passing into the lungs it again begins its war on the normal tissue. Here it becomes the principal ally of tuberculosis, which is also engaged in tearing down the tissues. By the same process everywhere it leaves the entire body not only without the natural weapons against disease, but especially susceptible to contagious maladies of every sort. Perhaps it is most effective in the encouragement and transmission of venereal trouble. It destroys self-control, unleashes the savage passions, goads them to satiety which, in a climax of deviltry, it crowns with foul contagion. It makes the moderate drinker and the saloon as well a breeder and a carrier of communicable disease. It is a menace to the health as well as the morals of the Nation, and should be abated like any other nuisance or any other malignant plague.

The indictment is not yet complete. This alcoholic drug adds poverty of the blackest, dreariest, and most hopeless sort to the list of its offenses. Such is its power that men will take bread money from their families and make it blood money for drink. Such is its power that the American people are expending two and a half billion dollars for it every year, an average consumption of about 22 gallons for every man, woman, and child in the Republic. Nearly all of the American people must earn a living with the labor of their hands. Keep in mind the fact that those who bear most of the Nation's burdens, produce most of the Nation's wealth, and constitute the chief source of the Nation's vitality are the individuals, male and female, who earn a living by manual labor.

It is not generally realized how large an element of our population they represent. With their families they compose about five-sixths of the American people, and many of them begin work at as early an age as 10 years. Of these manual laborers over eleven and a half millions are engaged in agriculture. I do not refer to the million large farmers who either do not or need not perform the actual labor of the farm. Over 10,000,000 are at work in manufacturing and mechanical industries. Over 900,000 are laboring in the mines and in the oil, gas, and salt wells. Over two and a half millions are engaged in the different forms of transportation and communication, such as water, road, street, railway, express, mail, telegraph, and telephone. Over 3,250,000 are workers in the wholesale and retail trades, including the small merchants. Over 330,000 are in the official service of county, State, and Nation. Over three and a half millions are doing domestic and personal service. Nearly a million and three-quarters are in the clerical occupations. There should be included the millions of women and children who comprise the households and toil in the homes of these workers.

These figures are taken from the last census and refer to persons over 10 years of age in occupations requiring manual labor. They account for practically 34,000,000 people, about 7,000,000 of whom are women and girls, and these 34,000,000, with their families, make five-sixths of the Nation. They produce, prepare, and deliver for consumption the commodities that sustain the lives, clothe the bodies, and make possible the occupations of the entire American population. An analysis of the country's wealth will show that it is mainly the concrete expression of the muscle and sweat of these manual laborers. Indeed, they are the bulk of society itself and form the buttress of those social conditions, such as observance of law, preservation of order, recognition of property, respect for individual rights and contract obligations, which are essential to the peaceful accumulation and undisturbed possession of wealth. And yet these workers, the principal pillars of this Republic, the main factors in the creation of its wealth, whose bodies must be its chief defense in time of war, get an average gross return of less than $700 a year.

Mr. President, with returns so small that they can barely provide their families with life's necessities, the laboring millions can not afford to waste over two billions a year on a beverage that impairs strength, undermines health, corrupts morals, and sends an ever-widening stream of defectives and incompetents to the asylum, the penitentiary, the hospital, and the grave. Add to this the fact that even the moderate drinker transmits the alcoholic taint to the unborn child, predisposing the helpless little being to disease, to shame, and to sin, and the horror of it all will begin to appear.

In view of the fact, Mr. President, that the toiling millions are to be the principal beneficiaries of the abolition of the liquor traffic, is it not astounding that there should have been a definite effort to enlist organized labor in behalf of this traffic? The laboring hosts of America, with their families, seventy-five or eighty millions strong, are asked to oppose prohibition, presumably because 100,000 bartenders have a union, as well as probably most of the 62,000 brewery, distillery, and other beverage-factory operatives. Labor is asked to imperil its very existence, to take food from the mouths and clothes from the backs of men, women, and children, to sustain a traffic meaning hunger, disease, insanity, and death for the masses, while liquor barons thrive in luxury, on account of these few men who would be infinitely better off in some other line. Also workers in certain occupations, such as paper hangers, plumbers, carpenters, teamsters, gas fitters, blacksmiths, boiler makers, iron-ship builders, joiners, carriage and wagon workers, coopers, electrical workers, steam engineers, stationary firemen, journeymen horseshoers, leather workers on horse goods, machinists, and so forth, are urged to take an active interest for the liquor traffic because some of them are employed to a greater or less degree in connection with the 68,000 saloons and the less than 2,500 breweries, distilleries, and vinous liquor plants in the United States.

Let me again quote from Vance Thompson:

Taking five leading industries in this country, namely, textiles and the finished products, iron and steel and their products, lumber and its manufactures, leather and its finished products, and paper and printing, and comparing them with the liquor business (including the malting industry) with regard to the number of wage earners employed, capital invested, and wages paid, we arrive at some interesting conclusions. Based upon the figures found in the Abstract of Statistics of Manufacture we discover that the number of wage earners for each $1,000,000 invested in each of these industries was as follows: Liquor, 77; textiles, 578; iron, 284; lumber, 579; leather, 469; and paper, 367.

In plainer words, every million dollars invested in the drink industry gives employment to only 77 men, while a similar sum invested in lumber, for example, gives a living to 579 men.

What is all this boast about what the liquor industry is doing for labor? The ratio of wages paid to the workers in proportion to the capital invested is so criminally small that it should not stand for an hour in the face of this sociological investigation which Mr. Stelzle and his associates have made. In the textile industries—and that fairly represents all the other industries—the ratio of wages paid to capital invested is 23.9 per cent, a fair ratio; in the liquor business the ratio is 5.6 per cent.

It is not much that the laboring man gets out of the millions invested in alcohol. Small, indeed, is the financial harm he would suffer were it taken away.

What of the two billions the country spends a year in drink?

Simply this: Were it spent for food and clothing it would give employment to nearly eight times as many workers, who would receive collectively five and a half times as much in wages.

Another charge against beverage alcohol must now be added—that of economic waste. Over a hundred million bushels of grain and vast quantities of other foodstuffs intended by nature to be used in supporting life are converted into a beverage that corrupts and destroys it. Millions of tons of coal are employed in the processes of distillation and fermentation while human being are suffering for lack of warmth. Thousands of freight cars are required to haul the brew of death while legitimate industries suffer from lack of transportation. Hundreds of thousands of laborers are engaged in the liquor business when they could be contributing to the supply of genuine economic needs. Lumber, glass, all other forms of building material, warehouses, stores, autos, teams, wagons, could all be enlisted in the promotion of some necessary industry instead of an enterprise that answers no proper requirement.

Finally, the constant activity of the liquor interests in the politics of the country is another peril to free institutions. They understand that their business has no inherent constitutional right of existence, that it continues purely by tolerance, and that it may be destroyed by an aroused electorate at any time. They know that the agitation against it will persist as long as humanity is able to protest against the traffic in broken hearts and ruined homes. Therefore self-preservation keeps them always on the alert. They are thoroughly organized for the making and unmaking of men and Congresses and legislatures. There can be no satisfactory solution of legitimate public questions so long as this formidable force measures men by their attitude on liquor and endeavors by the lavish use of money to bring about their success or defeat.

As an illustration of this pernicious activity let me quote various paragraphs from a memorandum furnished a few months ago by the Hon. E. Lowry Humes, United States district attorney, to the court at Pittsburgh, in the case of the United States against the United States Brewers' Association et al.:

In a report to the trustees of the United States Brewers' Association it is said:

"The organization bureau: This department, which is our fighting field force, is financed by a voluntary fund. It has taken an active part during the past two years in State and local campaigns throughout the country. No less than 46 States and Territories have had the personal service of the bureau. The statement with regard to the elections of November 8, 1910, which has gone out to our members, indicates the extent of the recent work. There were 27 State campaigns in which we were interested, and we won substantial victories in all except one of them. Surely this speaks for itself."

* * * * * * *

And again, under the heading "Federal relations," the report says: "Our counsel has guarded our interests in the matter of Federal legislation with most remarkable success. During the last two sessions in Congress over 200 bills adverse to our interest have been introduced, many of which have had the backing of the entire prohibition and temperance organizations in this country. Only one measure affecting our interest has passed Congress in this period, and that went through with our assent. You can readily imagine what this has meant in winning and keeping friends in congressional districts. It is also literally true that Congress has been kept from doubling the tax on beer by our unaided efforts." * * *

* * * * * * *

"In addition to this the labor bureau might be of very great value in our political organization by establishing a permanent working connection with the other labor bodies who make up the American Federation of Labor." * * *

At about this time Mr. Percy Andraea became president of the Interstate Executive Association. One of the representatives of the organization bureau of the United States Brewers' Association said in his report to the head of that bureau in referring to a particular State: "I went over the State more with a view of meeting with the most influential labor men and in securing their support now and in the fight that may come, and I am sure that, if it is necessary, we can muster to our support all the labor men in the State, with one or two exceptions, and they believe they can deliver the union-labor vote."

* * * * * * *

The financial activities of the National Association of Commerce and Labor, in carrying out this comprehensive plan of Mr. Andreae, are most interesting. During the year 1914 the United States Brewers' Association turned over to Mr. Andreae the sum of $330,138. The Wholesale Liquor Dealers' Association paid him $90,000. These items and miscellaneous contributions which he received aggregated in that year $525,116.28. The only activities of Mr. Andreae and his associates were political in nature. They participated extensively in numerous State campaigns concerning themselves and using their funds to influence the election of governors, lieutenant governors, United States Senators, Members of Congress, and members of State legislative bodies. * * *

* * * * * * *

The extent of the operations of the United States Brewers' Association in 1914 reached startling proportions. Because of the alleged destruction of records, the Government has no assurance that it has a complete record of the funds raised and distributed by that association. We do, however, have an absolute record of the collection by the United States Brewers' Association in 1913 of $755,385.18, a considerable portion of which remained in the treasury of the association at the close of its fiscal year. In 1914 we have an absolute record of collections aggregating at least $999,300.88. How much more was collected during that year, of which we have no knowledge because of the destruction of the association records, we can make no estimate. We do know, however, that the bank accounts which we have thus far succeeded in discovering show an aggregate in the neighborhood of a million and a half of dollars. The Pennsylvania State Brewers' Association was one of the associated organizations which constituted the general scheme of the defendant brewing companies and their association to control the political affairs of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania. * * *

* * * * * * *

The defendant companies, through the association, undertook to control the nominations and election of practically every public officer elected within the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania from governor down, including Members of Congress and United States Senators. At a conference called by its representatives in 1914, candidates for legislature and State senate, for Members of Congress, for United States Senator, and for governor were selected, and not only the individual effort but the moneys contributed to this association by the brewing companies who have entered pleas in this case were used to put through the slate thus selected.

As a result of the cases in connection with which the above memorandum was filed the brewer defendants practically pleaded guilty to violations of the Federal corrupt-practices act and paid enormous fines.

That the United States Government helps pay the freight in the political campaigns of the brewers comes out in a statement of United States District Attorney Humes in a brief to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals in re application of Hugh F. Fox, secretary of the United States Brewers' Association, for writ of habeas corpus, 1916. Mr. Humes says:

The Government had information that brewery corporations for many years past had been making illegal money contributions in connection with national elections, and also, in order to cover up their crimes, had been deducting from their tax returns sums equivalent to the amounts thus criminally expended in connection with elections, thereby adding crime to crime and cheating the Government out of a large amount of revenue.

The Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Crowley v. Christenson (137 U. S., 86) has the following to say regarding the liquor traffic:

By the general concurrence of opinion of every civilized and Christian community there are few sources of crime and misery to society equal to the dramshop, where intoxicating liquors in small quantities, to be drunk at the time, are sold indiscriminately to all parties applying. The statistics of every State show a greater amount of crime and misery attributable to the use of ardent spirits obtained at these retail liquor saloons than to any other source. * * * There is no inherent right in a citizen to sell intoxicating liquors by retail. It is not a privilege of a citizen of the State or of a citzen of the United States.

That the trade in a poison like alcohol should have reached the proportions it has assumed in the United States, and that its promoters should have acquired the influence they possess is a matter no less of amazement than of humiliation. It is a menace to the Nation's health, the Nation's morals, the Nation's efficiency, and it is a stain on the Nation's name.

Is it not time that the Federal Government, the largest social unit we have, should take a hand when the traffic in a poisonous drug is taking from the earnings of the American people six times as much as they expend for bread, ten times as much as they expend for furniture, twice as much as they expend for clothing? The Federal Government has already established nation-wide prohibition as to other narcotic drugs through the Harrison law, prescribing the minutest regulations as to its sale for medicinal purposes, punishing violations with rigorous and effective penalties.

Prohibition by State or local option now prevails in an area equal to two-thirds of the United States, and that area contains more than half of the American people. Millions of American people have petitioned Congress to submit an amendment to the Federal Constitution destroying the liquor traffic in every part of the Nation. It has obtained such a hold on some of the larger States that it can never be ousted from this Republic by State action alone. No State has the right to harbor a traffic which is a menace and a disgrace to the Republic. For that matter, neither the Federal Government nor any State may claim the right to license a wrong. In Stone v. Mississippi (101 U. S., 816), the United States Supreme Court uses this language:

No legislature can bargain away the public health or the public morals. The people themselves can not do it, much less their servants. * * * Government is organized with a view to their preservation and can not divest itself of the power to provide for them.

The pending amendment, therefore, violates the rights of neither State nor Federal Government. It deprives both of the power to authorize an immoral, unhealthful, corrupting, and dangerous traffic, and leaves both with an equal power to destroy it. It is a declaration of truth and right and duty for Nation and for State. Such are the facts which call for joint national and State action against the liquor traffic and justify at least the consideration of the necessary means to such an end in the manner provided by the Federal Constitution for its amendment.

If the liquor traffic is to be eradicated, the aid of the Federal Government must be invoked. I believe in fighting it in every political division from precinct to Nation, but I realize that its roots are in the Capitol at Washington. The partnership between the liquor traffic and the Federal Government is one of the most frightful heritages of the Civil War. In order to obtain revenue in that national crisis the Federal Government assumed jurisdiction over the liquor traffic for purposes of taxation, and has shared in its proceeds ever since. It now receives about two hundred and thirty million tear-stained dollars a year in revenue from this traffic, and thus reaps a sinister harvest from the chief agency of despair and ruin within its borders. In order to make sure of its shameful toll it keeps its hand on the deadly stuff from the still to the bar and no State can take it off. No citizen can make an ounce of liquor without the permission and supervision of the Federal Government, although his pockets may be bulging with licenses from his State authorizing him to do so. A citizen with a State license alone attempting to manufacture liquor within the State granting the license would be put in a Federal jail, and if a State officer should interfere to protect that citizen in the exercise of the authority conferred by the State, he would be jailed also. The Federal Government already prohibits the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors anywhere in the country except on its own terms, and has thus instituted nation-wide prohibition to that extent. The Federal Government taxes the manufacture of stills, and no still can be set up for the purpose of distilling without its consent. Every still must be registered with the Federal Government, whether intended to be used or not, and no matter for what purpose it is to be used. Every person desiring to become a distiller, or to continue as a distiller after the 1st of May of each year, must give a notice to the Federal Government containing a minute description of his business, machinery, and premises. The Federal Government may confiscate the land on which a distillery is situated for unpaid liquor taxes, regardless of what taxes that land may owe the State. The Federal Government requires the furnace of every still to be so constructed that a Government lock may be successfully attached; that there shall be painted on the fermenting tubs their numbers and cubic contents in gallons in oil colors and in figures not less than 3 inches in length and 2½ inches in breadth; that cisterns of a certain capacity shall be constructed in a room so built that no person can enter it in the absence of the Government gauger; that office accommodations shall be provided for Government officials who weigh out the mash and supervise every stage of distillation.

The Federal Government requires every distillery and wholesale liquor dealer to keep a conspicuous sign on the outside of the establishment with letters not less than 3 inches in length, painted in oil or gilded, containing name and business, under penalty of $500 for not doing so. The Federal Government limits the height of the fences that may be placed around distilleries and requires distillers to furnish revenue collectors with as many keys to gates and doors of distilleries as they may demand, and to keep the distilleries always accessible to officers with such keys. The Federal Government requires every distiller at his own expense to provide a warehouse for the storage of distilled spirits, which is to be under the direction and control of the Government revenue collector and in charge of a Government storekeeper, with no locks on its doors but Government locks, which are at all times in the possession of the storekeeper. Neither the distiller nor anyone else may enter except in the presence of the storekeeper. No liquor may be taken from the warehouse except by permission of the Federal Government. Distillers must keep books in the form and manner prescribed by the Federal Government. The Federal Government prescribes the hours of fermentation and requires all locks and seals in a distillery to be procured by Government officials and placed wherever they may deem necessary. The Federal Government prohibits rectifiers, wholesale or retail liquor dealers to purchase or receive distilled spirits in quantities exceeding 20 gallons from any person not authorized by it to distill, rectify, or sell at wholesale, except at judicial sales or sales by an authorized auctioneer; it prescribes the books to be kept by rectifiers and wholesalers and permits no retail dealer to sell in quantities of more than 5 gallons. The Federal Government forbids the distillation of alcoholic spirits except in a distillery it has authorized or the use of the said spirits unless produced in such distillery on penalty of fine or imprisonment. Similar Federal regulations exist as to the brewing of malt liquors, although they are not quite so elaborate.

And yet with the Federal Government exercising this minute and rigid control of the liquor traffic at every step, we are gravely told that the States through their police powers have exclusive control of the production and sale of liquor and that nation-wide prohibition deprives the States of such function. Where are those police powers to-day, in so far as the liquor trade is affected, when a State can not enable its citizens to make or sell liquor unless he first secures permission from the Federal Government and can not interfere with the extensive jurisdiction now held by the Federal Government over the traffic? If a State should attempt to go into the liquor business itself, it would have to pay a tax to the Federal Government. This was settled in a case before the Federal Supreme Court involving the status of the South Carolina dispensary system. What nation widers want is to stop this superior control by the Federal Government and compel it to join with the States in eradication of the liquor traffic on equal terms. The elaborate supervision of the liquor traffic by the Federal Government, of which I have given only a few illustrations, requires a larger and more complex Federal machinery than absolute prohibition could possibly require.

The nation-wide amendment puts the States in a far more dignified position in regard to the liquor traffic than that they now occupy. At present the power of the States to authorize, control, and regulate is secondary to that of the Federal Government. The nation-wide amendment clothes the Federal Government with a jurisdiction and power to prohibit and does not in any way deprive the State of an equal power of prohibition which they already exercise within their respective borders. It deprives both the Federal Government and the States of the power to authorize the liquor traffic, treating the Nation and the States absolutely alike. The amendment reads as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following amendment to the Constitution be, and hereby is, proposed to the States, to become valid as a part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of the several States as provided by the Constitution:

"ARTICLE —.

"SECTION 1. The manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into, or the exportation thereof from the United States and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof for beverage purposes is hereby prohibited.

"SEC. 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation * * *."

But they say that under our Constitution no State should be deprived against its consent of power to authorize the liquor traffic. I say that such a statement is contrary to the language and the spirit of the Constitution. When the States met in convention at Philadelphia in 1787 to frame the present Constitution the question arose as to how it should be amended if at any subsequent time any change should be demanded by the public welfare. A provision was submitted to the effect that the Constitution might be amended by a vote of three-fourths of the States. A motion was made to strike out the words "of three-fourths," so that the consent of all the States would be required. Every Southern State voted "No" on this motion, namely, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia, the only northern State voting with them being Pennsylvania. The three States voting for the motion were Massachusetts, Connecticut, and New Jersey. To make the issue clearer a motion was then made that no State should, without its consent, be affected in its internal police or deprived of its equal representation in the Senate, and every Southern State, except Delaware, voted "No." Later a provision that no State should, without its consent, be deprived of equal suffrage in the Senate was added to the amending clause. Thus by the votes of Southern States the power to amend the Federal Constitution was vested in three-fourths of the States, the only exception being the matter of equal representation in the United States Senate.

In his famous reply to Webster in the United States Senate on February 26, 1833, John C. Calhoun, the greatest exponent and defender of State rights in American history, said in regard to the action of the States in framing the Constitution:

In this compact they have stipulated, among other things, that it may be amended by three-fourths of the States; that is, they have conceded to each other by compact the right to add new powers or to subtract old by the consent of that proportion of the States without requiring, as would have been otherwise the case, the consent of all—a modification no more inconsistent with their sovereignty than any other contained in the compact.

In his notable work on Government, written shortly before his death, he explained at length and with characteristic clearness why three-fourths of the States had the right under the Constitution to bind all the States. He said that it was as necessary to guard against too much facility as too much difficulty in amending it, that "if to require the consent of all the States for that purpose would be in effect to prevent amendments which time should disclose to be, or change of circumstances make necessary, so, on the other hand, to require a bare majority only, or but a small number in proportion to the whole, would expose the Constitution to hasty, inconsiderate, and even sinister amendments on the part of the party dominant for the time"; that the proportion of three-fourths was sufficiently large to prevent the dominant portion of the Union or combination of the States from opposing the weaker portion of the Union or a majority of the States. Nothing can be clearer, therefore, than that the expressions "State rights" and "State sovereignty" mean under our Constitution no such thing as the right of one State or any number of States not exceeding three-fourths to oppose the will of the remainder of the States in the matter of amending the Constitution, except only as to equal representation in the Senate. If it is wrong for one State to say what another State shall do, then it was wrong to have adopted the amendment to the Federal Constitution providing a Federal income tax. Two States rejected it, namely, Connecticut and Rhode Island. It was imposed on them without their consent. One of the highest forms of State rights under the Constitution is the right of the States, acting through three-fourths of their number, to change, add to, or take from the powers and functions of the Federal Government, or to pass upon the advisability of so doing. If, when the States pass upon the prohibition amendment, three-fourths can not be found to favor it, their constitutional function will have been exercised, and their action will be final until proper time arrives for another trial. Until, however, they are permitted to judge its merits, they will have been deprived of one of their most fundamental capacities.

Permit me now to say that not only did the Southern States in the convention that created our present system vote solidly for the right of three-fourths of the States to amend the Constitution, but also that all the 11 Southern States that seceded from the Union and for four years yielded up their blood and treasure in defense of their conception of State rights, gave majorities in the National House of Representatives for the submission of the nation-wide prohibition amendment with only the two exceptions of Louisiana and Texas. South Carolina, the first State to secede, the very cradle of State rights, voted solidly to submit the amendment. Arkansas and Tennessee, where southern ideals are worshipped with a devotion unsurpassed, did likewise. Virginia, State of Washington and Jefferson, Madison and Monroe, Jackson and Lee, stood 8 for to only 2 against. North Carolina, the State claiming to have been first at Bethel, farthest at Gettysburg, and last at Appomattox, stood 7 for to 2 against, with 1 not voting and unpaired. Mississippi, the State of Jefferson Davis, stood 7 for to but 1 against. Georgia, State of Alexander H. Stephens and John B. Gordon, stood 8 for to 2 against, with 1 not voting and unpaired. Alabama, State of Pelham and Semmes, was equally divided. Florida, as deeply attached to southern traditions as any other State, stood 3 for, with 1 not voting and unpaired. Texas, with seven-eighths of its territory under prohibition, stood only 4 for to 13 against, with 1 not voting and unpaired. A different story will be told as to Texas, however, when the vote is taken in the House again. It is true that the Texas State Democratic convention in 1916 declared against nation-wide prohibition, but the question had not figured in the primaries and the people had given no instructions. We have in Texas an election law providing for instructions on public questions by the voters at primaries to convention delegates. In Texas 180 counties are totally dry, 22 counties wholly wet, 49 counties partially dry. In the 251 Texas counties there are 2,002 post offices in dry territory and 528 in wet territory.

Having vested the power of amending the Constitution in three-fourths of their number, the States provided that Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses should deem it necessary, should propose amendments, meaning, of course, whenever two-thirds of Congress should deem proposal necessary. The States would have no more delegated the amending power, or any substantial part thereof, to the Federal Government—that is, to Congress—than they would have delegated to it the right to make the Constitution in the first instance. By reserving to themselves the unqualified and exclusive right of amendment they kept intact their sovereign capacity in so far as the organic law of the Nation was concerned. The Member of Congress who will not vote for the submission of a constitutional amendment to the decision of the States, where it belongs, unless he personally believes it should become a part of the Constitution usurps the function of the States, arrogates to himself and the Federal Government a prerogative that belongs to the States and violates the very essence of their sovereignty. Furthermore, over 12,000,000 of the American people have petitioned Congress to submit the prohibition amendment to the States. In refusing these people the right to appeal to the only tribunal having the power of amendment, the tribunal of the States, for the redress of what they consider one of the most terrible grievances in the Republic, Congress would deny to them one of the most sacred of all popular rights—the right of petition. Were I opposed on principle to nation-wide prohibition, I would vote to submit the amendment to the States in order that they might exercise one of their fundamental rights. An issue is thus presented by the nation-wide amendment entirely independent of prohibition, and that issue is expressed in two questions:

(1) Shall Senators and Representatives in Congress, either wholly or partly, substitute themselves for the States as the amending power of the Constitution, thereby centralizing sovereignty at Washington to a degree threatening the extinction of the State?

(2) Shall they refuse the people the right of petition?

Senator George, of Mississippi, a vigorous and outspoken antiprohibitionist, was a member of the Senate Committee on Education and Labor, to which was referred a national prohibition amendment some 40 years ago. He joined in a favorable report for its submission on the ground that to do otherwise would be to deny to millions of people the right of petition. Let me quote from that report, which was signed by both antiprohibitionists and prohibitionists:

It is proper to say that there are members of the committee who concur in the report recommending the submission of the proposed amendment to the States who do not, by such action, indicate their approval of the adoption of the amendment as a part of the Constitution, nor that they would themselves advocate its ratification by the legislatures of the States; but in deference to the immense mass of petitions for this amendment of the organic law, coming from the people in all parts of the country, and believing that an opportunity should be given to them to be heard upon the merits of their cause in the forum of the States, where alone it can be heard and decided, the majority of the committee would deem a refusal to submit the proposed amendment to the State for consideration analogous to the denial of the right of a party to be heard in court upon a question of private right. The method provided in the Constitution for its own peaceful amendment would be destroyed by failure to submit the proposition for amendment in cases of grave moment involving the approval and prayers of multitudes of the people, for where the remedy sought is admitted to be without the jurisdiction of the fundamental law, the petition is really addressed to the only tribunal which can enlarge that jurisdiction—that is to say, to the States themselves. Should, then, Congress in such case refuse to submit the proposal to the States, such refusal would constitute a substantial denial of the right of petition itself.

The changes in the National Constitution, made indispensable by the development of the Nation, can only be peacefully accomplished by a judicious and liberal exercise of the power of Congress to propose amendments to the States upon the petition of those who desire to be heard in the great court of the people exercising their sovereignty through the States, as in the formation of the Constitution.

It is well known that but for the belief in the conventions of the States that the opportunity to amend the Constitution would be most liberally afforded by Congress in accordance with the forms provided in that instrument, the original ratification never would have been obtained.

While the committee would by no means justify the submission of trifling or uncalled-for propositions for the consideration of the States, yet they firmly believe that the perpetuity and peace of the country under the forms of constitutional government demand that there be no captious or arbitrary denial of the right of petition for the amendment of the fundamental law through the forms of Congressional submission to the tribunal of the people in the States.

The issues involved in the submission of the amendment are by no means similar to the constitutional issues of the American Civil War. At no time during the controversies leading to that conflict was the right or power to abolish slavery through an amendment to the Constitution, submitted and considered in the manner provided therein, questioned either at the South or at the North. The Southern States seceded because they believed that guaranties already embodied in the Constitution were being nullified and could no longer be preserved within the Union. The Northern States believed that the South should have fought out its problems inside the Union, and that secession at any time should be forcibly prevented. It is entirely probable that if there had been an easier way of amending the Constitution, the slavery question might have been submitted and settled long before the terrible tragedy of the Civil War.

At the close of this debate we will have an opportunity to enable the States to exercise their highest function—the right to shape, alter, and develop the Federal Constitution. They are the proper tribunal to decide the fate of this amendment. They compose the mightiest array of free Commonwealths united in a federated whole the world has ever seen. There are chapters in the history of each that add honor to American citizenship. If there is anything in the amendment subversive of their liberties and their welfare, they can be trusted to condemn it. Let not Congress assume to judge for them. Let Congress discharge its preliminary task of submission and stand aside. Let it put in motion the referendum provided by the Nation's organic law—the method of amendment the States themselves established when they created the Constitution. Let the States perform the duty which remains the sole instance of their sovereignty over the Federal Government itself. If the State and Nation may each retain the attributes contemplated in the Constitution, if each shall be kept within its sphere and permitted to perform its appointed agency—the most beneficent system of government yet devised will be strengthened and glorified for all time.

As I view the matter, the member of either branch of the American Congress who denies the power of amendment to the States, especially an amendment which vast numbers of the people desire the States to consider, violates the basic principles both of the Constitution and of popular government, repudiates the fundamental rights of the States and overturns the two most sacred privileges the people possess, the privileges of referendum and of petition.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, before the Senator from Texas takes his seat I should like to ask him a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POINDEXTER in the chair). Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I do.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Before I ask the question, I want to congratulate the Senator upon the powerful speech which he has just delivered.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I thank the Senator.

Mr. SHAFROTH. What I desire to say, however, is that I notice the Senator has collated a great many statistics relative to the pernicious effect of alcohol upon the human system. I some time ago heard, but I can not recall exactly where, that the War College of the United States had estimated the number of persons who had been killed in battle from the birth of Christ until about 1910, and I saw the further statement somewhere to the effect that the use of alcohol had killed five times as many men in one year as had been killed in battle in that long period of time. I should like to ask the Senator whether he has investigated that subject, and whether he can give to the Senate light upon the verity of those figures?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I have heard of the statement to which the Senator refers, but I have never seen the original.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Has the Senator any statement in regard to the number of people who are killed each year in the United States by the use of alcohol?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I have not; but that phase of the subject has been thoroughly discussed in speeches of Mr. Hobson in the House of Representatives and on the lecture platform. I think he gave the figures to which the Senator from Colorado refers, as well as the authority for them.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, the questions involved in the consideration of the pending resolution, to establish the prohibition of the manufacture and sale of alcoholic beverages in the United States, involves the fundamental principles of our Government and reaches far beyond the question as to whether the ideals of the temperance advocate can be obtained by statutory enactment or constitutional restrictions.

It is difficult to approach the consideration of the question in a judicial way, because the prejudice that surrounds the subject makes it almost impossible to fully and fairly discuss it without having your motives misconstrued by those who have already attained a finality of judgment.

In the discussion of the question many unfair and unjust statements have been made without warrant of fact to sustain them, and fundamental principles that involve the life of the Nation are swept aside "as mere scraps of paper" in the mad rush to establish high moral life for men and women by the law's enactment.

If the lives of men could be saved and the souls of men could be redeemed by governmental action the world would not have waited 2,000 years to find it out, but there are undoubtedly governmental restrictions that lessen immorality.

The extreme advocate, from the beginning of time, has always been prepared to use the sword to force other men to accept his views of moral questions, regardless of the momentous consequences that may follow his action to the people he desires to serve.

The statesman can only attain the ends of good government by laying aside passion and prejudice, with the realization that the accomplishment of high ideals must come through an enlightened public sentiment, carrying with it the acquiescence of the people in the laws that are written for their government.

If there is general assent among all good people to the ultimate object that the prohibition advocate desires to accomplish there is pronounced dissent from the people of many States in the Union as to the ways and means of achieving it, but it would be unjust to hold the mass of prohibitionists accountable for the extreme position of their leaders.

The criticism of personal motives will accomplish nothing for good. We can try this case only on what will probably be the inexorable consequences that will result from the passage of the pending resolution.

It has been said by another that—

In the comfortable glow of reform people are apt to forget that in combating oppression by an overreaching traffic it is possible to invite another species of tyranny more inimical to government because it is subtler, less tangible, and more enduring in its effect—the tyranny of political and social coercion exercised in the name of public morals. The use of force to obtain a "sanctified" end is as ancient as history, soiling the pages of Christianity itself. The prohibition propaganda merely illustrates a phase of such coercion, and the application of methods that are more dangerous because of their apparent innocence. A slight reflection on our theory of government should make this clear.

The sound and underlying theory of democracy "that a just form of government requires the consent of the governed" is often subject to perversion. President Hadley, of Yale University, in his Standards of Public Morality, says:

Not content with saying that all just government is based on the consent of the governed, the enthusiastic advocates of democracy hold that if you could only find what a majority of the governed wanted you could easily incorporate it into law. Never was there a greater practical error. Public law, to be effective, requires much more than the majority to support it. It requires general acquiescence. To leave the minority at the mercy of the whims of the majority does not conduce to law or good government or justice between man and man. Even Rousseau, the leading apostle of modern democracy, saw this most clearly. He said in substance: "A majority of the people is not the people and never can be. We take a majority vote simply as the best available means of ascertaining the real wishes of the people in cases when it becomes necessary to do so."

Mr. President, political principles such as I have just read, although elementary in their nature, are often brushed aside by those who advocate sumptuary legislation. It does not forgive the error of government to be able to command majorities in legislative bodies when a vast number of people stand in opposition to statutes which they feel and believe trench on their personal rights and endanger their personal liberty.

The great difficulty in the past in enforcing prohibition laws in many communities has been due to the fact that the laws were not in accord with the sentiments of the people who were compelled to live under them. Enact a law by insecure majorities in any State in the Union and its fate is fore-doomed in advance. Let the law represent the enlightened and universal sentiments of the community and its enforcement will take care of itself. How often has an obnoxious law, ill-advisedly written by legislatures, become a dead letter, and its nonenforcement publicly advocated, bringing the entire body of law into disrespect and disrepute.

Real temperance has made great advances in the United States through laws allowing local communities the privilege of determining for themselves whether sumptuary rules should be adopted for the government of the liquor trade, where the sentiment of the community has been behind the law. In such cases the law has been effective and accomplished good results, but almost universally where laws of this kind have been forced upon an unwilling people the result has been disastrous, and no real good has been born of the legislation.

Let us analyze the purpose of the pending resolution. It proposes to submit not to the people but to the legislatures of 48 States the ratification of a constitutional amendment that will give the Federal Government, and not the State governments, control over police regulations relating to the manufacture and sale of alcoholic liquors used for beverage purposes. The adoption of this amendment will undoubtedly be favorable to the sentiment of the people in some of the States. It is equally sure that it will be contrary to the sentiment of the people in a number of other States.

In the latter case it will be necessary to enforce obnoxious police regulations upon an unwilling people. The amendment may be adopted without the consent of the States representing a majority of the population in the Union. It will require three-fourths of the 48 States to secure its ratification. There are 12 States that could not prevent the ratification of this amendment if it were agreed to by the other 36. They are Massachusetts, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Michigan, Missouri, Illinois, Kentucky, Tennessee, and California, that under the census of 1910 had a population of 50,556,065 out of a total, as given by that census, of 91,972,266. These 12 States have 238 Congressmen in the House of Representatives and the other 36 States have only 197. If this amendment is adopted, it may be ratified without the consent of the States I have just named. The result of its adoption would be to in part destroy the principle of local self-government that our people have cherished and protected since the beginning of the Government. It would take away in part the State sovereignty from the States. It would have a tendency to centralize our Government under a police autocracy such as exists in Germany and Austria-Hungary. It would entrench national authority and weaken the sovereignty of the people in the several States. It would disregard entirely the habits of life, circumstances, and conditions that surround the inhabitants of the different States.

I see no reason myself why we can not now trust, as we have in the past, the enlightened electorate of each State to pass the necessary laws for the domestic control of their own people. I see no reason why the people of Alabama or New York should be haled before judges appointed by the President of the United States instead of being tried by magistrates of their own choosing. I see no reason why it should be necessary to establish any army of United States deputy marshals to enforce the law in the Federal courts that can be as satisfactorily enforced in the State courts if the people of the several States are in favor of it.

If the Federal Government is once called on to enter the field, apprehend, and punish the petty vices of the citizens of the States in respect to the matters authorized by this resolution, it will not be long before efforts will be made to further extend the police powers of the Federal Government and result in destroying State boundaries and the abolition of State governments.

When that time comes we will have abandoned the great principle that enables 100,000,000 people of divergent views, dissimilar modes of life, different political, climatic, and industrial surroundings to live in harmony in one great Republic.

We will have broken down the principle of local self-government. A national force bill providing for the supervision of State elections by United States marshals was at one time proposed in the Congress of the United States. The theory of this bill and the one now under consideration are identical. It was an attempt on the part of the Federal Government to interfere with the sovereign power of the States, and was repudiated by the unanimous sentiment of the constituency that I have the honor in part to represent.

Let me call to your attention what was said on this subject by the foremost democrat of his day. Gen. Andrew Jackson said:

> In the domestic policy of this Government there are two objects which especially deserve the attention of the people and their representatives, and which have been and will continue to be the subjects of my increasing solicitude. They are the preservation of the rights of the several States and the integrity of the Union.
>
> These great objects are necessarily connected, and can only be attained by an enlightened exercise of the powers of each within its appropriate sphere in conformity with the public will constitutionally expressed. To this end it becomes the duty of all to yield a ready and patriotic submission to the laws constitutionally enacted, and thereby promote and strengthen a proper confidence in those institutions of the several States and of the United States which the people themselves have ordained for their own government.
> My experience in public concerns and the observation of a life somewhat advanced confirm the opinion long since imbibed by me that the destruction of our State governments or the annihilation of their control over the local concerns of the people would lead directly to revolution and anarchy and finally to despotism and military domination. In proportion, therefore, as a general government encroaches upon the rights of the States, in the same proportion does it impair its own power and detract from its ability to fulfill the purposes of its creation.

In my humble judgment, no man has ever lived within the confines of this Republic who has had a clearer conception of the great principles of democracy and the right of a free people to govern themselves than did the author of the Declaration of Independence.

Bearing on the subject before us, Thomas Jefferson said:

> Our country is too large to have all its affairs directed by a single government. Public servants at such a distance and from under the eyes of their constituents must from the circumstance of distance be unable to administer and overlook all the details necessary for the good government of the citizens, and the same circumstance, by rendering detection impossible to their constituents, will invite the public agents to corruption, plunder, and waste.
>
> It is not by the consolidation of centralization of powers but by their distribution that good government is effected. Were not this great country already divided into States, that division must be made that each might do for itself what concerns itself directly and what it can so much better do than a distant authority.
> When all government, domestic and foreign, in little as in great things, shall be drawn to Washington as the center of all power, it will render powerless the checks provided of one government on another and will become as venal and oppressive as the government from which we separated.

I do not believe there is such threatened danger from intemperance that it is necessary for us to take from our States their control over local affairs and lodge the power with the Government in Washington. Such principles up to this time have never been entertained by the great men who have presided over the destinies of the Nation.

President Wilson expressed himself clearly and forcefully on the subject some years ago when he said:

> I am in favor of local option. I am a thorough believer in local self-government, and believe that every self-governing community which constitutes a social unit should have the right to control the matter of the regulation or withholding of licenses. But the questions involved are social and moral, and are not susceptible of being made parts of a party program. Whenever they have been made the subject matter of party contests they have cut the lines of party organization and party action athwart to the utter confusion of political action in every other field. They have thrown every other question, however important, into the background, and have made constructive party action impossible for long years together.

If the people of my State desire to prohibit the manufacture and sale of alcoholic beverages within the confines of the State, it is their right and privilege to do so, but I can see no reason why they should desire to invade the lives and homes of the people of a sister State and force upon them a law that they are as yet unwilling to accept.

The people of the State of Colorado may have a very firm conviction that all the inhabitants of their State over the age of 21 years, male or female, white or black, should have an equal right to exercise the right of franchise and vote at all elections. If that system of government has proven satisfactory to the people of Colorado, no one can complain that their laws have the breadth and scope that they now have. On the other hand, if the people of Alabama believe that a somewhat restricted suffrage guards their civilization, protects their homes, and establishes a safer and sounder government, should they be compelled to change their present ideas as to their local government because they are not satisfactory to the people in other States?

There are some who would have us believe that no one is concerned about this matter except the prohibitionist on the one hand and the people who make money out of the liquor trade on the other. Such an assumption is not only untrue but is so monstrously false that it is amazing that men can be found to discuss the question solely from that standpoint.

The contention that the Members of Congress should abandon their individual responsibility on this subject under the idea that they can shift that responsibility to the shoulders of the people in the several States is so subversive of the spirit of representative government in relation to the most solemn responsibility that the Constitution itself places upon the Members of this body that it is difficult for my mind to grasp the viewpoint of those who believe they have the right to abandon their personal and representative responsibility to the legislatures of States which may or may not voice the sentiments of their constituencies.

The police power is inherent in the States. It was reserved to them when the Constitution of the United States was adopted and is necessary to their existence as organized governments.

I do not see how it can be maintained in its sovereign integrity when it is proposed to abandon it in part. It can not be contended that there is an excuse for the adoption of this amendment, because the laws of the Federal Government prevent the States from exercising full and complete control over the question of prohibition of the manufacture and sale of alcoholic beverages in the several States.

The Congress of the United States has passed every law that the most extreme prohibition advocate has demanded to enable the States to enforce their laws at home.

We not only have a Federal Statute that prohibits the shipment of alcoholic beverages into dry States, but we have a recent enactment of the Federal Congress that under severe pains and penalties prohibits the shipment of liquor into States where its sale is prohibited, even where the State statute did not prevent the citizens of the State from obtaining a limited quantity of beverage alcohol from States where the manufacture and sale was not inhibited.

In my judgment, it is the part of wisdom to leave this question solely for the determination of the States. The cause of temperance can and will be satisfactorily regulated and advanced in this way. The injection of the national police power into the homes of the people will undoubtedly lead to an oppression of our people and the overthrow of the principles of government in which we believe.

I therefore can not support the amendment. I am not prepared to place the consciences of the people in matters moral and religious in the keeping of Government officials. A free people will be no longer able to exist if their personal affairs must be governed by an army of Federal spies.

Mr. President, I am willing to trust the people of Alabama to live moral and righteous lives. I am confident that they will place on the statute books of their own State all laws necessary to protect their homes against intemperance and immorality. I do not believe for one moment it is necessary for the Federal Government to inject itself into the police jurisdiction of the State of Alabama for the improvement or the moral upbuilding of the people of my State, and I am not willing to reflect on the peoples of other States by assuming that they are not equally as capable and willing to maintain honest laws, just conditions, and temperate surroundings as are the people who constitute my own constituency.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I will occupy the time of the Senate for a brief period and will discuss not only this proposed amendment but also the polity of the American system with respect to constitutional amendments.

I believe I can truly say that the distinguished junior Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] has given to us an example of statesmanship of a high order. He has pressed this great reform—national prohibition—sedately and wisely, and it is pleasing to all who desire to see this amendment submitted to the States that the labor has been done without heat, without malice, and in a way that challenges, and I believe ought to challenge, the admiration of all persons, whatever position they may take and from whatever angle they may view the amendment.

I expect, of course, to vote for the amendment.

I did not hear all of the speech of the distinguished Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. It is my loss, because I know he always speaks interestingly and is well informed upon any subject upon which he speaks; but there is one point to which I wish to advert with reference to the Senator's very able speech, namely:

This proposed amendment is not an attempt to force upon a State something it does not want. It is, and only is, a great referendum giving the various States an opportunity to say, in the manner prescribed by the Constitution, whether or not they wish this particular change in organic fundamental law.

Only a short time since some of the wisest and most profound citizens of this Republic believed that by reason of the complicated procedure and large majorities required it was difficult, if not impossible, to amend the Constitution of the United States, and some eminent statesmen even urged that strained constructions should be placed upon the Constitution so as to change somewhat the structure of our political system, bring it into conformity with the dynamic conditions of the day, and thus secure needful reforms.

But, contrary to the opinion which a few years since prevailed among many thinking people, within the past four years two amendments to the Constitution of the United States have been proclaimed.

The framers of the Constitution were not sanguine enough to suppose that the organic law which they framed was so perfect that it would never be altered. The experience under the Articles of Confederation had produced the belief that there was need of a system of amendment by which the Constitution could be made to conform to the requirements of future times.

The idea that some provision should be made in the instrument of government itself for the method of its amendment is peculiarly American. Provision for the regular and orderly amendment of an instrument of government first appears in the Pennsylvania frame of government of 1683. A similar provision reappears in the act of settlement of 1683, in the Pennsylvania frame of 1696, and in the Pennsylvania charter of privileges of 1701. Each of these documents provides that it shall not be altered, changed, or diminished "without the consent of the governor" "and six parts of seven of the assembly."

It is difficult to avoid the conclusion that it was the expectation of the members of the Federal Convention that a frequent use of the amending power would be exercised. They doubtless thought that the plan adopted would secure the desired end whenever the popular will would justify a change.

When our Federal Constitution was written in 1787 two methods of amending it were provided; and, unless I am mistaken, it was the first written Constitution in history which provides for two methods of amendment.

I am in favor of this proposed amendment and believe it will be ratified by the requisite number of States if submitted, and believe it will be ratified at an early date. The Senate must pardon me if I indulge in the discussion of a matter which may not seem to be at all relevant to this question, but which is in truth a very important question in discussing constitutional amendments.

It seems to me some provision ought to be proposed, not only to this amendment but to all other proposed amendments, limiting the time within which a submitted constitutional amendment could be adopted or ratified by a State; and I think we ought to begin, as a part and a parcel of our great civil and constitutional polity, to set a time within which constitutional amendments may be or may not be ratified. Mr. President, it is startling to investigate and then reflect for a moment as to the abuses that have come and that may in the future come by a failure or a refusal to set a time within which an amendment may be adopted. I am delighted now to see that I have the attention of the Senators, and especially the distinguished Senator who presides temporarily [Mr. JONES of Washington], because he has been a great leader for this reform, and his temperateness and his sanity in this reform reflects credit upon him.

On September 15, 1789, 12 constitutional amendments were presented by the first Congress to the various States for their adoption or their ratification. I ask leave to incorporate the first thereof in the RECORD at this point without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of Washington in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

ARTICLE 1. After the first enumeration required by the first article of the Constitution there shall be one Representative for every 30,000 until the number shall amount to 100, after which the proportion shall be so regulated by Congress that there shall be not less than 100 Representatives, nor less than one Representative for every 40,000 persons, until the number of Representatives shall amount to 200, after which the proportion shall be so regulated by Congress that there shall not be less than 200 Representatives, nor more than one Representative for every 50,000 persons.

Mr. ASHURST. The first two amendments were not adopted. No. 1 failed by one State to secure ratification. The second amendment then proposed—and I will read it—was:

ART. 2. No law varying the compensation for the services of the Senators and Representatives shall take effect, until an election of Representatives shall have intervened.

That was known as amendment No. 2. The other 10, numbered from 3 to 12, inclusive, became a part of our governmental system and a part of our Constitution, and they may be found on page 97 of the First Statutes. Opposite amendments Nos. 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, and 12 is marked by the early printers the word "Adopted"; "Adopted"; and so forth; but after the first two that were proposed to the Constitution there is a blank, indicating to us, of course, that those two amendments are still pending. They are before the American people now and have been for 128 years, and are subject to ratification or rejection by the States. And now, Mr. President, after those two proposed amendments, to wit, Nos. 1 and 2, had been in nubibus, "in the clouds," for 84 years, the State Senate of the State of Ohio in 1873 resurrected amendment No. 2, that was proposed in 1789, and passed a resolution of ratification through the Senate of the State of Ohio. It would seem to me that a period of 128 years or 84 years within which a State may act is altogether too long, and I am prepared to and will support an amendment limiting the time in the case of this amendment or any other amendment to 10, 12, 14, 16, 18, or even 20 years, so that we will not hand down to posterity a conglomerate mass of amendments floating around in a cloudy, nebulous, hazy way, which a State here may resurrect and ratify and a State there may galvanize and ratify. I believe that we ought to have a homogeneous, constant, united exertion and certainly a contemporaneous action with reference to these various proposed amendments.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I am very much interested in the historical account which the Senator from Arizona is giving us; but I should like to suggest to him that it does not seem to me to be fair to attach to any particular amendment such a provision. That ought to be, I should think, an independent, separate amendment, and become part of our Constitution, so that it would apply to all amendments. I agree with the Senator that there ought to be some limitation.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator is entirely correct about that; and while I would probably vote for an amendment limiting the time within which this amendment may be adopted, provided the time is reasonably long, I do believe that a general amendment to the Constitution should be adopted limiting the time on all amendments, especially when we remember that Congress is in session every year, and can resubmit the same amendment again and again at any time it pleases.

Mr. President, I have pointed out two amendments, floating around about us for 128 years, and have stated that one of them, after having reposed for 84 years by reason of a great burst of indignation that swept over the land regarding the "back-salary grab" in 1873, was picked up by the State of Ohio, through its State senate, and passed through the Ohio Senate.

There is yet another reason why I think a reasonable time limit should be set:

When the 12 amendments were submitted in 1789, when there were only 13 States, Vermont had not yet been admitted, if I remember correctly. Should three-fourths of the States then in the Union, or three-fourths of those now in the Union, be the test as to what shall be the number required for ratification?

In 1810 the following amendment was proposed to the Constitution of the United States by a joint resolution of both Houses of Congress, and that joint resolution was submitted to the States under one of the most interesting and peculiar set of auspices that ever came before a legislative body. The proposed amendment was passed by the two Houses of Congress on May 1, 1810, and it read:

> If any citizen of the United States shall accept, claim, receive, or retain any title of nobility or honor, or shall, without the consent of Congress, accept and retain any present, pension, office, or emolument of any kind whatever, from any emperor, king, prince, or foreign power, such person shall cease to be a citizen of the United States, and shall be incapable of holding any office of trust or profit under them, or either of them.

Unfortunately, the annals of Congress and contemporary newspapers do not give any of the debate upon this interesting proposition. The only light thrown upon the subject by the annals is the remark of Mr. Macon, who said "he considered the vote on this question as deciding whether or not we were to have members of the Legion of Honor in this country." What event connected with our diplomatic or political history suggested the need of such an amendment is not now apparent, but it is possible that the presence of Jerome Bonaparte in this country a few years previous, and his marriage to a Maryland lady, may have suggested this measure.

An article in Niles's Register (vol. 72, p. 166), written many years after this event, refers to an amendment having been adopted to prevent any but native-born citizens from being President of the United States. This is, of course, a mistake, as the Constitution in its original form contained such a provision; but it may be possible that the circumstances referred to by the writer in Niles relate to the passage of this amendment through Congress in regard to titles of nobility. The article referred to maintains that at the time Jerome Bonaparte was in this country the Federalist Party, as a political trick, affecting to apprehend that Jerome might find his way to the Presidency through "French influence," proposed the amendment. They thought the Democratic Party would oppose it as unnecessary, which would thus appear to the public as a further proof of their subserviency to French influence. The Democrats, to avoid this imputation, concluded to carry the amendment. "It can do no harm" was what reconciled it to all.

I see no harm in the proposed amendment. That amendment was submitted 107 years ago, and it was ratified within two years by Maryland, Kentucky, Ohio, Delaware, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Vermont, Tennessee, Georgia, North Carolina, Massachusetts, and New Hampshire. It was rejected by two or three of the States, and when the last State that acted favorably upon it ratified that amendment it only lacked the vote of one State of becoming a part of our organic law; and, indeed, Mr. President, for years the schoolbook histories and the public men believed that it was a part of our organic law, because in the early days of our Government the Secretary of State did not send messages to Congress or promulgate to the public any notice whatever as to when an amendment became a part of the Constitution. Indeed, I have caused the journals, records, and files in the Department of State to be searched, and there can not be found any notice of any proclamation or promulgation of the ratification of the first 10 amendments to the Constitution. It was not an unwarranted or violent assumption, hence the States assumed that when the requisite number of States—the last one was Virginia—had ratified this amendment it was then and there a part of our organic law. So we find that schoolbook histories and journals published years after 1810 believed that this amendment which was proposed in 1810 was a part of the polity and policy of our constitutional form of government.

Mr. President, when the great conflict known as our War between the States began to throw its dark shadow over the people of this land, men rushed with a compromise here and with compromise there to heal the breach and tried to avert the shock that was apparently about to come to our structure. Compromise after compromise was proposed, and just before the adjournment of Congress, to wit, March 2, 1861, the following amendment to the Constitution of the United States, known as the Corwin amendment, was proposed to the States and was submitted to them for their ratification or adoption. It read as follows:

> No amendment shall be made to the Constitution which will authorize or give to Congress the power to abolish or interfere, within any State, with the domestic institutions thereof, including that of persons held to labor or service by the laws of said State. (12 Stat., 251.) Proposed by Congress March 2, 1861.

That was submitted by Congress on the 2d of March, 1861. I warrant there are not 5,000 people in the United States today who know that that amendment is now pending before the various States of our Union for their adoption or ratification. That amendment was ratified by the State of Ohio; it was ratified by the State of Maryland through the State legislature and by the State of Illinois in 1862 by a convention.

So I say a system which permits of no limitation as to the time when an amendment may not be voted upon is not fair to posterity. It keeps historians, publishers, and annalists, as well as the general public, constantly in doubt.

Having searched closely as to whether there is in the Constitution itself any expressed or implied limitation as to when an amendment may not be adopted, I am driven irresistibly to the conclusion that once having proposed an amendment to the Constitution, though it were proposed September 15, 1789, it could not be recalled even by the unanimous vote of both Houses, if Congress wished it recalled, because the power to submit an amendment is specifically pointed out, no power being given to recall it, and when power is denied, silence is negation.

Mr. President, I am not without authority on this subject, and I wish for a moment to read from Jameson on Constitutional Conventions, paragraph 585, fourth edition:

DISCUSSION OF CONSTITUTIONAL QUESTIONS INVOLVED.

(Jameson.)

SEC. 585. VI. Two further questions may be considered: (1) When Congress has submitted amendments to the States can it recall them, and (2) How long are amendments thus submitted open to adoption or rejection by the States?

1. The first question must, we think, receive a negative answer. When Congress has submitted amendments, at the time deemed by itself or its constituents desirable, to concede to that body the power of afterwards recalling them would be to give to it that of definitely rejecting such amendments, since the recall would withdraw them from the consideration of the States and thus render their adoption impossible. However this may be, it is enough to justify a negative answer to say that the Federal Constitution, from which alone Congress derives its power to submit amendments to the States, does not provide for recalling them upon any event or condition, and that the power to recall can not be considered as involved in that to submit as necessary to its complete execution. It therefore can not exist.

2. The same consideration will, perhaps, furnish the answer to the second question. The Constitution gives to Congress the power to submit amendments to the States; that is, either to the State legislatures or to conventions called by the States for this purpose, but there it stops. No power is granted to prescribe conditions as to the time within which the amendments are to be ratified, and hence to do so would be to transcend the power given. The practice of Congress in such cases has always conformed to the implied limitations of the Constitution. It has contented itself with proposing amendments, to become valid as parts of the Constitution, according to the terms of that instrument. It is, therefore, possible, though hardly probable, that an amendment once proposed is always open to adoption by the nonacting or nonratifying States.

The better opinion would seem to be that an alteration of the Constitution proposed to-day has relation to the sentiment and the felt needs of to-day, and that, if not ratified early, while that sentiment may fairly be supposed to exist, it ought to be regarded as waived and not again to be voted upon unless a second time proposed by Congress.

SEC. 586. In discussing the question of the right of the States to vote upon proposed amendments at any time after the date of their proposal it is proper to look into the consequences of such a right. If they have the right there are now floating about us, as it were, in nubibus, several amendments to the Constitution proposed by Congress which have received the ratification of one or more States but not of enough to make them valid as parts of that instrument. Congress could not withdraw them, and there is in force in regard to them no recognized statute of limitations. Unless abrogated by amendments subsequently adopted they are, on the hypothesis stated, still before the American people to be adopted or rejected.

In 1873 the Senate of Ohio, acting upon the theory that once proposed an amendment to the Constitution is always open to ratification, adopted a joint resolution ratifying the second of the 12 amendments submitted to the States by Congress in 1789, but then rejected, providing that "no law varying the compensation of Members of Congress shall take effect until an election for Representatives shall have intervened." This resolution, prepared by Madison, was an excellent one; but suppose it had been unjust, proposed, perhaps, in the interest of a section or of a party, and, failing at the time to receive the requisite majority, it had subsequently by a concerted rally of those interested in its adoption, been carried without discussion or a clear express of the existing public will; is that a true construction of the Constitution which may be followed by so dangerous consequences? And, supposing the right referred to exists, by what majority shall the resurrected amendments be adopted? If proposed in 1789, when the States numbered but 13, and when a majority of 10 States might have ratified the amendment, how many would have been requisite in 1873, when there were 38 States which would have been called upon to vote? If the answer should be that 29 States must have voted to ratify, since that number was three-fourths of all the States in 1873, however reasonable such an answer might seem, it would be founded upon no statute or custom of the country, and therefore different opinions as to its reasonableness might well be entertained. Hence the danger of confusion of conflict. We discuss this question here merely to emphasize the dangers involved in the Constitution as it stands and to show the necessity of legislation to make certain those points upon which doubts may arise in the employment of the constitutional process for amending the fundamental law of the nation. A constitutional statute of limitation prescribing the time within which proposed amendments shall be adopted or be treated as waived ought by all means to be passed. (Jameson, John A. A treatise on constitutional conventions (4th ed., 1887), pp. 634–636.)

I ask consent to incorporate in the RECORD without reading some copious extracts on this subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, leave will be granted.

(Ames, Proposed Amendments, p. 363.)

Mr. ASHURST. So, Mr. President, I believe if we should begin and lay down as a part of our organic law and a part of the policy of our Government the limit of time within which an amendment under a particular submission may be adopted, we would be doing a public service.

I have pointed out already that there are now pending before the States four amendments for their action, for ratification or rejection. The whirlwinds, simooms, and siroccos of politics do strange things. I advert for a moment to what happened in one of the sovereign States of this Union, now so well represented by her two Senators—the State of Delaware. Mark you, the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States was, by proclamation of the Secretary of State, declared adopted March 30, 1870. The requisite number of States ratified the same, for by that time the Secretary of State had begun the wise policy of announcing by proclamation when the required number of States, the requisite three-fourths, had ratified amendments. Yet in the turmoil, struggle, and the tumult of a political situation in the State of Delaware it seems that the State got temporarily under the dominion of the Addicks "machine," and that that "machine," thinking to flatter, thinking to pander to, and do what we call "catch" the negro vote, dealt with the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution, which had already been ratified for 31 years. Delaware ratified that amendment solemnly and gravely on the 12th day of February, 1901—adopted a proposed amendment which had been a part of our system since 1870.

So I say there ought to be a limitation on the time when an amendment should be ratified. We ought not to have a State waiting 84 years and then pass a resolution or wait until an amendment is adopted for 31 years and then solemnly pass a brutum fulmen, a harmless thunderbolt.

Mr. President, I have some copious data in relation to this subject which I wish to incorporate into the RECORD. I shall not detain the Senate by reading the same at this time, but I ask to be allowed to incorporate it in the RECORD. It gives the history and the dates of ratification of the various amendments. It sets out in extenso those now pending and, I think, shows the necessity and the need for setting up some sort of a statute of limitation as to when a State may no longer act favorably or unfavorably upon a submitted amendment.

Personally, as I said in the beginning of my remarks, I would be glad for a limitation of 12, 14, 16, 18, or 20 years, but I think that when the State acts it should act in the light of the evidence and discussion before it. It should act contemporaneously in some degree, at least, with the resolution of Congress.

ATTEMPTS TO REGULATE RATIFICATION.

On May 23, 1866, when the resolution proposing the fourteenth amendment was under consideration, Mr. Buckalew, of Pennsylvania, submitted an amendment to add to the resolution the following additional section:

"SEC. 6. This amendment shall be passed upon in each State by the Legislature thereof which shall chosen, or the members of the most popular branch of which shall be chosen next after the submission of the amendment, and at its first session; and no acceptance or rejection shall be reconsidered or again brought in question at any subsequent session; nor shall any acceptance of the amendment be valid if made after three years from the passage of this resolution." (Cong. Globe, vol. 36, p. 2771.)

When the fifteenth amendment was before the Senate on February 3, 1869, Mr. Buckalew, of Pennsylvania, proposed to add to the resolution submitting it to the States the words:

"That the foregoing amendment shall be submitted to the legislatures of the several States, the most numerous branch of which shall be chosen next after the passage of this resolution." (Cong. Globe, vol. 40, p. 828.)

His speech in support of this proposal on February 5, 1869, is reported in the Congressional Globe, volume 40, pages 912 to 913. On February 9, 1869, this amendment was rejected—yeas 13, nays 43.

On February 17, 1869, an amendment practically identical with the above was offered by Mr. Hendricks, of Indiana, and the constitutionality of such a limitation was discussed by Senators Morton, Bayard, Buckalew, Dixon, and Yates. The question being taken, the amendment was rejected—yeas 12, nays 40. (Cong. Globe, vol. 40, pp. 1311–1314.)

On January 30, 1882, Mr. Berry, of California, introduced a joint resolution (H. J. Res. 116, 47th Cong, 1st sess.) proposing an amendment to the Constitution to regulate ratification, as follows:

"SECTION 1. The legislature of a State shall not vote upon a proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States except at a regular session held following an election of the members of the most numerous branch of the State legislature, which election must take place subsequent to the time of submission by Congress or a convention of the proposed amendment.

"SEC. 2. This amendment shall not take effect until the 5th of March, 1885."

On March 17, 1869, Mr. Morton, of Indiana, introduced in the Senate, and on March 29, 1869, Mr. Shanks, of Indiana, introduced in the House identical joint resolutions (S. J. Res. 32 and H. J. Res. 57, 41st Cong., 1st sess.) which read as follows:

"Be it resolved, etc., That on the sixth legislative day of a regular session, or of a legally called special session, of any State legislature, each house of said legislature, at the hour of 12 meridian, shall proceed to the consideration of any amendment of the Constitution of the United States that may have been submitted by the Congress of the United States to the legislatures of the several States for ratification, according to the provisions of the fifth article of the Constitution of the United States: Provided, That such amendment may not have been acted upon at any preceding session of said legislature. And if, upon the consideration of such amendment, it shall receive the votes of a majority of the members elected to each house of said legislature, it shall be held to be duly ratified by such legislature. And if final action is not taken upon the first day, then the house shall meet the next day at the same hour and so continue to meet from day to day (Sundays excepted) until final action is taken upon such amendment. Nor shall the action of either house of said legislature upon such amendment be hindered or prevented by the resignation or withdrawal, or the refusal to qualify, of a minority of either or of both houses of said legislature.

"SEC. 2. And be it further resolved, That if such amendment or amendments shall be ratified according to the provisions of the preceding section, the same shall be duly certified by the officers of each house and shall be transmitted by the governor of the State to the President of the United States."

(Cf. Ames, H. V. The proposed amendments to the Constitution of the United States during the first century of its history. pp. 287–292.)

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I did not think of addressing the Senate to-day upon the prohibition constitutional amendment, but the reference of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] to the laws of the State of Colorado has made me believe that I ought to put into the RECORD, following his speech, something with relation to the operation of the State constitutional amendment for prohibition in Colorado, which was adopted by the people at an election and took effect January 1, 1916.

The Senator from Alabama has said that if Colorado is satisfied with the laws which that State makes, it is all well and good, but that when it comes to Colorado attempting to interfere with the laws of the State of Alabama, it is all wrong.

Mr. President, we have found from comparing the result of carrying out the amendment to the Constitution in the State of Colorado with the previous condition that great good has been produced in that State. I hold in my hand a collection of some of the facts with relation to the effect of prohibition in Colorado.

There were 1,615 saloons closed and 17 breweries by that act, which took effect January 1, 1916. Denver is a city of 250,000 population.

The arrests during the year 1915, which is termed the wet year, were for drunkenness in that city 3,219, but in the year 1916, which was the first year of the operation of the prohibition law, the number was reduced to 1,549. In other words, more than half of the arrests for drunkenness in 1915 were caused by the fact that we did not have a prohibition law in the State of Colorado.

The arrests for vagrancy in Denver dropped from 3,714 in 1915 to 1,148 in 1916. In other words, by the passage of that constitutional amendment the cases of vagrancy were reduced more than two-thirds.

The arrests for gambling in Denver decreased from 515 in 1915 to 252 in the prohibition year of 1916. In other words, gambling was not indulged in to the extent of more than one-half. A person can readily see the reason. As long as the saloons were open the games were going on; if not openly, they were being played in a back room; and while the arrests would not represent the violations of the law in every instance, it shows that there was considerably less gambling in the prohibition year of 1916 as contrasted with the wet year of 1915.

The average number of arrests for all offenses in the city of Denver for the six years preceding the adoption of the prohibition amendment were 13,922. The total number of all arrests during the dry year was 9,985; in other words, they were reduced about one-third.

Before prohibition was adopted in Colorado 402 cells in the city and county jail were occupied nearly all the time. Since prohibition the daily average number of prisoners has fallen to approximately 75. Thus the number of those who were guilty of all offenses punishable by the laws of the States was diminished more than two-thirds by the enactment of that law.

In the State penitentiary the record is startling. Prohibition has reduced, according to the warden of the penitentiary, Mr. Tynon, the prisoners committed to that institution by 40 per cent.

The prison population dropped from 782 on May 5, 1916, to 676 April 11, 1917. In other words, while discharges are being made from the penitentiary the number that are sent back to the prison is not nearly equal to the number of discharges.

Mr. President, it is a little misleading to refer to the per cent of decrease in the population of the penitentiary, because many are in the penitentiary for life and many are in for long terms of years, and, of course, they must be counted in the population during the wet year and also during the dry year. So the statement of the warden to the effect that the decrease is fully 40 per cent is undoubtedly correct. One entire wing of the cell house of the State penitentiary of Colorado has been closed. That speaks for itself of the great good that is resulting from prohibition in that State.

Upon the other hand, we find that the amount of savings accounts in the State of Colorado has increased enormously since prohibition has been adopted. There was an increase of 26 per cent in the amount of savings-bank deposits in Denver alone for the first nine months of the year 1916 compared with the same period of the wet year 1915. New savings-banks accounts were opened in Denver the first dry year in a larger number than in any similar period of the city's history. There was an increase of more than 16 per cent in deposits in the banks and trust companies of Denver compared with the same period in the previous year.

Mr. President, when it was proposed to adopt prohibition in the State of Colorado the predictions were made that particularly Denver would be wiped off the map. The prediction was made that there would be vacant stores throughout all the business portion of the city and that the places made vacant by the numerous saloons would not be filled by those engaged in any other business. In fact, it was predicted that bank accounts would not be so numerous; that deposits would not be so great, and that business would be stagnant. Yet the very statement that I have read shows that there was a large increase instead of a decrease in business.

In the first dry month the Denver Gas & Electric Co. increased its gas and electricity current sales more than $10,000, whereas it had figured upon a probable loss of $15,000. In other words, they argued with themselves, no doubt, that as the saloons were brilliantly lighted, each of them having a brilliant electric-light sign, there would be a great loss in the amount of electricity sold. Yet during that first month the amount sold was increased instead of decreased. It was the same way with the building permits. The building permits for the year 1916 were almost double those of 1915 in the city of Denver. The financial transactions of the Denver post office indicated the enormous increase of $1,258,000 over the year 1915.

But, Mr. President, there was one thing that was said with a great show of reason, namely, that there would be a falling off in the tourist trade of Colorado. It was said people will not come to a State where they can not buy liquor, and there seemed to be perhaps some reason in that declaration and prediction. But, Mr. President, when we compare the number of tourists to Colorado for the year 1916 with that of 1915 we find that directly the opposite occurred. In other words, we find that the number of tourists who visited the Rocky Mountain National Park in Colorado in 1915 was 31,000 and in the dry year of 1916 the number increased to 51,000—nearly double the number. It was found that the men who wanted to take their families concluded that they would rather go to a dry State than to go to resorts where there might be carousing produced by the use of intoxicating liquors. Thus the tourist trade which it was predicted with absolute confidence would be ruined, as a matter of fact almost doubled the very first year of prohibition. The reports this year indicate that the tourist travel to Colorado is still greater than in 1916.

Mr. President, I wish to read right here a statement which I clipped from a paper the other day as to the attitude of the mayor of the city of Denver on this question. This is his statement:

BOB SPEER CONVERTED.

At last Mayor Speer, of Denver, has come out for prohibition. Here is an extract from what he said in a recent public address:

"I voted against prohibition when the question was before the people. Yet, notwithstanding what I have said, if the question were submitted again I would vote for it. The success of no city depends upon the sale of liquor, and Denver to-day is better off than it was when saloons were running.

"About $6,000,000 was spent for liquor in Denver during the year 1915, when saloons were running; about $2,500,000 was spent for it in 1916, being for liquor shipped into Colorado for private use, a saving of $3,500,000 a year.

"The shipments last year were generally made to people who could afford to buy it and the saving of $3,500,000 was largely to those who could least afford to spend their money in that way. What became of this large amount saved? Many men who formerly spent their evenings in saloons can now be seen taking their entire families to moving-picture shows at a less cost than they formerly spent in saloons. The sun is now shining in many homes of Denver where gloom and fear formerly shut it out."

Mr. President, it seems to me that that testimony of a man who had been upon the other side of the question and who voted against the prohibition constitutional amendment of Colorado ought to have great weight in the determination of this question.

There is one fact that is lamentable but nevertheless true. While Colorado is a prohibition State, there is a large quantity of liquor that has been coming into that State by shipments from a neighboring State. It seems almost impossible to stop the shipment of liquor to Colorado from outside of the State. Shipments to the extent of at least $2,500,000, according to the statement of the mayor of Denver, came from outside sources.

Mr. President, the very fact that large quantities of liquor have gone into the State of Colorado, most of it illegally, is the clearest proof why an amendment to the Constitution of the United States is absolutely imperative.

States can not fully enforce their constitutional prohibition amendments; States are powerless to do so, except to a limited degree. When a prohibition State has across its border, as is the case in Colorado, a State that does not at all prohibit the use of intoxicating liquors, it can readily be seen that absolute prohibition is impossible.

Mr. President, it is not the fault of the laws of Colorado, and it is not the fault of those who administer the laws of the State of Colorado, that prohibition in that State is not as effective as it should be. It is almost impossible to discover every individual sale of liquor and every illegal importation of liquor from one State to another. The line between States might almost be said to be imaginary so far as the enforcement of liquor laws.

Mr. President, that is the reason I have always believed that an amendment to the Constitution of the United States would stop the use of intoxicating liquors and bring the beneficial effect prohibition is designed to accomplish.

This joint resolution is not to enforce a law except in a legitimate way; it is not to make a law for one State by singling it out. That State has joined in the ratification of a constitution which provides that an amendment applying to all the States of the Union can be submitted to the States, and if ratified by three-fourths thereof, shall become binding on each State. I can not see how anyone can contend, under the mode of procedure prescribed by our national Constitution, that we are impairing or annulling any right of a State.

I can say that Colorado has found it beneficial to have even partial prohibition, and I must say that we can not have prohibition to the extent that we should have, without a United States constitutional amendment. It is for Colorado's own protection, as well as for the beneficial effect which will be the result in other States that we desire the amendment. We know the Federal courts would more effectively enforce such a measure. Violators of the law fear the Federal courts more than the State courts. We can not in Colorado get absolute prohibition without the aid of a national constitutional amendment, and consequently when we vote for this joint resolution we believe it to be for the purpose of accomplishing that enforcement. We therefore believe that it should be adopted and should become a part of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, it seems that no other Senator desires to speak this afternoon. I therefore move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 3 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, July 31, 1917, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, July 30, 1917.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We come to Thee Almighty God our heavenly Father, with glad hearts, rejoicing in the possession of life, and its splendid environments, its lofty hopes and glorious aspirations which leap like angels from the temples of our hearts, and which are ever leading us onward and upward to greater heights of manhood and glory. Increase our faith in Thee, so that when sorrows gather like clouds thick and fast about us we shall not fail; when the storms of adversity break upon us we shall be firm; when temptations come rolling in upon us like the mighty waves of the ocean we shall be strong to resist, forgetting not that "he that dwelleth in the secret place of the most high shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty." This we ask in the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday, July 26, 1917, was read and approved.

Mr. SWEET. On a general subject.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McLAUGHLIN] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, the resolution that I have introduced in the House, House joint resolution 127, is presented under the firm conviction that the successful prosecution of the war in which we are engaged makes action such as indicated therein an imperative need of the times. In offering the resolution I am prompted by an unshaken belief that its adoption, and its fulfillment in fact, would contribute tremendously to the victorious issue of American arms in the war we are now waging.

No observing man can be blind to the events in Ireland; to the unrest among the Irish race throughout the world; to the disheartening effect of the refusal of the British Government to put into immediate operation that limited home-rule act now on the statute books; and to the alienation of millions of men who are loyal to the cause of freedom by heritage and education, but who remain more or less inactive because freedom is denied to the land of their fathers.

In a world war such as we have entered the smallest factor may decide for victory or defeat. It is a phenomena of this war that the rulers of every country in the combative alliances are ever vigilant regarding the conditions existing in the realms of their allies. We are now as much concerned in the internal affairs of Great Britain as we are in the operation of the processes of law and order in California or in the Philippines. It has been stated with vehement logic that the fates of Great Britain and America in the present war are bound together in a common peril. Any weakness which develops among the inhabitants of one country is a menace to the safety of the other.

The question of Ireland, therefore, is not merely an English question. It is an international question. The United States has as much right to share in the settlement of this question as England has. The world apparently is in process of reorganization, and the Irish people form a powerful part of this world. The fate of Ireland can be fixed in this House and the cause of the allies rendered a service far greater than can be measured by the wisest statesmen of our time.

It has been said that America will be saved on the fields of France, just as Pitt, the Earl of Chatham, said, after Braddock's defeat, that he would win America on the sands of Germany. The axiom that "history repeats itself" is presented once more to the mind in a most powerful manner, for now the cause of freedom can be saved on the hills of Ireland. This House, which has declared that the freedom of small nations was a thing worth going to war for, can thrill the world with a new declaration of independence. And just as the course of history has declared that the liberation of the American Colonies inspired the world to establish the magnificent system of republican government, so also will the liberation of Ireland fortify the faith of all free people in the eternal justice of the right of a people to govern themselves. [Applause.]

The winning of the war is a mighty duty that arouses America. The Irish race has prepared itself for this duty and grasps the weapons for the combat. But can not that race rightly ask, before its sons go forth to die, "May not this blood be shed also for Ireland?" In the cause of freedom Irish soldiers have melted in the blasts of death on every field on this continent. They have never asked why—it was theirs but to do and die. They have ever been eager to serve as Americans, to bear the burden as citizens, and to guard with their lives the destiny of this great Republic. But they have never, while doing their duty to their country, forgotten their origin. With the high spirit of a proud race they have been proud of their warlike deeds and have cherished the memory of those achievements which mark them as a separate unit of the human family. They can not forget the ties of consanguinity. They can not break those ties of blood—the blood of its sturdy manhood and womanhood which has contributed much to invigorate the American stock and to enrich the heart of this great Commonwealth, though this contribution impoverished the land of their fathers. They can not forget a line of the splendid story of the Irish in America during the last 200 years. It is the proudest page in the annals of the Irish race. And as multitudes of youth—youth of the Irish race—now assemble for the conflict in the armies and fleets of their country, there are millions who will read the Irish names on the muster roll in this war, as did Gen. Charles Lee in the War of the Revolution, when he said, "Half the Continental Army is Irish."

They can not forget a longer and more glorious story, a story gleaming with triumph and dark with defeat, but cherished nevertheless by the Irish race with a devotion unexampled in the record of nations, with a love like that of mothers for their children, with a reverence such as is given to religion exalted through generations of persecution and disaster, and with that lofty idealism that is imperishable amid decay. For 800 years the Irish race has cherished the dream of freedom. Before the President of the United States uttered those fateful words on the second day of last April they had been uttered by nearly forty generations of Irishmen. Before the Congress of the United States declared for the freedom of small nations countless millions of the Irish race had registered a vow to live and die for the freedom of their own small nation. When this Government chose the path of war and announced to the world that the sword would not be sheathed until Belgium, Serbia, Roumania, and Poland were free, can you not understand how the millions of the Irish race on this continent were struck with an unexpressed wonder? Can you not imagine—at least vaguely—the chill at the heart, the shattering of a hope, when yearning eyes failed to find the name of Ireland among the small nations that were to be redeemed?

It is no light thing for a powerful race to surrender its dream. Yet the Irish race will gladly and trustingly surrender the dream of eight centuries in order to insure the safety of America. But the spirit that won independence in a long and bloody revolution, the sympathy that has united the people of Ireland and the people of America for more than a hundred and fifty years, can not be ignored even in the face of a crisis that divides and all but paralyzes the world.

The principles of the Irish race are not written on a "scrap of paper." They can not be torn from the heart of the race. The race can not be asked to perish, to consume its soul, to pile its treasures on the altar of expediency, and to light the sacrificial pyre of its liberty to win the freedom of other nations and entirely disregard their own.

There is unswerving loyalty at this moment in every man and woman of Irish blood who owes allegiance to this Government and to its flag. But there is also a longing that this Government shall wield its mighty influence—speak its fateful words—for Irish liberties. Those whose fathers have been so often betrayed are searching their souls and asking if once again the race is to lose its cherished dream of freedom. They look back over the past and reflect with bitterness that on the fields of Flanders, on the plains of France, on the hills of Austria, the young men of Ireland have laid down their lives—but not for Ireland. They ask in the silence of their own hearts, "Are we always to die and never to gain the object of our devotion?"

Let this Congress ask that Ireland, too, shall be free—shall be as free as Belgium, as Montenegro, as Serbia, as Roumania, as Poland, as Greece. Then will a change come over the face of this war. A cheer will rise that will be heard around the world, because it will come from the lips of the Irish race in every land where constitutional justice holds its place, and from the lips of every people who wish to be free.

It is, however, not a question of conciliating the Irish race. The lives, the fortunes, the honor of that race are pledged to America. But there are more powerful bonds of fealty than pledges. There are more binding ties than those of birth, than oaths of allegiance, than convictions of the justice of a cause. Touch the deep emotions of a race and that race will feel a deathless pride in having been given the opportunity of showing its devotion to the cause to which the country is pledged. [Applause.]

Not only in the marts of commerce, in the great cities, over the wide plains of America will such a declaration be hailed with delight, but across the border into Canada, over the bush of Australia, the veldts of South Africa, on the hills and vales of Ireland, and in the mills and mines of Great Britain herself will the glad tidings go that the American Congress, toward which the yearning gaze of the Irish race is now turned, has spoken the words of destiny, and that Ireland shall be a self-governing nation.

The action that this House is asked to take has been taken by other Governments in other crises. It would be possible to enumerate instances from the records of other nations. But it is worth while recalling at this time the action of this Government in the case of Texas in 1847, and of the British Government in the case of Greece in 1822. In both of these cases the hand of a powerful Government was extended to a small nation struggling for its freedom.

Another principle of statesmanship practiced since the earliest times is that of concession to the prejudices of its own citizens. In applying this principle Lincoln disarmed the prejudices of the army of McClellan by assuring the men of that army that the Civil War was not being waged to impose negro domination upon the southern people, but to save the Union. Is it not worth while to assure the Irish race that this war is being waged to establish freedom in those countries that have been deprived of it?

Every Government exists and flourishes through the sentiment of its people. Those that seize power by force of arms will not long maintain it before the advance of unconquerable democracy. The exception to this rule is the case of Ireland. In that country there are protests; there are immense meetings addressed by leading public men; there are insurrections and bloodshed; there are arrests and imprisonment for defiant citizens; there are areas of martial law and all its consequent petty tyrannies—all indicating that the cause for which America is fighting is imperiled by the oppression of a race whose sons at this very hour are marshaled to achieve the victory which shall result in establishing the rights of small nations.

Mr. HULBERT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Pennsylvania. Not just now. Is it not a strange spectacle—an embattled Irish race striving to break the shackles of every enslaved people except those shackles which bind the people of their cradle land to the chariot of the conqueror?

We declare that we are now repaying the debt of gratitude to France for her aid in the Revolution. Is it forgotten that the people of Ireland sent a message of good will and encouragement to the Continental Army, and that not alone was the army of Washington half Irish but that the army of France in America at that time was also half Irish? We waged a war for the freedom of Cuba, and we protect that small nation in its right to freedom. For a century we have guaranteed the sovereignty of the South American Republics. Is it to be recorded on the annals of civilization—is it to be written in the record of this Nation—that small nations, alien in blood and language, strange in customs, and foreign in character, shall receive from the generous hand of America the dearest of all possessions—freedom—and that this priceless treasure is to be denied to that small nation whose blood has been shed in torrents for the defense of America, whose speech is our speech, whose character is the American character, whose customs are our customs, and who have never been foreigners since the first ship sailed across the sea with the soldiers who were even then fighting the battles of liberty, as they have ever fought them, and as their descendants are recrossing that sea to fight them again? I am fully convinced that the American Congress can answer the question. [Applause.]

Mr. HULBERT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. POWERS] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I want to make a few remarks touching the attitude of the present administration and the Government toward the coal producers of the country. I am not a coal producer. I hold no brief to speak for them. As a matter of fact a majority of them have always been against me in my congressional campaigns down in my district. The miners, in the main, have been for me. The interests of the miners and operators are so closely allied that you can not injure the one without hurting the other. The miners know I have stood by them all along the line.

It seems that the coal operators have few friends and no advocates in this Chamber. In justice to them, I want to make a few statements regarding their situation. The price of "free coal"—that is, coal not under contract—so far as the consumers of the country are concerned, is enormously high. I might say that the price that the consumers have to pay is outrageously high. But if the coal producers alone were responsible for this entire situation—a thing which they are not—even in that event there would be at least some justification for their position. I lay down this proposition, which I do not believe any gentleman here will deny, and that is that from 1900 to 1916, inclusive, 16 long years, there was not a single new dollar made by the producers of bituminous coal in the entire United States. The figures of the Federal Trade Commission, as well as the figures of the Commerce Department, fully sustain this statement. I am taking the Government's own figures for it.

It is true that some of the operators made money, others lost. I am speaking of the operators as a whole. The Federal Trade Commission, in a recent report made by them, I believe on the 20th of June, makes this statement:

> For several years prior to 1916 it has been a matter of general knowledge that the bituminous coal industry of the United States was in an unsound condition.

There is no doubt about the unsound condition of the bituminous coal industry from 1900 to 1916. I know of my own personal knowledge that for the last 8 or 10 years many of the coal operators in my district—and it is fast becoming one of the great coal-producing districts of this country—were in a state of bankruptcy. I am speaking up to 8 or 10 months ago. Many of them were being forced to the wall. Others were forced to the verge of ruin. I know that of my own personal knowledge. So that if the coal operators were responsible for the high price of coal that has been prevailing for 8 or 10 months, there is at least some justification for their position, because for the last 16 years their industry in this country has been making no money. In the main, during that length of time the country has been at the high tide of prosperity with a few minor exceptions. The other industries have been making money hand over fist. During all this time the coal industry has been losing money, many of them, as I say, being forced to the wall. So that if they were responsible for it all there would at least be some justification. But are they responsible? The Federal Trade Commission, in its report of June 20, states that at least 70 to 90 per cent of the coal produced in this country is produced under contract. That is to say, railroad companies, the great steel mills, the great iron factories, the cotton mills, and so forth, which consume 80 per cent of the coal produced in the United States, buy their coal under contract.

Many of the contracts made years ago are not out of existence now. Many of the contracts have been fulfilled. In fact, nearly all of them have been in course of fulfillment by the coal operators during the high price of coal. That is, these contracts were made at a time when wages were not as high as now, when materials were not as high as now, when coal could be produced at a much cheaper cost. And while the coal operators have been fulfilling the contracts, many of them have been doing so at a loss to themselves. It is the so-called "free coal," the panicky condition of buyers, the disreputable conduct of a few middlemen, together with the new routing of coal, which are responsible for the fluctuation of price. It is not the producers; it is not the shortage.

During 1916 there was no shortage of coal—only about 4,000,000 tons short in the anthracite output. They produced 500,000,000 tons of bituminous coal—the biggest output in the history of the country—so that the high prices of coal have not been due to the coal shortage, but have been due largely to the fear, the terror, of shortage, along with the other things to which I have just called attention. The operators could have refused to have accepted, at the mouth of their mines, the high prices offered them for about 20 per cent of their coal—that is, the so-called "free coal"—and if they were the only persons in the world getting high prices for their products such conduct might be reasonably expected of them, but not so with the world gouging them at every turn of the road. The price of coal is too high, but the price of everything else is too high.

The operators are willing to come down in the price of their products if the other fellows will. They are willing to sacrifice as much for the Government and the public as anybody else, but they object to being made the "goat." A crisis, however, is on, and certain members of the Cabinet, high-minded men, realizing that the price of coal is too high, realizing that the price of coal is hampering the Government in the proper prosecution of the war, realizing that the householder and the consumers, the wage earners, men working on salaries are paying enormously high prices for coal, realizing that there ought to be some remedy for the situation, Secretary Lane, of the Cabinet, Commissioner Fort, of the Federal Trade Commission, the coal production committee of the Council of National Defense, Mr. Manning, of the Bureau of Mines, called the bituminous coal operators of the United States to assemble here in Washington the latter part of June. They did come, and assembled through their representatives, more than 400 of them. Mr. Lane, of the Cabinet, said to these men that a national crisis is at hand. "We want you to put down the price of coal at the mouth of the mines to a reasonable figure. We want it for $3 a ton, and we want to give you less than that if the Federal Trade Commission, now conducting an investigation, says that $3 is too much." The coal operators agreed to take $3 a ton at the mouth of the mines for the next 30 days and thereafter to take whatever the Federal Trade Commission said was a reasonable profit, charging the Government and everybody else only what the coal actually costs to produce. In other words, the coal producers of this country, the only men called upon to make any such sacrifice said: "We are willing, we will charge everybody what our coal actually costs to produce, and all we want above that is a fair profit, and we are willing for the Government to fix the price and the profit." The matter was agreed to.

Secretary Lane complimented the coal operators for being big men and doing a big thing in a big way. He said that they had "reason to be proud of what they had done" and that "they had worked in a spirit that makes for the success of our country." The operators went to their homes. They agreed to this thing notwithstanding the fact that 80 per cent of their output goes to the railroads, the cotton mills, the steel mills, the factories, the foundries, the munition plants of the country, all of which have been making enormously greater profits than the coal producers ever dreamed of. None of these men were called upon by the Government, or by any man connected with it, to make a similar sacrifice on their part, and yet the coal producers agreed to do this.

Mr. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POWERS. Yes.

Mr. NORTON. Does the gentleman have in mind what the price of coal was per ton in Kentucky at the mouth of the mine in 1914?

Mr. POWERS. I do not remember the exact figure.

Mr. NORTON. Approximately.

Mr. POWERS. I can hardly answer that question. I am not sure what it was.

Mr. NORTON. One dollar and twenty-five cents?

Mr. POWERS. Possibly so; maybe a little higher than that.

Mr. LANGLEY. I think it was between $1.40 and $1.50.

Mr. NORTON. What does it sell for now at the mouth of the mine?

Mr. POWERS. About $4.

Mr. NORTON. What was day labor worth in the mines in 1914?

Mr. POWERS. I can not give you the figures, but it has been greatly increased since that time, and the miners are demanding a further increase, and they have got to have good wages or they can not live.

Mr. NORTON. The price of coal at the mine has increased 400 per cent.

Mr. POWERS. That is the free coal that I am talking about, and that is only 20 per cent of the output, and I have explained about that increase. Most of the coal goes by contract. I am not trying to absolve the coal operators from blame, in so far as blame should attach to them, but they are entitled to fair and just treatment, and they are not getting it.

Mr. NORTON. The gentleman says that in 1914 coal at the mouth of the mine sold for $1.40 or $1.50.

Mr. POWERS. I do not know. I say this: That so far as "free coal" is concerned, which is 20 per cent of the output coal not under contract, the coal operators for the last 8 or 10 months have been making money hand over fist, and the price has been outrageously high, and to the extent that the coal operators may be to blame for this, I am not trying to absolve them.

Mr. NORTON. And wages have increased 25 per cent.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POWERS. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Coal to-day in the District of Columbia is bringing $8.50 a ton.

Mr. POWERS. I do not know what it brings here.

Mr. BLANTON. Can the gentleman state what that coal is worth at the mouth of the mine?

Mr. POWERS. I can not tell.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What kind of coal is that?

Mr. BLANTON. Furnace coal; what they put into the stoves here to-day.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That is anthracite.

Mr. POWERS. There is no anthracite produced in my district. Virtually all the anthracite coal is produced in the State of Pennsylvania. I am not personally acquainted with the price of that coal, but let me read you what the Federal Trade Commission has to say about some of it. I read from page 3 of this report of June 20:

> For years the prices received for anthracite steam sizes have not been sufficient to pay the cost of production.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POWERS. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Is the scale of wages of the miners of the gentleman's State fixed until July, 1918, by agreement with the operators?

Mr. POWERS. In my district they have mostly had independent labor until recently when the miners have made an organization. They have organized and they are demanding an increase in wages. A big strike is impending.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I understand that the soft-coal miners throughout most the country are under a contract or fixed scale of wages until June, 1918?

Mr. POWERS. That may be true generally, but it is not true in my district. I shall have to decline to yield further, as my time is about up.

After these operators had come here to Washington and made the agreement of which I have spoken, they returned to their homes no doubt feeling that they had made a great sacrifice, especially in view of the fact that nobody else had been called upon to make any, and in view of the further fact that neither the Government nor the public had come to their relief in the days of their sore trial and threatened destruction. To this magnanimity on the part of the operators, what has been the attitude of the Federal Government and this administration since that time? It is common knowledge, of course, that the good work of Secretary Lane, Commissioner Fort, and Mr. Manning have been knocked into a cocked hat by Secretaries Baker and Daniels and President Wilson. So the real answer of the administration to the magnanimous conduct of the coal operators is found in the provisions of the food-control bill now before us.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HEFLIN). The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to continue for 10 minutes more.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The order is that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SCHALL] shall proceed for 5 minutes following the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. POWERS], having 15 minutes.

Mr. POWERS. I know that is the order, but I submit my request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker, I want to take up now the attitude of the administration to the coal trade and the coal operators of the country, as we can judge it from the provisions contained in the food-control bill, and of necessity I must be brief. Let us take section 4 of both the Senate and the House bills. We find this, that general provision is made for governmental control of apparently all necessaries, although the title to the bill does not cover any such thing. Under section 4 it is provided that there shall be no monopoly of the necessaries of life. Further it is provided that it shall be unlawful to make any unjust or unreasonable rate or charge. This of course includes coal, because if there is any commodity that touches the public weal at as many angles as coal touches it I do not know what it is. Coal is absolutely essential to the transportation facilities of the country. It is absolutely essential to the great industrial world. It is absolutely essential to the household welfare of the land. Coal must be included in this provision of the bill. The section further provides that no one shall enhance the price or exact excessive prices for any necessaries. That provision covers coal. The administration is not content with putting coal on the same footing as some other things, so in section 5, which is the license section of the bill, it is provided that if, in the opinion of the President, it is necessary to require the coal operators of the country to get out a license, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, in order that they may operate the coal mines at all, that shall be done. That is section 5 of the bill. Section 6 is the hoarding section. It is a mighty good section, one of the best sections in the entire bill. It provides that you can not either hoard coal or other necessaries, and I indorse nearly all of that section. But section 8—why, they strike at coal operators in almost every section of this bill, and chase them like they were a band of malefactors. Section 8 provides that the President, if in his judgment it is necessary, may commandeer the fuels of the country, may take over all the coal produced. Section 9 provides that the President, if he desires to do it, may force the coal operators of the country to sell their coal only to the Federal Government through an agency to be established. And will it not be some job to establish an agency to handle the 2,000,000 tons of coal daily produced in this country?

Section 10 provides that the President may commandeer, if he sees fit to do it, all the coal mines of the country, take them with all their equipment. How would he operate them if he had them? Section 22 provides—and that is the Pomerene amendment—that the President of the United States shall be empowered to fix the price of coal and coke, and I notice from the morning's papers that the conferees have broadened that provision so that the President may not only fix the price, so far as the Government is concerned in its needs in this war, but may fix the price for everybody. If a price is fixed for the Government, the same price certainly ought to be fixed for the consuming public. The President is to fix the price and establish the rules and regulations under which the operators are to operate the mines, and if they do not operate the mines as the President believes they ought to be operated, out they go. I will just read the language of the Senate bill:

> If, in the opinion of the President, any such producer or dealer fails or neglects to conform to such prices or regulations and conducts his business efficiently, etc.

Why, the President has got the power to take over the coal mines and all the coal of the country. My understanding is, as I gather from the public press, that it is the purpose of the President to fix a uniform price of coal at the mouth of the mine. He expects thereby, it is said, to solve the high price of coal to the ultimate consumer, to increase the output of the mines, to greatly strengthen our national defense, and to bring unalloyed relief and joy to the citizenry of the entire country, save and except the operators themselves. Delusive dreams, Mr. President, delusive dreams. Judging from the statements in the public press, the President has said that $1.50 per ton ought to be the price of coal at the mouth of the mine. I want to say this, that if the President of the United States fixes a uniform price of coal at the mouth of the mine at $1.50 per ton, or anything akin to that price, I predict for this country the greatest calamity that it has ever had. Such a course will put the operators of small veins of coal and many small operators out of business, if not many larger ones. The small operators produce about 50 per cent of the entire output. What will this country do with its output of coal reduced 50 per cent? The production of coal is the crying need of the hour. While the price of coal ought to be reduced, the production of it is the real demand of the times; and you can get more milk by feeding the cow than you can by twisting her tail.

What will become of this country from the standpoint of the home user of coal? What will become of it industrially, what will become of it in the conduct of the war if such action is taken here as will materially reduce the output of coal? Out of 300 working days, the mines run last year but 230. By permitting them to run at their full capacity 259 days this year they will produce enough coal to supply the needs of this country generally, and the needs of the allies in the conduct of the war. But you have got to permit them to run. The operators have got to have men and they have got to have cars. They have got to have such a price for their coal as will permit them to operate. Does the President mean to fix the price of coal at $1.50 per ton at the mouth of the mine? Does the President propose to fix the same price for all the mines, not taking into account the quality of coal, not taking into account the thickness of the vein, not taking into account the labor conditions; is the price going to be uniformly fixed? If so, the plan is already doomed to failure. Let me read to you part of the Federal Trade Commission's report of a few days ago:

> All the nations at war have relieved coal miners from military duty, urging that their greatest service to the State can be performed by remaining at their regular employment.

Let me pause long enough to say that the nations at war, whether on the side of the allies or whether on the side of the central powers—all the countries engaged in the war—if the report of the Federal Trade Commission can be relied upon, have relieved from military duty the coal miners of those various countries. But the attitude of this Government toward the coal miners of our country is upon an entirely different footing. In other words, they are not relieved from military duty under the conscript law passed by this Congress, over my protest some time ago. The ranks of the miners are already being seriously depleted by the lack of steady employment, by big wages paid in munition plants and other employments; and now you propose to further deplete them, contrary to the policy and experience of every other country engaged in the war, by sending them to the front to shoot and be shot at. Let me read you further what the Federal Trade Commission says about this:

> Already in this country the ranks of the miners are being seriously depleted by enlistment.
>
> Many remedies have been urged upon the commission. Government ownership or at least Government operation is argued by many, but perhaps the most common is the suggestion that the Government fix prices at the mines. This suggestion has been carefully considered and it seems clear that unless a uniform price is fixed each ton of coal will have to be followed through to the consumer lest any given ton be retailed at a price based upon the price fixed for the highest cost mine.
>
> If a uniform price were fixed, many mines will be shut down unless the price is high enough to make the highest cost mine profitable. Such a price, in operation, might be found unfair as to the public and especially as to the railroads. No remedy will be effective that does not include constant employment to labor and at fair wages; maximum production of all equipped mines, fair profits to all mine owners, and prompt, equitable, and economical distribution to all consumers, both domestic and industrial.
>
> It would seem that steady employment, fair compensation to labor and capital, equitable distribution, and stable prices could be secured by pooling all coal and coke production in the hands of the Government.
>
> If the producer at each mine were paid his full cost of production with allowance for depletion, maintenance, upkeep, and all the usual items, and to this were added a fixed and uniform net profit per ton, with due regard to quality, the coal thus produced at widely varying costs, if pooled, could be sold through the Government at an average and uniform price, quality considered, which would be entirely tolerable to the consuming public, and a price much lower than could be fixed if an effort were made to fix a uniform price to the producer.
> Such a method would require careful supervision as to economical operation, but this task and the expense involved in performing it will be very small in proportion to the net saving gained to the Nation. As a matter of practice, many large contracts are being made on a basis of cost or production plus an agreed profit.

It will be observed that the Federal Trade Commission strongly advises against attempting to fix a uniform price of coal at the mouth of the mines, as is the intention of the President, if he has not been misrepresented and misunderstood.

It would mean ruin to the coal industry, and therefore ruin to the country, to fix a uniform price at the mouth of the mines unless that price was fixed sufficiently high to save the small producers and the operators of small veins of coal. To do this, the price would be so high as would likely work some hardship on the country generally.

There seems to me to be but few solutions to this coal problem: One is for the Government to pool all the coal at a fixed net price, but pay each operator "his full cost of production, with allowance for depletion, maintenance, upkeep," and a "fair profit," as the Federal Trade Commission recommends, but in order for this plan to work there would have to be both a maximum wholesale and retail price; and another is to leave the trade to the law of supply and demand. But neither of these methods will prove effective if left solely to themselves, as this bill proposes to leave the price fixing. The mere fixing of a price of coal per ton is not enough, even if the price fixed were satisfactory. The operators have got to have men, and they have got to have transportation. Without these no price fixing will amount to anything. Let me read to you what the Federal Trade Commission says on this subject:

> The pooling of coal in the hands of a Government agency would still be ineffective either as to distribution or as to the promotion of a maximum of production unless similar control extended over all means of transportation, both rail and water, and to meet this the pooling of railroads and boat lines is clearly indicated. The railroads of the country, if operated as a unit and on Government account, could be used to transport coal and other products by the most direct route to their point of destination, and the efficiency of the roads themselves, and of existing rolling stock and of motive power would be vastly increased.
> The operation both of the mines and of the transportation agencies could be carried on by the present employees and officials, and after the war they could be returned unimpaired to private operation.

In other words, the coal operators have got to have railroad cars in which to ship their coal. They must have cars on the spot as the coal is gotten out, because they have no facilities for storing the coal. In fact, there is no storage room anywhere for 90 per cent of the coal produced.

And let me say here that there are plenty of cars if the operators could only get hold of them; and there are operations a plenty to produce all the coal we need if they were but given a chance. What the Federal Trade Commission says on this subject after full investigation ought to carry great weight. Let me read from their report of June 19, 1917:

> The present production of bituminous coal the country over is about 40 per cent short of the possible maximum, and this limitation is solely to be charged, as to primary cause, to faulty rail transportation. The present demand for coal is unprecedented, but the mines now open are capable of filling this demand if adequate car supply is furnished.
>
> It is a fact in the bituminous industry that the capacity of a mine for production and the capacity of labor is limited absolutely by the supply from day to day of coal cars for the moving of the product. Thus we have found that, with the market at unheard-of prices, labor is often standing idle at the mines and production is limited as compared with the possible productive capacity.
>
> We find that mine labor is being disorganized by reason of irregular employment and forced idleness, and that in some fields bituminous mines are working only three or four days a week and that willing labor and willing operators are standing idle half the time.
>
> In other fields where there is now a more nearly adequate car supply the irregularity of car supply in months past has so disorganized and discouraged labor that these mines are not now nearly at full capacity of production. The irregularity and uncertainty of employment has caused the miners to be tempted to leave the mines and go into other employment, and, having left, it is difficult to bring them back.
> The commission believes that there are enough coal cars in the country but that there are not enough coal cars delivered to the mines, and that, an adequate supply having been delivered to the mines and loaded, these cars are not moved to the point of consumption either with the greatest of expedition nor are they promptly discharged upon their arrival at their destination.
> The commission has much testimony of widespread abuse in the use of coal cars by speculators for the storage of coal for speculative purposes, and that the practice of reconsignment is wasteful and a cause of delay and market manipulation.
> The commission finds that coal is not sent to the point of consumption by the most direct route, and that coal cars are being used for transportation of many other sorts of product.

Here we have the trouble in a nutshell. Listen further to what the Federal Trade Commission says:

> The coal problem can not be worked out so long as the railroads are permitted to divide and allot traffic; to lay embargoes without regard to their immediate effect upon industry or upon the systematic distribution of coal; to give priority to the movement of high freight rate commodities; and to use the device of "long haul."

How do you expect and how does the President expect to solve the coal problem by merely fixing a price on coal? This bill does not attempt to solve the problem of transportation, yet the coal problem can not be solved without it. My district is rich in coal. My constituents are vitally interested in the coal provisions of this bill; the operators are interested; the miners are interested; the farmers are interested; the owners of land having coal under it are interested; my district generally is interested; and I shall do all I can to have eliminated from this bill its unfair provisions. Many of them, if the bill comes to final passage as it now stands, I do not feel like I can afford to vote against; some of them I do not feel like I can afford to vote for; but I will have to vote either for or against when the time comes. [Applause.]

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. Speaker, the present moment is big with the future. The Nation waits expectant, breath holding. Our glance is forward; the past has no precedent. Our burdens as a Nation seem almost greater than we can bear. Everywhere undercurrents of bitter feeling. Strife secretly festering. Greed taking new and ugly forms. Revolt and overthrow of all manner of oppression in the very air. All around distrust and suspicion.

The blanket charge is made on every hand that Congress is fiddling, wasting time. The man in the street does not know that the House has passed in record time the war resolution, the selective-conscription bill, the revenue bill, the aviation bill, trading with the enemy, the espionage bill, the food-survey and food-control bills; in short, every one of the administration's war measures, with the utmost minimum of debate consistent with honest endeavor to frame bills that would bear the weight of the future. If the critics would refer their charges specifically to the Senate instead of blanketing Congress, it would let the country know where the hitch is. The food, feeds, and fuel bill was ready for the Senate in plenty of time for it to be passed by July 1. Yet, with the certain knowledge that every day is a day of gold to the enemy, there has been this indefensible delay. If their deliberation were to the improvement of the people's condition it would be endurable. But nearly every change in the revenue measure has been to the detriment of the plain people. Instead of remedying the defects in their proposed revenue bill (which they virtuously claim is the reason for delay), instead of removing the injustices with which it is full, they are only serving to heap further the burden on the shoulders of the poor and take away from the obligation of the rich in their attempt to usurp the functions of the House in originating revenue measures. They make of it a rich man's bill. Those who can afford it should pay for this war.

My heart sickens at the thought of millions of people waiting patiently, hoping against hope that something will be done by the men they sent down here to care for their interests, while the disgusting spectacle of personal squabbles and persistent obstruction continues. The lower House was through weeks ago with the war legislation; we are now compelled to mark time waiting for the Senate to catch up. Having completed our bit, having done our uttermost, we say, "We are helpless. Our hands are tied. We have finished our work and can do nothing more." But the people do not like helpless Congressmen. All they know is that the revenue bill has not been passed and the loan is almost gone; the food-survey bill, passed weeks ago by the House, is still hung up; the aviation bill was allowed to drag along, though France is imploring us to send aviators to save her. And, worst of all, there is a bitter struggle in conference, further delaying the food bill, already delayed six weeks, with its provision for cheaper food and fuel, though July 1 is passed and the southern crops are moving into the speculators' hands, for the troublesome Members of the other body have thrown a monkey wrench into the machinery. Food gamblers have already cornered the tin-plate output. Canned goods to-day are higher than fresh. Overnight, without reason, they vault upward. And now, instead of proceeding with the revenue bill, which would net the Treasury better than $500,000 a day, clear the streams of trade, settle the method of raising the revenue, and put business on a firm foundation, they took up the river and harbor bill and squabbled over the distribution of "pork," when there is still in the Treasury unexpended for river and harbor purposes $33,000,000—plenty of money for emergency care of navigable rivers and harbors.

And with but two days' discussion, passed it last Thursday, 50 to 11, with 35 not voting. Exhausted with lugging large burdens of "pork" to their respective States, they feel it incumbent to take two days' rest, adjourning over till to-day, though the country is demanding their immediate consideration of the revenue bill.

It is the House every time that has sustained the President, and vigorously and with patriotic promptness pushed his measures to decision.

What does it profit us to pass remedial measures here in the House when they must be turned and picked and prodded an endless time at the other end of the Capitol, then be returned to us with every particle of effectiveness extracted, every chance of benefit crushed?

The food, feed, and fuel bill contains a provision that holds out a hope for the relief of the fuel situation of the Northwest, acutely threatening to-day. The coal supply at the head of the Lakes is over 2,000,000 tons short. Many boats come empty to Duluth. There should be 10 cargoes a day, whereas only 3 are received. If the needs of the northwestern winter are to be met, the Northwest must be supplied while boats can ply the Lakes. Unless the docks are filled up by the beginning of September, the chances of accumulating enough coal before the close of navigation are small. There must be sufficient freight cars released by the railroad committee of the Council of National Defense to enable mine operators to supply northwestern needs.

The people are clamoring for relief. If the Government can not get action from the railroads, or a decent price per ton for soft coal and bituminous coal, it had better take over mines and railroads, and take a hand at running the business itself. For four months Great Britain has controlled the coal mines.

There is no reason for a great increase per ton at the mines. The report of the Federal Trade Commission on the coal situation shows that in 13 companies the increase in operating costs and general expense has been 28 cents since 1913, most of it since April, 1916, namely, increase in labor is 15 cents; supplies, 2 cents; general expense, 11 cents. An increase of 28 cents does not justify a leap to $4.50 to $5 per ton at the mouth of the mines. The cost of production has increased less than 25 per cent, while the selling price has increased 300 to 400 per cent. The mines threaten to close if they are not given their price. More "pay"-triotism. Let them close. The Government should find a way to open and run them. The dollar mania enfrenzies these men. They can see nothing but their dream of wealth. No consideration of suffering in their fellow creatures or necessity of their Government appeals to them. The only club they can feel is a hit at their own interest. They will bow to nothing but fear. Traitor is not too strong a word for them, and a traitor's punishment is their dessert.

What will the Northwest face this winter if the coal famine is not averted? Schools and factories must shut down, factories that supply war material and necessities and furnish labor must suspend, apartment houses will suffer lack, and the misery among the poor is unbearable to contemplate.

What matter if food and fuel be denied the weary laborer? There is no more burning necessity in America to-day than the question of food and fuel investigation and control. There should have been, months ago, action on this question to alleviate the suffering increasing from day to day. The people back home will not be fooled by the wolves of Wall Street. The philanderers and slackers and players of party politics shall feel the whip of public scorn and obloquy and impatience for obstructing this measure.

It is amusing to hear Wall Street come to the aid of the farmer. I got a letter from a Wall Street firm this morning crying out against the quack legislation of the food bill that was going to harm the poor farmer. The farmer has nothing to lose but everything to gain. He is assured of a minimum price of $2 in this bill; he is not obliged to sell. It is not the farmer that objects; it is Wall Street that objects. But it is not Wall Street we want represented so faithfully. We, the American people, do not believe that it is our duty to let our property and our lives be confiscated by these great combinations and money powers, these trusts, these monopolies.

All over the country the greed and selfishness of the food pirates is the cause of untold suffering and misery among the poorer classes. There is no punishment too great for him who coins his countrymen's necessity into gold, who is so devoid of conscience as to ruthlessly involve his country, already in deep peril, in worse danger.

There is no hope for that national spirit we need so much, for that broad democracy and equitable distribution of wealth that is the dream of those who love their fellow men, while speculators and food hoarders continue to gouge the public to the tune of $110,000,000 a month, while good food is permitted to rot to boost up the price, though the plain people starve. Bread can be bought in France, 35 ounces for a little over 8 cents in our money; in Belgium, 35 ounces for 11 cents; and in England, 4 cents a pound, all of which is made from our grain, while we are being gouged 10 cents for a supposedly 14-ounce loaf.

It is not alone the food of the plain people that is being boosted out of reach by the frenzied, money-mad ring; their very means of livelihood is in jeopardy. By an underground concerted movement in every field clothing, manufactured articles, every necessary, has been artificially, without rhyme or reason, raised to the "nth" price. Every article and material needed in the building and allied trades has been advanced, in some cases, up to 300 per cent. People are not building. They can not afford to have remodeling or painting done.

The architects and builders already feel the slump. Carpenters and painters are out of work and have a prospect of remaining so when nails and laths and plaster, lumber and paint and glass and steel are flying up, up, up.

The price of food went up 9 per cent in the month of April, and has been steadily going higher. In the absence of food control corn went from $1.60 to $2.25 a bushel since the last of June. There will be a day of reckoning for the dilly-dallying failure to enact legislation that will check these pirates. The children of America are undernourished; they are crying for bread. Will it make their fathers more patriotic when they feel little hands tugging at their coats and hear hunger in little voices, when they realize that Uncle Sam can hear the voices of babies across the sea but is indifferent to the wail of his own little citizens?

Patriotism does not thrive on an empty stomach. This is a war of defense. Our defense should begin while we can fight it out in the other fellow's back yard before it can spread to our shores. The people, owing to the peculiar diplomatic relations of the world, do not grasp that our own hide is ultimately at stake; hence this is not a popular war, and its popularity is little enhanced by the actions of the body at the other end of the Capitol who are so careful to protect the pocketbook and the income and the business of the poor, unfortunate rich.

This maddening and deadly delay is putting it further and further out of power to remedy the situation. It is so much easier to initiate an abuse than it is to stop it. It takes raw, bald effrontery and initiative to do what the food gamblers are doing. It will take centralization, one man, a man of successful experience, keen initiative, with ample authority back of him, to cope with them.

In Herbert Hoover there is such a man, to our hand, trained by the providence of circumstance; who brought order out of one chaos; who has already made a success in managing a nation's food supply. What difference does his previous experience make against the big fact that he has done and done well this one thing we now need to have done in America? No one needs be jealous of the appreciation this man has earned.

There has not been one act of patriotism to thrill the blood in all this machine-made war. How far we have strayed into lip service when we contrast our terms of patriotism with those in the warring nations on the other side. Perhaps, when we feel the whip of necessity, we shall awaken. The only hopeful thing, the only redeeming ray in all this national sordidness, scramble for place, and general inefficiency is the glorious response of the majority of our youth to their country's call. Last Friday I visited our boys at Quantico; 556 from the North Star State, together with 3,500 other marines. Have you seen the ranks of splendid boys, springing along in their strength and pride? Have you seen them drilling with stern, set purpose? What did their faces tell you? The sturdy tread, the click and stamp of their guns, the crash of their bare palms in the setting-up exercises to me spell devotion, consecration, patriotic love for this old country of ours; this country, good enough for any man to die for. Can a man have greater love than this, that he be willing to lay down his life for his country; that he sacrifice his future prospects in business, in education, in family, and all he holds dear? Wealth ought never to hesitate to weigh itself in the balance with such red-blood sacrifice! There are worse things than death. What good is life if we can not live it and be free?

The only remedy for a hideous gathering abscess is the surgeon's lance. Will the war be a lance to the grievous sores of our modern life? We can not go on in this way. It is inconceivable that as the masses of the people wax more and more intelligent they will endure to be entangled more and more in the chains of economic slavery.

We thought the war impossible. "England will never go to war," we said. And then we whispered in our hearts, "The United States will never be dragged into this conflict." Perhaps we are even now saying the Russian disintegration will never find a counterpart here. It should not require a prophet to see that certain things must be provided before grim winter adds its terrors to the already too hard life of the poor, namely, the cost of the war must be laid on incomes, liquor, and excess and war profits; drastic regulation of food gambling must be enacted; fuel must be restored to its normal price; high prices that have been artificially made must be cut; greed must be bankrupted or put behind bars.

What is the good of telling the housekeeper to save a teaspoonful of beef roast when at 40 cents a pound beef roast is hard to come by? The laborer needs no advice to put a meatless day in his already meatless week. It does not save the consumer's purse to add 10 cents to his restaurant bill for bread and butter.

Industrial and commercial abuses to-day permitted to go unthrottled are so great that the integrity of this Nation is menaced. The resources of this rich, rich country are being diverted into the capacious maw of a few corporations. These same corporations reach their long, grizzly arms in, make and control too many lawmakers, both State and National. Big business is all powerful. They suggest legislation. Shall we wait until the aggression, becoming too open and shameless, the people raise a mighty uproar at the high-handed piracy? Shall we suffer the senseless, devastating sweep of anarchy when just a little forethought, just a little prescience, just a little consideration for our brother man would suffice? It takes very little to satisfy him.

Simple justice is all he asks. The law of compensation is bound to have its toll, and through the very streets that Siberian exiles were knouted on their way the aristocrat now slinks and shivers. Will power be as stupid in its exercise of autocracy as mob violence ever shows itself to be? Power wastes our human wealth, outraged and exploited masses wreak their fury on material wealth.

We must learn the lesson of renunciation, or the bold leader of the Industrial Workers of the World may seek to carry out his threat that his troop shall take a hand at misrule. The difference between the privateering of his class and the present robber band is that in his case universal and undiscriminating destruction rages, and no one is benefited. At least, under the present methods a remarkable system of efficiency is growing up, without wasting material; a curse this system is unless it shall be tempered with the quality of mercy. It is easy to believe, in these days of cataclysmic changes, that all that does not adapt itself to the world good shall pass away.

True greatness is true service in humanity's onward course. The effort of the human race has always been for liberty. As the deeds of a nation aid or antagonize progress, so is it glorified or cursed by the judgment of time.

And the greater need right now is that the soul of us all shall be quickened to the absolute need of sacrifice. Things seen are mightier than things heard. As long as the tragedy of battle is distant from our shores it is hard to sense its actualities.

We have a long way to go to understanding. We devise fine-sounding slogans, and repeat them. Our women, fashionably gowned and jeweled, gather around the tea table and make bandages or knit. But when it comes to real sacrifice, we have not tasted it; we are not considering it; it has become no part of our national life. Our energies are content to be dissipated in futile fads. Why is it that Germany is licking the world? It is because every man, woman, and child within her borders feels that they are at war. Whether anybody is watching them or not, they are devoting their life to the nation at war. "Du sollst entbehren, sollst entbehren!" (Sacrifice, sacrifice!) Goethe's immortal refrain beats out in their daily lives. There the war is the nation's business, to which every energy, every nerve, is strained. Here the war is the treasure ground of certain members of big business, the speculator in foodstuffs. If this war weeds out the drones in this country, from I. W. W. hobo to society trifler, it will be a precious thing. The day of trivial things is passing. Nonessentials must drop below the surface. This is not a war of conquest. America has nothing to gain from entering the war, except the preservation of her codes of liberty, and her influence to that end among the nations of the world. And we must not let party questions rise up between us and our patriotic duty.

Let us be thrifty, frugal, patriotic, ready to sacrifice. Let selfishness and individualism bow to the good of the whole Nation. Let us leave nothing to chance, and let the prime business of each of us be waging and winning the war. Let us bear necessary suffering cheerfully, but do not let us endure, nay, invite, unnecessary suffering for the poor by delaying any longer to take this most necessary step. American energy can make possible the impossible. It is necessary for us to realize our dangers, abandon our narrow, selfish horizon. The miracle has been wrought in France; it must take place here.

Wars have been won heretofore by the superiority of one instrument, a catapult, a musket, an infantry or cavalry formation, a monitor, a knived chariot has spelled victory. This war to the uttermost of mechanical invention digs into the earth, lurks beneath the sea, weaves into the clouds, and lays tribute not on one weapon, but on every form of activity that can be focused on an enemy. It is the migration of nations to the front. It will be won by superior mechanism, supported by supremest courage and supremest faith and sacrifice. [Applause.]

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Speaker, at the outset I wish to express my profound appreciation to those who so graciously granted me time to speak on this occasion.

We are now engaged in the greatest conflict of all the ages. The issues at stake are tremendous and of far-reaching influence on our country and all mankind. The welfare of every inhabitant of the globe is dependent upon the outcome. We have been overwhelmed by the mighty and ever-advancing tide of human affairs. We have been borne forward on the surge and flow of the great ocean of events in this and other countries for the last three years.

The situation in the main is not of our own making. Yet, we are destined to play a heroic part in the greatest drama of recorded time. To our care and keeping, largely, have been confided the perpetuation of the principles of free institutions among the sons of men.

A spirit of uncertainly now broods above a troubled world. For weal or woe, for good or ill, the die has been cast. Diplomacy has failed. The time for polished phrases and glowing rhetoric has passed. The hour for action is at hand.

The deathless memories of heroic achievements that hover over our historic battle fields beckon us on. The sacred traditions that almost deify the fathers, the saviors and the soldiers of the Republic call us to duty. The strains of discord that now and then arise from the crowded thoroughfares of our great cities will ultimately be lost in the grand refrain of a unified country as the war progresses.

This generation will not be found recreant to the trust confided to it. When the history of this period is written I am sure that it will be recorded as in the days of the past, "The American Republic never retreats." [Applause].

Since the fateful 6th day of April Congress has dealt with some of the most momentous legislation in the history of the Republic; in fact, in the annals of all time. Many of the questions have been new and of far-reaching influence on the welfare and destinies of our people.

The legislation that has been passed during the last four months affects directly or indirectly every inhabitant of the Republic. It touches "every living heart and hearthstone all over this broad land" of ours.

Never has a greater task confronted a legislative body. In the turmoil and the excitement of the hour it is important that we do not loose sight of the fundamentals that underlie the foundations of free institutions.

Never has preparation for war been inaugurated on so gigantic a scale.

Billions of dollars have been appropriated. Millions of men have been provided for.

Never before has important legislation passed Congress with greater facility and with less factional friction.

Many propositions have been urged and debated. Many schemes have been suggested. Many plans, the products of many minds, have been presented.

Some have been slow to enter this war, but this in itself should not be a ground for condemnation.

As one of America's greatest patriots said on the floor of this House on a similar occasion:

> Surely there was more evidence of the patriotism of the man who, doubting the expediency and even the entire justice of the war, nevertheless supported it because it was the war of his country. In the one it might be mere enthusiasm and an impetuous temperament; in the other it was true patriotism, a sense of duty. Homer represents Hector as strongly doubting the expediency of the war against Greece, gave his advice against it, had no sympathy with Paris, whom he bitterly reproached, much less with Helen; yet, when the war came and the Grecian forces were marshaled on the plain and their crooked keels were seen cutting the sands of the Trojan coast, Hector was a flaming fire; his beaming helmet was seen in the thickest of the fight. There are in America many who have the spirit of Hector, who strongly doubt the propriety of war, and especially the manner of its commencement, who yet are ready to pour out their hearts' best blood like water and their lives with it on a foreign shore in defense of the American flag and American glory.

Some have differed with the President as to the policies to be pursued after the war was declared.

They have felt that while it is necessary to cooperate with the entente powers that "entangling alliances" should be avoided if possible, thus keeping in mind the Farewell Address, the last public admonition, of Washington to his countrymen before he stood in the presence of his Maker.

Some have thought that the President should state more clearly the objects and aims of the war.

In this respect the President complied with this general sentiment in his message to Russia, made public June 10; and on June 15 the Committee on Public Information, consisting of the Secretary of State, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and George Creel, issued a pamphlet entitled "How the war came to America."

Some of the great patriotic newspapers of this country still believe, and now advocate, that there should be a revision of the war aims of the entente powers.

They urge that "the effect, not only in Russia but in America, would be to drive indifference and opposition out of camp." They believe that our Government should take the initiative in this matter.

They realize that this Nation is now engaged in a world movement and that oneness in thought and action among our people is essential. We should be masters of the situation; we should be directors of the storm.

We have been called upon in the name of "freedom" to assume the dual rôles of the advocates of war, as a means to an end, and of the devotees of peace, as the spirit of our age, in the greatest drama of world events ever staged on the theater of human action.

Some believe that in downing autocracy abroad we should not jeopardize the freedom of the free at home.

Some believe that free speech and liberty of the press should remain inviolate as guaranteed by the Constitution o our country.

That the people should know the truth, and the truth will keep them free.

A majority of the Members of Congress have already voiced their adherence to this doctrine.

Some believe that those who are being daily enriched by this war should bear a large part of the financial load instead of imposing it upon the ordinary man, those who really bear upon their shoulders the burdens of the world in war and peace. In short, that every inhabitant of the Republic should bear his equitable burden of taxation.

Some believe that the Constitution of our country is in force at all times and under all circumstances; that it is a bulwark of safety in times of peace and a citadel of refuge in times of storm.

This position finds confirmation in a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. In the case of Ex parte Milligan it is written:

> Every act of Congress passed during war times must square with the Constitution.
> The Constitution of the United States is a law for rulers and people, equally in war and in peace, and covers with the shield of its protection all classes of men, at all times and under all circumstances.

Some believe that the executive branch of our Government has of late in some instances been encroaching upon the legislative branch.

Some believe that these two great branches should work in harmony, and yet that each branch should exercise the functions and perform the duties under the authority and within the limitations granted to each by the Constitution.

All agree, or should agree, that our gallant troops now on foreign soil are entitled to and should receive the support and protection of the American Congress and the American people to the uttermost. [Applause.]

It should be further understood, and all should have faith, that this solemn guarantee is behind all those who are now engaged in or may hereafter be a part of the Military and Naval Establishments of this Government in the further progress of the war.

Some believe that in a number of instances the administration forces have asked for too much power. Others believe that the Executive should be granted all the power demanded during the present war.

All agree, or should agree, that the Executive should be granted the necessary and proper authority and power as President of the United States and as Commander in Chief of the American forces to carry on and prosecute the war to an early and successful termination. [Applause.]

To grant more would tend to usurpation. To grant less would be evidence of weakness and in the end suicidal.

The President said, "This is a people's war." Ah, Mr. Speaker, how true this is! Whatever may be done by the President and Congress as public servants must finally be reviewed by the sovereign people.

All great questions in this country must have the approval or disapproval of an enlightened public opinion. Its decrees are inexorable. It is no respecter of persons, fame, or fortune. It can not be restrained. Its presence can not always be detected or felt. It evades close analysis and investigation. Yet on its footsteps millions wait, and on its decisions momentous questions hang. [Applause.]

Not here in the Halls of Congress during these momentous days is the fate of nations to be ultimately determined. Not here in the stately mansions of place and power is the destiny of the Republic to be finally decreed. Not here in Washington in the sweltering heat of summer are all these great measures to be fully settled; but by the firesides of twenty millions of homes, scattered all over this great Republic—on the broad prairies of the West, and in the hamlets and cities throughout the land, away from the roar and tumult incident to the preparations for war, in the seclusion of the household, in the quiet eventide, with father and mother surrounded by their children, with the thoughts of loved ones and country, with reverence for the fathers and saviors of the Nation and their mighty deeds, with solicitude for the present and future of our Nation's welfare, with the fires of patriotism aglow in their hearts, is to be found the serenity of mind, the communion of souls, the sincerity of purpose, the absence of guile, where God in His infinite mercy, justice, and wisdom finally prepares and decrees the destiny of all mankind, living under the banner which exemplifies the freedom of the free, wherever it floats, the whole wide world around. [Applause.]

In this troubled hour may the American people rise serenely to the supremest test ever imposed upon a democracy. [Applause.] May we go courageously forward to the end.

Mr. Speaker, to me "Americanism" is one of the grandest words in the English language. It has become symbolical of civil and religious liberty on the Western Continent. It represents the shining goal toward which the human race has been tending since time began. [Applause.]

We find epitomized in it the struggles, the hopes, the dreams, and the aspirations of man for better days and better things since the time when he cringed and crawled in the dens and caverns of barbarism, and groped and felt his way through the long night of the stagnant centuries toward the dawn of a grander day up to the present hour when we behold him revealed, standing upright, with the sunlight of heaven in his face, or walking with uncovered head beneath the silent stars, contemplating as to the handiwork of the Creator and the betterment of the human race.

The true fundamentals of Americanism are based upon the teachings of the Lowly Nazarene.

In fact, a quarter of a century ago it was said by one of America's greatest statesmen:

> When Christ proclaimed to the world the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man, and the priceless value of the humblest human soul, He made tyrants and despots tremble on their thrones. He laid the foundations of democratic self-government and the sovereignty of the people. From His teachings have come the emancipation of childhood, the elevation of woman, and our rich and splendid heritage of religious, civil, and constitutional liberty.

Americanism is the new civilization.

Americanism has become synonymous with the spirit of civil and religious freedom throughout the world. With us and all thinking men Americanism has become like a mighty and ever-widening stream. Its source lies hidden somewhere in the swamps and lowlands of barbarism. Its origin is coeval with the human race. It has been fed by passing clouds that drop their garnered fullness down, by innumerable rills that gush from the mountainside, by springs that well up into its unseen depths, and by subterranean rivers that joyously swell its ever-increasing volume as it moves on in solemn majesty toward the eternal sea.

It wanders through every land, permeates every soil, and touches all the shores of thought. Sometimes its course has been through pleasant fields bestrewn with Nature's rarest gifts. Sometimes it has been o'erhung with embowering trees that fleck its surface with tremulous and ever-changing shadows. Sometimes it flows through the forest depths, by cave and woodland dell. Sometimes through deep morass, or canyon wild, or plunges over the cataract's brink to the level far below. Sometimes it has been temporarily dammed or obstructed by driftwood or débris, but the ever-swelling tide, chafing at delay, finally overcomes all obstacles and throws off all restraint. Sometimes it flows by the princely palaces of the rich or the straw-thatched cottages of the poor. Its course is ever onward.

At its touch parched areas blossom and become fertile again. Upon its borders grow every flower that graces a true Christian civilization; and there, too, may be found the full fruitage of every plant and shrub and tree which springs spontaneous from the soils of equal opportunity and individual effort.

"On its broad bosom float a thousand barks. There genius spreads its every purpling sails. There poetry dips its silver oar." There opportunity sparkles from the crest of every wave. There art, invention, discovery, science, morality, and religion may safely and securely float.

On its surface serenely rides our ship of state, amid the storms of war, unchecked by devious currents or adverse winds that blow. "The hopes of humanity are hanging breathless on its fate." The waters at times seem troubled, but our course is plain. An enlightened public opinion is our pilot and our grand Constitution is our chart and compass. I trust that the fine conception of the great poet may be realized:

> Thou, too, sail on, O ship of state!
> Sail on, O Union, strong and great!
> Humanity with all its fears,
> With all the hopes of future years,
> Is hanging breathless on thy fate!
> We know what Master laid thy keel,
> What Workman wrought thy ribs of steel!
> Who made each mast, and sail, and rope,
> What anvils rang, what hammers beat,
> In what a forge and what a heat
> Were shaped the anchors of thy hope!

[Applause.]

Let the stream of Americanism flow on until it engulfs the world. Let it flow on until all the races and all the children of men shall receive its blessings and enjoy its energizing and revivifying influences. Let it flow on until it ends with the consummation of all things earthly at the throne of God. [Applause.]

SENATE.

TUESDAY, July 31, 1917.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, Thou hast called us into being as a Nation. Thou hast gathered together many of the different kindred and blood of the peoples of the earth and shaped and fashioned them into a mighty Republic of the west. We thank Thee that the inspirations which are before us are not limited to the traditions of any line of blood, but that the passions of humanity are the passions of our great Nation. Grant us, we pray Thee, to see with clear vision the path over which Thou wouldst lead us, and that out of this Nation Thou wouldst send forth a mighty force to gather the nations into the larger brotherhood and lift the world to a higher life. May we feel that there is a divine mission and purpose in our national life. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. VARDAMAN and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by G. F. Turner, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 2695) to authorize the construction, maintenance, and operation of a bridge across Little River, at or near the foot of the gar hole about one-half mile south of the Jonesboro, Lake City & Eastern Railway bridge across Little River, Ark.

The message also announced that the House disagrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4285) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SMALL, Mr. BOOHER, and Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa managers of the conference on the part of the House.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 3331) for the protection of desert-land entrymen who enter the military or naval service of the United States in time of war, and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CUMMINS. I present two resolutions of the General Assembly of the State of Iowa, one relating to universal military training and the other relating to the term of enlistment of the National Guard. I ask that they be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The resolutions were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Concurrent resolution.

Be it resolved by the senate (the house concurring):

Whereas this Nation must at last face the stark and naked truth that to-day we are virtually at war with a foreign power; and

Whereas the one great principle that is to be determined in the stupendous conflict that is now devastating the civilized world is whether or not government of the people, by the people, and for the people shall not perish from the earth; and

Whereas the blood of our breed, all the way from Bunker Hill to Appomattox Courthouse and Manila Bay, has been gladly, willingly, and joyously spent in the preservation and defense of the God-given principle that the people and not the kings or classes shall rule: Therefore be it

Resolved by the senate (the house concurring), That at this moment in the world's history, when the inevitable conflict between democracy and despotism has arrived at its supreme test, and with as full a realization of the import and solemnity of our action as that which inspired our forefathers who enunciated the Declaration of Independence that has made this world a livable place for the common people, we, the senators and representatives in the Thirty-seventh General Assembly of Iowa, conscientiously believing that we hereby express the will and sentiment of our State, call upon the Congress of the United States at once, and before it is too late, to enact into law a bill that provides for such general military training in this Nation to the end that the blood of our forefathers shall not have been shed in vain and that constitutional government, bought by that blood, may yet survive; be it further

Resolved, That engrossed copies of this resolution be, and they are hereby, ordered transmitted to the President of the United States, to the Hon. ALBERT B. CUMMINS and the Hon. WILLIAM S. KENYON, Senators of the State of Iowa, and to each of the Members of Congress from the State of Iowa.

ERNEST R. MOORE,
President of the Senate.
M. B. PITT,
Speaker of the House.

I hereby certify that this concurrent resolution originated in the senate.

THOMAS WALTERS, Jr.,
Secretary of the Senate.

Approved by the senate, March 20, A. D. 1917.
House concurred, April 2, A. D. 1917.

Concurrent resolution.

Be it resolved by the Senate of the General Assembly of the State of Iowa (the House concurring), That—

Whereas, under section 69 of chapter 134 of the first session of the Sixty-fourth Congress of 1916, it is provided as to enlistments in the National Guard that the same shall be for six years, the first three of which shall be in the active organization and the remaining three in the National Guard Reserve; and

Whereas this long period of enlistment is deterring many from enlisting in the service who otherwise would gladly enlist for the period of the world-wide war in which we are engaged: Be it

Resolved by the Senate of the General Assembly of the State of Iowa (the House concurring), That we hereby respectfully petition Congress, at present in special session, to promptly amend the said law by striking out the six-year period of enlistment and substituting therefor provisions for enlistment in the National Guard service during the period of our present war with Germany;

And that an engrossed copy of this resolution be sent to the Hon. A. B. CUMMINS and Hon. W. S. KENYON, United States Senators from Iowa, and to each of the honorable Representatives in Congress from the State of Iowa.

ERNEST R. MOORE,
President of the Senate.
M. B. PITT,
Speaker of the House.

I hereby certify that this concurrent resolution originated in the senate.

THOMAS WALTERS, Jr.,
Secretary of the Senate.

Adopted by the senate, April 10, A. D. 1917.
House concurred, April 10, A. D. 1917.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives, disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4285) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House, and requesting a conference of the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. FLETCHER. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, agree to the conference asked for by the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to, and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. FLETCHER, Mr. RANSDELL, and Mr. NELSON conferees on the part of the Senate.

ENLISTMENT OF ALIEN RESIDENTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business is closed.

Mr. STONE. I ask unanimous consent to call up Senate resolution 108 and have the same laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read Senate resolution 108, reported yesterday by Mr. MCCUMBER, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, as follows:

Whereas there are in the United States a vast number of subjects and citizens of the several European nations now waging war against the allied central powers of Europe; and

Whereas nearly all of said subjects and citizens have emigrated to this country either for the purpose of becoming citizens thereof, or for the purpose of securing the benefits of the greater wages and better opportunities afforded in this country, which opportunities have been created, defended, and maintained by the energies and sacrifices of the American people; and

Whereas it is the moral and patriotic duty of said subjects and citizens to support the several Governments to which they owe allegiance in the desperate warfare in which such Governments are engaged; and

Whereas the United States is also engaged in war against the said central powers, for the protection of the rights of the several nations so waging war against the said central powers, as well as its own sacred rights; and

Whereas it is most unjust to ask or require the American people to sacrifice their sons, their brothers, and their treasure in battling for the mutual rights and welfare of all the other nations prosecuting this war against the said central powers while their own subjects and citizens in vast numbers enjoying in this country the special and wonderful industrial opportunities which this war affords them are wholly relieved from service or sacrifice: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to propose to all European nations engaged in war against the said central powers and, if possible, secure from them an agreement authorizing and empowering the United States to apply the provisions of the act entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917, to all such subjects and citizens domiciled in this country in the same manner and to the same effect as such provisions are applied to the citizens of the United States in selecting and raising an army or navy for service in the present war.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none.

Mr. STONE. I ask that the Secretary may read the report submitted by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], who offered the resolution and made the report. I think it unnecessary in reading the report to read the resolution copied into the report, but just the remainder of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection the Secretary will read as requested by the Senator from Missouri. The Chair hears none.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I ask what is before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. At the request of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] the Senate has proceeded to the consideration of Senate resolution 108, a resolution relating to alien residents.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Was unanimous consent given to take it up, and if so is it too late to object? I did not hear the question stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unanimous consent was given, the Chair hearing no objection.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It was probably my fault. There is another resolution pending upon the same subject. I think it would be very much better to have them considered together, if it is not too late.

Mr. LODGE. It is on the calendar and can be taken up on motion.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator means the one now before the Senate is on the calendar?

Mr. LODGE. The one now before the Senate is on the calendar and can be taken up on motion.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I know it can be taken up on motion, but I understand that unanimous consent was asked.

Mr. LODGE. Unanimous consent was asked and granted, undoubtedly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I desire to object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator from Missouri will permit, the Chair will consider it as a motion to take up the resolution.

Mr. STONE. I would like very much to have the resolution considered, for the reason that if it is to be agreed to it is important that diplomatic negotiations should be speedily hastened. I think the Senator from Oregon will not object to this resolution. This is simply a Senate resolution. If he cares speedily to press his joint resolution, he can do so and it can be considered. The joint resolution to which the Senator from Oregon refers is, of course, in substance a statute; it is legislation.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I inquire of the Senator from Missouri whether there is not this difference between the resolution proposed by the Senator from Oregon and this resolution: Does not this resolution apply to citizens and subjects of other countries domiciled in the United States, whereas the proposal of the Senator from Oregon is to reach the citizens of the United States who have for the purpose of joining the army in other countries taken the oath of allegiance to other Governments? The Senator from Oregon, I understand, proposes to provide that those persons who have taken such an oath for the purpose of joining the military forces of other countries shall be still regarded as citizens of the United States. This resolution seems to have reference to citizens of other countries residing in the United States, making our laws apply to them, as far as military service is concerned. So there might not be any conflict between the two resolutions.

Mr. STONE. The Senator has correctly stated the scope of the Senate resolution. At all events, it is not legislation; it is a mere suggestion to the President of the United States, and I can not see that it interferes with what the Senator from Oregon has in mind.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator for a moment? The position assumed by Senate joint resolution 84 is that it is not necessary to take up this question or any allied question with foreign Governments, but that the Congress of the United States has power to act in the first instance. If that position be true, and I think it is sustained by the authorities, then there will not be any necessity for having the President take this matter up with foreign Governments with a view of obtaining some sort of treaty stipulation upon the whole subject. I maintain and insist that the Congress of the United States has jurisdiction to do all that Senate joint resolution 84 authorizes to be done, and that it is not necessary to waste time in this crisis in taking up diplomatic negotiations. I hope that both measures may be considered together, if they are going to be considered.

Mr. STONE. I do not see how we can consider the Senate resolution and a bill at the same time. I think it would be very confusing. In my time I ask that the report made by the Senator from North Dakota may be read with the exception of the part that contains the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unanimous consent was given to the reading of the report by the Secretary.

Mr. LODGE. I suppose the Senator does not ask for the reading of the whole report, but just page 2, not the appendices, and not rereading the resolution.

Mr. STONE. I said that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

The preamble of the resolution describes the persons whom it is intended to have enlisted into the military forces of the United States, and gives the reasons why these persons should bear their proportionate share of the burdens of this war.

It is well established under international law that aliens domiciled in any country are not subject to enforced military service. In addition to this well-established fact, we have a number of treaties with different countries, some of which are now at war with the central powers, which expressly provide against such compulsory military service. We have treaties with other countries containing the "favored-nations" clause, which in effect prohibit such compulsory service.

In the opinion of your committee the only proper course is by securing through regular diplomatic procedure such release from these treaties, and the general principles of international law as will enable this country to utilize in the common cause the great army of aliens, subjects, and citizens of allied powers, now domiciled in this country. The subject therefore, in its initiation at least, is one for Executive diplomacy rather than legislative action. Any action by the Congress before the President has attempted to secure agreements with the countries referred to, authorizing us to bring their subjects into the fighting forces of the United States, would seem to be not only premature but also an invasion of the field of Executive authority.

It is proper here to note another most important suggestion against the advisability of proceeding by legislative enactment which shall be dependent upon obtaining in the future the sanction of the Governments affected.

This Government must make separate agreements with each independent power. It is hardly probable that such agreements would be alike in all their details. Each nation might call for the insertion in such agreements of conditions which might be peculiar to its own situation. No legislation, it seems to the committee, could anticipate the divers conditions that might be imposed in the several new agreements. As the legislative enactment must conform to the diplomatic arrangements made with the several powers, it would seem to be the much wiser course that it should follow rather than precede such arrangement as the President might conclude with each country.

In view of the fact that the treaty-making powers are vested in the Executive and the Senate, the committee is of the opinion that the Senate resolution is more appropriate to secure the desired end, hence the recommendation that the joint resolution be changed to a Senate resolution.

For the information of the Senate we attach a table showing the total registration, the number of aliens, of alien enemies, and percentage of aliens to total population in each of the States.

Mr. MCCUMBER. It is not necessary to read the portion of it which follows, but I should like to have the Secretary read the letter from the Department of State of July 28, the very last paragraph on page 10.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

There is hereby submitted the following letter from Hon. Frank L. Polk, Solicitor of the State Department, which is made a part of the report:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, July 28, 1917.

Hon. WILLIAM J. STONE,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR STONE: Referring to your letter of July 20, in regard to S. J. Res. 83, introduced in the Senate by Mr. MCCUMBER, and to the department's telephone communication to your secretary on July 25, to the effect that this resolution, together with other bills on the same subject, had been laid before the President for his consideration, I beg now to advise you that the President informs me that, of the bills before the Congress relating to the enlistment or drafting of alien residents in the United States, S. J. Res. 83 (or H. J. Res. 115, which appears to be identical) seems to him most appropriate in the circumstances, as, in his opinion, the matter is properly a subject for negotiation with the countries concerned.

Very sincerely, yours, FRANK L. POLK.

The report entire is as follows:

[S. Rept. No. 93, 65th Cong., 1st sess.]

LOOKING TO THE ENLISTMENT OF CERTAIN ALIEN RESIDENTS IN THE ARMY OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. MCCUMBER from the Committee on Foreign Relations, submitted the following report to accompany Senate resolution 108:

The Committee on Foreign Relations, to which was referred the Senate joint resolution (S. J. Res. 83) looking to the enlistment of certain alien residents in the Army of the United States, having had the same under consideration, report the following resolution, with the recommendation that it do pass:

"Whereas there are in the United States a vast number of subjects and citizens of the several European nations now waging war against the allied central powers of Europe; and

"Whereas nearly all of said subjects and citizens have emigrated to this country either for the purpose of becoming citizens thereof, or for the purpose of securing the benefits of the greater wages and better opportunities afforded in this country, which opportunities have been created, defended, and maintained by the energies and sacrifices of the American people; and

"Whereas it is the moral and patriotic duty of said subjects and citizens to support the several Governments to which they owe allegiance in the desperate warfare in which such Governments are engaged; and

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to propose to all European nations engaged in war against the said central powers and, if possible, secure from them an agreement authorizing and empowering the United States to apply the provisions of the act entitled 'An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States,' approved May 18, 1917, to all such subjects and citizens domiciled in this country in the same manner and to the same effect as such provisions are applied to the citizens of the United States in selecting and raising an army or navy for service in the present war."

The preamble of the resolution describes the persons whom it is intended to have enlisted into the military forces of the United States and gives the reasons why these persons should bear their proportionate share of the burdens of this war.

APPENDIX D.

PROVISIONS IN TREATIES ENTERED INTO BY THE UNITED STATES WITH OTHER COUNTRIES RELATING TO THE RIGHT OF EITHER COUNTRY TO EXACT COMPULSORY MILITARY SERVICE OF CITIZENS OF THE OTHER COUNTRY RESIDING THEREIN.

Article 10 of the treaty between the United States and the Argentine Confederation (1853) provides in part as follows: "The citizens of the United States residing in the Argentine Confederation and the citizens of the Argentine Confederation residing in the United States shall be exempted from all compulsory military service whatsoever, whether by sea or by land."

The treaty between the United States and the Independent State of the Kongo (1891), article 3: "The citizens and inhabitants of each of the high contracting parties shall be exempt in the territories of the other from all personal service in the Army, Navy, or militia, and from all pecuniary contributions in lieu of such."

The treaty between the United States and the Republic of Costa Rica (1851), article 9, provides: "The citizens of the United States residing in the Republic of Costa Rica and the citizens of the Republic of Costa Rica residing in the United States shall be exempted from all compulsory military service whatsoever, either by sea or by land, and from all forced loans or military exactions or requisitions."

The treaty between the United States and the Dominican Republic (1871), terminated January 13, 1898, on notice from the Dominican Government, article 2, provides: "The citizens of each of the high contracting parties residing or established in the territory of the other shall be exempt from all compulsory military service by sea or by land, and from all forced loans or military exactions or requisitions."

The treaty between the United States and France (1788), abrogated by act of Congress of July 7, 1798, article 14, provides: "The subjects of the Most Christian King and the citizens of the United States who shall prove by legal evidence that they are of the said nations, respectively, shall in consequence enjoy an exemption from all personal service in the place of their settlement."

The treaty between the United States and the Republic of Haiti (1864), denounced by Haiti to take effect May 7, 1905, article 5, provides: "The citizens of each of the high contracting parties residing or established in the territory of the other shall be exempt from all compulsory military duty by sea or by land and from all forced loans or military exactions or requisitions."

The treaty between the United States and the Republic of Honduras (1864), article 9, provides: "The citizens of the United States residing in the Republic of Honduras and the citizens of the Republic of Honduras residing in the United States shall be exempted from all compulsory military service whatsoever, either by sea or by land, and from all forced loans or military exactions or requisitions."

The treaty between the United States and His Majesty the King of Italy (1871), article 3, provides in part: "The citizens of each of the high contracting parties shall * * * be exempt in their respective territories from compulsory military service, either on land or sea, in the Regular forces, or in the National Guard, or in the militia."

The treaty between the United States of America and the Emperor of Japan (1894), superseded by the treaty of 1911, infra—article 1, provides: "The citizens or subjects of either of the contracting parties residing in the territories of the other shall be exempt from all compulsory military service whatsoever, whether in the Army, Navy, National Guard, or militia; from all contributions imposed in lieu of personal service; and from all forced loans or military exactions or contributions."

The treaty between the United States and the Emperor of Japan (1911), article 1, provides: "The citizens or subjects of each of the high contracting parties shall * * * be exempt in the territories of the other from compulsory military service, either on land or sea, in the Regular forces, or in the National Guard, or in the Militia; from all contributions imposed in lieu of personal service; and from all forced loans or military exactions or contributions."

The treaty between the United States and the United Mexican States (1831)—terminated in 1881 by virtue of notice given by Mexico—article 9 provides: "The citizens of both countries, respectively, shall be exempt from compulsory service in the Army or Navy."

The treaty between the United States and Paraguay (1859), article 11, provides: "The citizens of the United States of America residing in the territories of the Republic of Paraguay, and the citizens of the Republic of Paraguay residing in the United States of America, shall be exempted from all compulsory military service whatsoever, whether by sea or land, and from all forced loans or military exactions or requisitions."

The treaty between the United States and Serbia (1881), article 4, provides: "Citizens of the United States in Serbia and Serbian subjects in the United States shall be reciprocally exempted from all personal service, whether in the Army, by land or by sea; whether in the National Guard or Militia; from billeting; from all contributions, whether pecuniary or in kind, destined as a compensation for personal service; from all forced loans, and from all military exactions or requisitions."

The treaty between the United States and Spain (1902), article 5, provides: "The citizens or subjects of each of the high contracting parties shall be exempt in the territories of the other from all compulsory military service, by land or sea, and from all pecuniary contributions in lieu of such, as well as from all obligatory official functions whatsoever."

The treaty between the United States and Tonga (1886), article 9, provides: "All citizens of the United States residing in the Tonga Islands, and Tongan subjects residing in the United States, shall be exempted from all compulsory military service, whether by sea or land, and from all forced loans, military requisitions, and quartering of troops."

The treaty between the United States and the two Sicilies—rendered obsolete by the consolidation of the two Sicilies with the Kingdom of Italy in 1861—article 5, provides: "The citizens or subjects of one of the high contracting parties, traveling or residing in the territories of the other, shall be free from all military service, whether by land or sea, from all billeting of soldiers in their houses, from every extraordinary contribution, not general and by law established, and from all forced loans."

The treaty between the United States and Venezuela (1860)—terminated in 1870 pursuant to notice from Venezuela—article 2, provides: "The citizens of each of the high contracting parties, residing or established in the territory of the other, shall be exempt from all compulsory military service by sea or by land, and from all forced loans or military exactions or requisitions."

It will thus be seen that in at least 17 treaties entered into between the United States and foreign Governments the policy of mutual exemption from compulsory military service of the citizens or subjects of one of the contracting parties, residing in the territories of the other, has been established. At least 10 of these treaties are still in full force and effect.

The following treaties between the United States and other countries contain a "most-favored-nation" clause, which would probably be deemed to include a similar exemption from compulsory military service even if not otherwise existing by treaty or by international law:

Algiers, 1816, article 12.
China, 1858, article 30.
Korea, 1882, article 14.
Hanseatic Republic, 1827, article 9.
Japan, 1854, article 9.
Morocco, 1880, article 17.
Persia, 1856, article 3.
Samoan Islands, 1878, article 6.
Spain, 1902, article 2.
Tonga, 1886, article 3.
Japan, 1911, article 4.

NOTE.—Several of the above treaties have been abrogated or been rendered obsolete; and several of the "most-favored-nation" clauses are, in this particular connection, rendered unnecessary by inclusion in the same treaty of a specific exemption against the imposition of compulsory military service by either country upon the citizens or subjects of the other.

APPENDIX E.

MAY THE UNITED STATES, EVEN WHEN TREATY STIPULATIONS DO NOT PREVENT, EXACT COMPULSORY MILITARY SERVICE OF ALIENS?

Under this head, for the purposes of this phase of the discussion, I define "alien" to mean a citizen of some country other than the United States who has not in the United States declared his intention to become a citizen thereof. I shall later consider the availability for compulsory military service of an alien who has so declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States.

The precedents of this and other countries show some confusion as to the right of a nation to exact military service of the citizen of another who is domiciled or temporarily residing within its territories.

I shall first set forth some of the precedents which deny the right; then those which assert, at least qualifiedly, the right; and finally attempt to indicate what seems to be the true rule.

In 1804 Mr. Madison, then Secretary of State, wrote to Mr. Monroe, then our minister to England: "Citizens or subjects of one country residing in another, though bound by their temporary allegiance to many common duties, can never be rightfully forced into military service * * *."

Naturally many cases involving the question arose during the Civil War. Secretary Seward had occasion to express himself a number of times. In 1862 he said: "I can hardly suppose that there exists anywhere in the world the erroneous belief that aliens are liable here to military duty." Later the same year he wrote to the governor of Indiana: "There is no principle more distinctly and clearly settled in the law of nations than the rule that resident aliens not naturalized are not liable to perform military service. We have uniformly claimed and insisted upon it in our intercourse with foreign nations." In 1864 he wrote to Mr. Stanton, Secretary of War: "In a case of alleged fraudulent enlistment of an alien his Government has an undoubted right and duty to ask for a prompt investigation and satisfactory answer; and if it appears that he was improperly enlisted and he has fallen in battle, his family ought to have some compensation." In Halleck's Internation Law it is stated: "In 1861, during the American Civil War, the British Government declared that if enforced enlistments of British subjects for the war were persisted in, the Government would be obliged to concert with other neutral powers for the protection of their respective subjects, but neither in the Northern or Southern States was the discharge of any British subject enlisted against his will refused on proper representation." (Vol. 2, p. 6.)

In 1874 Secretary Fish wrote: "We did not claim the right to impress aliens into our forces during the late Civil War, but it is understood that in one instance at least, in the case of a siege, we sought to justify such an impressment."

The United States has been very positive indeed in its action when Mexico has sought to impose military service upon citizens of the United States. The most notable cases, however, occurred in 1880, at the time when the treaty of 1831, forbidding compulsory military service, was still in force. The American authorities, however, appear to have put their protest upon grounds of international law as well as upon treaty obligations. The American minister to Mexico was instructed that there was "scarcely any act of which a nation should be less tolerant than that of a neighboring power forcibly impressing its citizens into their military service, perhaps to be obliged, at some future time, to fight against their own flag." Mr. Evarts later in the same year wrote that whenever protest was made by Mexico during our Civil War, it was the practice of the State Department to bring the subject at once to the attention of the Secretary of War, and that "no single instance is met with in which the Mexican citizen's claim to exemption from military service in the armies of the United States was not promptly recognized and respected by this Government." The following year Mr. Blaine, then Secretary of State, wrote: "It is notorious that the impressment of American seamen into the naval service of a foreign power was at one time a serious grievance, not to be acquiesced in, and raised a question upon which all parties in this country were unanimous in regarding as one of international character. Public sentiment here in regard to that subject was borne in mind during the late Civil War. The number of persons of foreign birth, especially in the large cities, led to the accidental or involuntary enrollment of unnaturalized aliens in the military or naval service. These, however, as is shown by the large space in the records of the department at the time, were at once discharged upon complaint made and in the absence of proof of their naturalization. It is hoped, therefore, that in considering this subject the Mexican Government will not only have due regard to the unlawfulness of the impressment, but to the universal and strong sentiment upon the subject which pervades this country."

In 1888 Mr. Bayard summed up the situation thus: "It is well settled by international law that foreigners temporarily resident in a country can not be compelled to enter into its permanent military service. It is true that in times of social disturbance or of invasion their services in police or home guards may be exacted, and that they may be required to take up arms to help in the defense of their place of residence against the invasion of savages, pirates, etc., as a means of warding off some great public calamity by which all would suffer indiscriminately. The test in each case, as to whether a foreigner can properly be enrolled against his will, is that of necessity. Unless social order and immunity from attack by uncivilized tribes can not be secured except through the enrollment of such a force, a nation has no right to call upon foreigners for assistance against their will."

So much for the cases in which the propriety of exacting military service has been negatived. Let me now cite a few cases where the right, at least, whatever the considerations of comity and reciprocity, was maintained. Secretary Seward, in 1868, wrote: "This Government is not disposed to draw in question the right of a nation in a case of extreme necessity to enroll in the military forces all persons within its territories, whether citizens or domiciled foreigners."

The following year Secretary Fish wrote: "This Government, though waiving the exercise of the right to require military service from all residents, has never surrendered that right, and can not object if other Governments insist upon it." And again in 1871 Secretary Fish wrote: "I must decline to enter into the question to what extent and under what circumstances do our citizens, native or naturalized (in the absence of treaty stipulations), owe military service to a foreign Government in whose dominions they are domiciled for commercial or other purposes. They certainly do not stand on the same footing as mere travelers or temporary sojourners."

Assistant Secretary Davis in 1873 wrote: "There is no treaty stipulation between the United States and Great Britain which exempts the citizens or subjects of either party from military duty in the forces of the other, either in peace or war. Consequently we can not claim such exemption as a matter of right. As a matter of comity and reciprocity, however, we certainly can claim them."

Although it will be observed that there is some conflict of opinion indicated in the above extracts (oftentimes doubtless to be partially or wholly explained by the nature of the correspondence or the addressee of the letter), the general rule would seem to be that in the absence of treaty stipulations a country has the right to impress for military service those within its territory, even though citizens of another power. But this right is on grounds of comity and reciprocity to be exercised sparingly, because almost certain to be followed by urgent representations by the Government of the citizens concerned. Only in case of urgent necessity and for service coterminous in time and nature with the necessity will enforced military service willingly be tolerated without protest by the other Government. The right, then, exists, but its exercise is so fraught with difficulty that without the express and explicit consent of the other Government concerned it is doubtful if this exercise would often be wise.

APPENDIX F.

MAY THE UNITED STATES, EVEN WHEN TREATY STIPULATIONS DO NOT PREVENT, EXACT COMPULSORY MILITARY SERVICE OF ALIENS WHO HAVE DECLARED THEIR INTENTION TO BECOME CITIZENS OF THE UNITED STATES?

Revised Statutes of the United States, section 2165, provides in part as follows: "An alien * * * shall declare on oath * * * two years at least prior to his admission that it is bona fide his intention to become a citizen of the United States, and to renounce forever all allegiance and fidelity to any foreign prince, potentate, state, or sovereignty, * * *."

It will be observed from the language of the above statute that a declarant for citizenship neither takes a present oath of allegiance to the United States nor disclaims allegiance to the country of his origin. It would seem natural to expect, therefore, that the authorities would regard his citizenship status as absolutely unaffected and would settle the question of his liability to compulsory service exactly as if he had never taken even the first step toward becoming a citizen of the United States.

Mr. Seward wrote to the governor of Indiana in 1862: "The law of Great Britain holds that a native British subject owes allegiance to the British Government until he has completely effected his naturalization in the United States under the laws of Congress. * * * From the foundation of the Government the Department (of State) had refused to grant passports as citizens to aliens who had merely filed the preliminary declaration of intention and who had not effected their naturalization under the United States laws, and had informally recognized the passports granted to them by the proper authorities of the Governments of which they had been born subjects."

In 1863 Mr. Seward stated the rule as follows: "No alien-born person is liable to render military service unless either he has been naturalized on his own application or has made a voluntary declaration, on oath, of his intention to become a citizen by naturalization according to law, or has claimed and actually exercised the political right of voting as a citizen of the United States."

While this language does not expressly state that a declarant is liable to render compulsory military service, it evidently squints in this direction. Doubtless Mr. Seward, in writing it, had in mind the language of the act of Congress of March 3, 1863—the conscription act—which expressly declared that the levy should include "all persons of foreign birth who shall have declared on oath their intentions to become citizens."

In 1863 certain able-bodied male persons of foreign birth, who had declared, on oath, their intention to become American citizens, were called upon for military duty by the United States. The British Government suggested that British subjects who had merely declared their intention to become American citizens but had not exercised any political franchise in consequence of such declaration ought to be allowed a reasonable period after the passing of the act to exercise the option of leaving the United States or of continuing residing therein with the annexed conditions. The United States Government thereupon allowed 65 days to such persons to exercise their option, and the British Government refused to interfere on behalf of any intended citizens who had not availed themselves of the opportunity. (Parliamentary Papers, 1863, No. 337.)

By the act of March 3, 1863, aliens who had made a declaration of intention and who were under specified conditions liable to military duty were permitted to obtain passports, but this privilege was repealed in 1866. Switzerland objected to President Lincoln's proclamation concerning the liability of Swiss in the United States to perform military service. Mr. Seward suggested that a just interpretation of the war measures of Congress constituted a new and additional law of Federal naturalization. "But," he adds, "it was foreseen that some emigrants who had declared their intention might complain of surprise if they were immediately subjected to conscription. To guard against this surprise the proclamation was issued, giving them ample notice of the change of the law, with the alternative of removal from the country if they should prefer removal to remaining here on the footing on which Congress had brought them. Surely no foreigner has a right to be naturalized and remain here in a time of public danger and enjoy the protection of the Government without submitting to general requirements needful for his own security.

In Moore's Digest of International Law, volume 3, pages 336 to 353, will be found the precedents conclusively establishing that the declaration of intention to become a citizen neither confers citizenship in the United States nor divests citizenship in the country of origin.

It will be seen from this review of the authorities that the status of a declarant for citizenship is legally in no way different from that of an alien who has not made declaration. But it is natural that the country of origin should feel somewhat less interested and concerned in behalf of the former than of the latter. He has shown his wish to throw off his old allegiance, and there is no very evident reason why the mother country should go out of her way to protect him. As we have seen, there is a right, aside from treaty stipulations, to impress any alien into the military service of the country where he has gone to reside. This right is controlled by considerations of comity. But in the case of a declarant the considerations of comity are, for the reasons just indicated, much weaker. Therefore it follows naturally that military service is more likely to be successfully exacted of an alien who has declared his intention to become a citizen than of an alien who has not so declared. Great Britain in the precedent cited above doubtless did her full duty in securing for her citizens, declarants for American citizenship, a period of 65 days within which to leave the United States on pain of being subjected to military service if they remained. It is doubtful if any country would do more to-day; many might do less

The recently enacted selective-draft law (an "act of Congress to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917, sec. 2) follows the selective-draft law of the Civil War by including in the liability to military service "male persons not alien enemies who have declared their intention to become citizens." No good reason is perceived why at least a contingent liability—conditioned, perhaps, upon their preferring to remain in this country after opportunity to leave has been afforded them—should not be exacted of these declarants.

Of course, it should be understood that this suggestion is predicated upon the absence of any treaty stipulation, effective and unwaived, standing in the way.

APPENDIX G.

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 115) requesting the Secretary of State to open diplomatic negotiations with certain Governments with a view to obtaining their approval and sanction for action by the United States permitting the inclusion in the armed forces of the United States of such citizens of the countries of such Governments as are within the United States.

Whereas by section 2 of the act of Congress approved May 18, 1917, and entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," it is provided that the draft "shall be based upon liability to military service of all male citizens, or male persons not alien enemies, who have declared their intention to become citizens, between the ages of 21 and 30 years, both inclusive"; and

Whereas the effect of this provision will be to exempt from military service all aliens except those who, not being alien enemies, have declared their intention to become citizens of the United States; and

Whereas under the principles of international law, the treaties of the United States, and the rules and precedents established for many years by the Department of State of the United States the right of the United States to require military service of the nationals of other nations, whether or not declarants for United States citizenship, may be questioned by those nations; and

Whereas it is reported that the President, in order to avoid the raising of any question by other nations, will, notwithstanding the provisions of said act of May 18, 1917, cause to be exempted from military service under said act those aliens also who have declared their intention to become citizens; and

Whereas in a report to the Senate of the United States, dated June 22, 1917, the Secretary of War has stated that the registration prescribed by said act of May 18, 1917, discloses that 1,239,179 persons who have not declared their intention to become citizens of the United States, and who are not citizens of a country with which the United States is at war, so registered on June 5, 1917, which number is over one-eighth of all who registered; and

Whereas a large number of persons who, not being citizens of the United States, have declared their intention to become citizens, also registered on June 5, 1917; and

Whereas under the law and under the reported decision of the President no person of the 1,239,179 and no one of the large number of declarants for citizenship will be held for military service, although all of them have in many cases for many years enjoyed the privileges and protection of citizens of the United States; and

Whereas a large number of these persons are citizens of countries at war with a country with which the United States is at war; and

Whereas because of their present residence such persons are enabled to avoid military service against the enemy of the United States for which they would otherwise be liable or available; and

Whereas it is repugnant to justice and equity that such persons should be wholly exempted from military service while citizens of the United States are held to military service: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, requested to open diplomatic negotiations with the Governments of the several countries at war with a country with which the United States is at war with a view to obtaining their approval and sanction for action by the United States looking to the imposition upon such citizens of those countries as are within the United States of the liability to and performance of military service in the armed forces of the United States during the continuance of the present war between the United States and Germany, and to report to the Congress of the United States as soon as practicable the result of such negotiations.

APPENDIX H.

I append resolutions dated July 10, 1917, signed by Mr. E. W. Dunbar, chairman of the committee on public safety of Hudson, Mass., which read as follows:

"The committee on public safety for the town of Hudson have adopted the following resolutions, which are meant to convey to you the general feeling of the citizens of this town:

"'Whereas a certain class of aliens have forced our citizens to believe that they are planning to profit at the expense of our young men when the latter have been drawn away from their positions to military duty; and

"'Whereas all aliens who have received in the past the benefits of this free Government of ours ought now to expect to do their part in the maintenance and preservation of those democratic principles upon which our Government is founded and for which the present world war is being waged; and

"'Whereas under existing laws or conditions these same aliens are not required to make the sacrifices demanded of the young men of the United States: Be it therefore

"'Resolved, That we the undersigned citizens of the town of Hudson, respectfully ask you, our Representative in Congress, to urge the passage of such laws as may in your judgment be necessary to remedy the injustice described above.'"

Also, a letter recently published from Mayor Hurley, of Lawrence, which deals with the general question which I have been considering:

"DEAR SIR: The citizens of Lawrence are quite generally convinced that the expressed intention to make population the basis for the proposed draft of young men for military service will be a great injustice to Lawrence. The exclusion of aliens from the draft will inevitably cause Lawrence to furnish a larger quota in proportion to population than almost any city or town in the country. As you know, the proportion of aliens in this city is very high, and it is especially true of young men between the ages of 21 and 31, because between these ages a man is most likely to emigrate.

"It seems to me that the young men of Lawrence, although as patriotic as any, and willing to bear their share of the burdens, should not be called on to bear more than their just share. I sincerely hope you will enter a protest to the President and his advisers and try to have some method which will be more equitable for cities having a large foreign population.

"I might suggest that if the basis used was citizenship or citizens and declarants, it would be a fairer system for Lawrence. If it is possible to accomplish anything in this matter, I am sure the people of Lawrence will gratefully appreciate it.

"Very sincerely, yours,

"JOHN J. HURLEY."

And finally an extract from a letter which I have within a day or two received from a constituent:

"I am taking the liberty of writing, as I thought you might be interested to know the views of some of your constituents in regard to the present situation. I hear many favorable comments on the bill which you introduced to allow the conscription of the citizens of our allies who are living here and are not eligible for the United States draft.

"Many of the young men who are subject to draft have expressed the opinion that it was unfair to them to allow all these other men to enjoy the advantages of this country without being eligible for service, either in this or their own country, and I feel sure that it will create a much better feeling among the men eligible for draft if some such bill is passed. It has been a frequent occurrence in this section for so-called foreigners to comfort the young men about to be drafted, or are at present serving in the militia or other military service, with remarks like that passed by a foreigner to a young militiaman I know, and this is typical of many such cases. He greeted him as follows: 'Hello, John. You go fight? That's good. By'n by I get your good job, go to your house, do anything I want.'"

There is hereby submitted the following letter from Hon. Frank L. Polk, Solicitor of the State Department, which is made a part of the report:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, July 28, 1917.

MY DEAR SENATOR STONE: Referring to your letter of July 20, in regard to S. J. Res. 83, introduced in the Senate by Mr. MCCUMBER, and to the department's telephone communication to your secretary on July 25, to the effect that this resolution, together with other bills on the same subject, had been laid before the President for his consideration, I beg now to advise you that the President informs me that of the bills before the Congress relating to the enlistment or drafting of alien residents in the United States S. J. Res. 83 (or H. J. Res. 115, which appears to be identical) seems to him most appropriate in the circumstances, as, in his opinion, the matter is properly a subject for negotiation with the countries concerned.

Very sincerely, yours, FRANK L. POLK.

Hon. WILLIAM J. STONE,
United States Senate.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I think that we all agree that some action should be taken in the premises. I am certainly in hearty accord with what the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] desires to accomplish, and I am satisfied he is in accord with me in what ought to be accomplished and in the shortest possible time. I can see no conflict whatever, or necessity for conflict, between the two resolutions. The Senate being a part of the treaty-making power of this Government, we may well express our conviction that the President should proceed at once to obtain agreements from the several powers who are jointly interested with us in this war, to the end that their subjects and citizens in the United States may perform the duties which they owe to their own governments.

Mr. President, the table presented in the report shows that there are a vast number of people from countries which are engaged with us in a common warfare. They range from 20 to nearly 40 per cent of those eligible for service in some of the States. Every one of those who are registered owes an allegiance to some one of these governments; each one of those governments is bound to protect its citizens and subjects in the United States or elsewhere. Those citizens and subjects, therefore, owe to their home governments the corresponding duty of defense.

It is recognized by all that the people who have emigrated to this country and who have not taken out their citizenship papers are enjoying opportunities growing out of this war, the greatest in the matter of remuneration that has ever been known in the world. The old American citizen, whose ancestors for generations passed have been born in this country, and the new American citizen who has taken out his citizenship papers, both agree that it is unjust that they should shed their blood, that they should bear the burdens of this great war which, to say the very least, is as beneficial to the countries across the sea as it is to our own country, while the subjects and citizens of those countries are taking the positions which our own men must surrender and are reaping these benefits. We all agree, I think, as to the propriety of enlisting those people into one of the armies, either into the American Army or compelling them to enlist in their own armies.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am sure that we desire to reach the same end. The thought suggested itself to me, however, that if the resolution which has been reported out of the Committee on Foreign Relations were adopted by the Senate, Congress might feel that it ought not to proceed through legislation that would be effective at once, until diplomatic negotiations had been entered into and had been consummated, resulting either in failure or in success. If the Senator's resolution were adopted and diplomatic negotiations were entered upon, and delay should occur and nothing substantial be accomplished, does the Senator think that Congress in the meantime could proceed to legislate as proposed in joint resolution 84?

Mr. McCUMBER. I should say most earnestly, Mr. President, that if the Senator from Oregon could convince me that we have a right to act in the matter in any way, I certainly would join him in acting immediately in the matter by legislation.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. My own conviction is that it is a question, first, for diplomacy; my own conviction is that we have no right as a Nation to compel the military service of aliens; my own conviction is that, independent of that general principle of international law which would prohibit us forcing aliens into the military service of the United States, we have a number of treaties, some directly declaring that such aliens shall not be compelled to enter into the service, and others containing the favored-nation clause, which would practically bring all under the same group; but, however that may be, if I am mistaken in that respect, there is nothing lost in acting upon what I understand to be the view of the department, and my own view, and authorizing the President to proceed immediately; and we, as one of the treaty-making powers, can do that with entire propriety. We should lose by proceeding now along this line of procedure.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. If the Senator has read Senate joint resolution 84, he has found that provision is there made for the very cases that he mentions; that is, where we have treaty stipulations that forbid us to impress men into the service. That is provided for, and I think every case that could arise is provided for. It is not a case of first impression, for the matter has been up a number of times between this Government and other governments, and it has been decided both ways. Englishmen were impressed into the service during the Civil War, and our nationals have been impressed into the service of foreign governments.

Mr. McCUMBER. There is quite a lengthy brief upon the subject embodied in the report, and I think our State Department agree with me that we have no such right of impressment and, therefore, can not exercise it.

I want, however, merely to answer the last suggestion made by the Senator from Oregon. We can not tell what kind of an arrangement we can make with any single power. We should perhaps have to make as many different arrangements as there are different nations with whom we would make them, no two of them being exactly alike. Therefore, I think it impossible for us to anticipate by legislation at this time every matter that a foreign nation might want to put into the agreement and which would require special legislation upon our part. It seems to me, therefore, that diplomacy should precede legislation, rather than that legislation should precede diplomacy.

I want, however, most earnestly to say to the Senator that I certainly will support any measure on the subject that he may introduce, and I shall vote for it and vote to bring it up and to put it through, if we can do so properly. I am somewhat doubtful, as I said, about our anticipating the particular character of arrangement that can be made with a foreign power. Russia might require certain things for us to do before she would agree to our drafting her citizens; Great Britain might require very much less; Serbia might impose some other condition; and so as to Belgium and France. It seems to me to be impossible to draft a law which could anticipate and meet the many conditions that might arise.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I desire to engage the attention of the Senator from North Dakota. I agree, of course, as I fancy every other Senator does, that a foreign-born citizen in this country should either have the loyalty to return to his own country and fight for it, if it is engaged in war, or should have the devotion to this country, that is giving him his home, to fight for us; one or the other he ought to be forced to do. What I want to ask the Senator is, if he has had occasion in the consideration of this resolution, to deal with its effect upon our own nationals, citizens of the United States, who might at this time be in Germany or Austria? I desire to ask the Senator if he has any estimate of the number of Americans who are in Austria or in Germany who might, in retaliation, promptly be put into the German and Austrian armies?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I think the Senator misunderstands the scope and intendment of this resolution. We certainly should be guilty of a crime against international law if we should attempt to force into our armies the citizens of an alien enemy. There is no such purpose as that in the resolution. It simply provides for the right to draft aliens, subjects or citizens of States which are joined with us in this war, exactly upon the same footing as we draft our own, taking them in proportion to their numbers, taking them in the draft order exactly as we take our own. Certainly none of the allied countries can complain; in fact, I am informed that all of them would be glad to have us enlist every one of their subjects, and not merely proportionately.

Mr. LEWIS. As I understand the Senator, then, there is nothing in the resolution that is in such violation of treaties or general international law as to give apparent justification or excuse to Germany or Austria for seizing such Americans as are within their jurisdictions and forcing them into the war on the side of Germany in retaliation for our having forced their subjects in this country into the war on the side of the United States?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly not, because we will not force any of their subjects into this war. The German citizen, the Bulgarian citizen, the Austrian citizen, the Turkish citizen, can remain here without interference in the slightest degree.

Mr. LEWIS. But ought there not be some measure by which these aliens living in our country, enjoying the benefits of our community, could be forced into some form of service to the United States while they are deriving their existence here and our own American boys are going to the front to die?

Mr. McCUMBER. I think that would be very questionable, Mr. President. Our treaty relations allow the subjects of all countries to come here at will and return to their respective home countries. If war suddenly breaks out, the individual who happens to be here is not responsible for it. We should not punish him because he was found in this country nor punish the home Government. We have a right to intern such persons if we regard them as dangerous, but I do not understand that right has been exercised to any extent.

Mr. LEWIS. At any rate, the Senator says this resolution does not enter upon that field?

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, no; not at all.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. There is one important difference between the joint resolution and the Senate resolution which has not yet been mentioned, and I venture to bring it to the attention of the Senator from North Dakota with the object of securing an explanation.

The joint resolution provides that all aliens who are not aliens of enemy countries can be impressed into our service, provided such countries through their diplomatic representatives shall waive the provisions of any treaty which exempts their subjects in this country from such service. The Senate resolution simply directs the President to enter into negotiations with the European nations that are engaged in war with Germany, and to secure from them, if possible, such modifications of our treaties as will enable us to use their subjects in this country.

Under the Senate resolution reported by the Foreign Relations Committee, what becomes of aliens, subjects of Sweden, Norway, Denmark, Holland, Spain, and Switzerland? These are all neutral countries; they are covered by the joint resolution reported by the Military Committee, but they are not covered in any way by the proposed Senate resolution. I am asking for information pure and simple. Is it intended that aliens, subjects of neutral countries, can not be required to enter into the service of the United States even with the consent of those countries?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly not; they are not at war with the central powers, and, not being at war, we can not compel them to enter into war and break their own neutrality; and we ought not attempt to draft their citizens into our armies, and thereby force, to the extent that their citizens are here, neutral powers into the war.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not disputing the proposition stated by the Senator from North Dakota, but I am pointing out a very important difference between the joint resolution and the Senate resolution.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me call the attention of the Senator right there to another feature. It will be noted that in the Senate resolution we deal only with European powers. There are two reasons for this. The first reason is that Japan, for instance, is engaged also in the war; but Japan is not situated, by reason of the gentlemen's agreement which we all understand, as the European powers are situated. Her citizens of late years have not been coming to this country at all. I am very doubtful of the propriety of raising that question with the Japanese Government, and therefore that was left out. There might also be some South American countries that may make a declaration of war, but their subjects in this country are so few that it was thought best not to include them.

Mr. REED and Mr. CHAMBERLAIN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield first to the Senator from Missouri, who, I think, first addressed the Chair.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator, the author of this resolution, if it is intended in the resolution to declare war against Austria and Turkey?

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, no; there is nothing about a declaration of war at all.

Mr. REED. I call attention to this language:

> Whereas the United States is also engaged in war against the said central powers—

That is just as much a declaration of war as we have made against Germany, and it seems to be broad enough to embrace all of the so-called central powers, which are Germany and Austria-Hungary, and, I presume, Turkey and Bulgaria. I should like to ask the Senator if this resolution was submitted to the Department of State for their opinion?

Mr. McCUMBER. The whole matter was submitted to the Department of State.

Mr. REED. And did the Department of State send this back with this language in it without suggesting that it amounted to a declaration of war?

Mr. McCUMBER. The letter from the department on the subject is at the close of the report, and that matter is not mentioned at all, one way or the other.

Mr. REED. I call attention now to some other language in the same part of the resolution. I am speaking of the fourth "whereas." It is in the same clause to which I have referred. I will read the whole "whereas":

> Whereas the United States is also engaged in war against the said central powers—

That language I have called attention to. I now call attention to this language:

> for the protection of the rights of the several nations so waging war against the said central powers, as well as its own sacred rights.

I question the propriety, Mr. President, of the United States declaring that it is in this war for the purpose of protecting the rights of certain foreign nations.

Mr. McCUMBER. But the Senator does not deny that in fighting with them the effect is the protection of their rights, and that is all there is in the resolution.

Mr. REED. I do not agree with the Senator. I call his attention to the fact that it is a square declaration that we are engaged in this war for the purpose of protecting their rights, as well as protecting our own. I think, if I understand the situation, the United States has not, up to this time, engaged itself in the European controversy beyond the declaration that it proposes to fight for the protection of its own rights, and if we have gone beyond that it would be interesting to know how far and upon what authority.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, it seems to me the objection along that line does not go to the merits of this resolution.

Mr. REED. It does not. I am for the spirit of the resolution, but I called this matter to the attention of the Senator because I wanted to get him right on it. I think this "whereas" is wholly unnecessary, however, and I think it ought to be cut out.

Mr. McCUMBER. The whole preamble could be cut out, as far as that is concerned. The preamble merely expresses the sentiment and the reasons for the resolution; and that we are at war with these nations, whether we have declared war or not, is a known fact.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. Some of the theories and doctrines announced here this morning seem to me strange indeed. I think, if you will examine our several treaties, you will find that they simply relate to the matter of commercial intercourse in one way or another. If a foreigner comes to this country to reside in the United States, to enjoy all the benefits and blessings of this country, he ought to bear all the burdens of the Government. If he own property here or does business here, he has to pay taxes like a citizen of the United States. If a road has to be improved, and there is a poll tax, he will be compelled, according to the decision of the Supreme Court, to work out or pay the poll tax. I hold that every foreigner in this country is liable to military service, and that there is nothing in any of these treaties, unless in express terms, that gives him immunity. All these treaties simply relate to trade, commerce, and traffic in some form. They do not relate to the matter of personal service.

Of course we can not impress alien enemies into our ranks; but to all other people we can say: "If you live here in America, and enjoy the blessings of this country, you must perform your share of military service, or go back to the country whence you came." I have not any doubt but that we have that right under all the fundamental principles of international law; and I do not know why a foreigner who comes to this country and enjoys all the blessings of the United States should not be compelled to enter the Army and fight for the best interests and liberties of this country when he is enjoying the blessings of the country. There is nothing in international law, as I understand it, that will prevent it; and I think if you will scrutinize these treaties you will find that there is nothing in them that will prohibit it.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. McCUMBER. Just one moment; then I will yield to the Senator. First, I want to convince the Senator from Minnesota that he is in error with reference to these treaties.

We will take, for instance, the treaty between the United States and Italy. Article 3 provides, in part:

The citizens of each of the high contracting parties shall * * * be exempt in their respective territories from compulsory military service, either on land or sea, in the regular forces or in the National Guard or in the militia.

There is a similar one between this country and Japan.

Here is one between the United States and Spain, made in 1902:

The citizens or subjects of each of the high contracting parties shall be exempt in the territories of the other from all compulsory military service by land or sea and from all pecuniary contributions in lieu of such, as well as from all obligatory official functions whatsoever.

There are a vast number of these, and I think the Senator, upon more mature deliberation, will come to the same conclusion that the State Department has come to—that the clause in all of our treaties which grants to each nation the rights that are granted to the most favored nations, known as the most-favored nation clause, will cover this question of compulsory military service.

Mr. PHELAN and Mr. BRADY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. McCUMBER. I first yield to the Senator from California, who rose first.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I know a very great injustice would be done to the men in this country who are drafted into the military service if their places are taken in our industrial life by aliens. It strikes one's imagination, at any rate, if not his judgment, as wrong to allow them to profit by their exemption by reason of their alien character from military service. But the problem of the West to-day is labor; and I desire to know from the Senator, who has considered this question very carefully, whether it would not be more advantageous to this country to hold them for the purpose of utilizing their labor than to compel them to go back to their alien country, with which we are at war, and where they would take up arms and add to the effective force?

Mr. McCUMBER. I can answer that very briefly. I should prefer to keep some of our own citizens and allow them to secure the benefits of the additional opportunities due to this war, rather than send them across the ocean to fight the battles over there while the people of those countries are crossing the sea to get the advantages upon this side. If there are any advantages at all, I think they belong to our own people and to our own laborers.

Mr. PHELAN. I do not think that is an answer to my question, Mr. President.

Mr. McCUMBER. I thought it was. It was intended as such.

Mr. PHELAN. My idea is to divest ourselves now of all sentimentality and to ask ourselves whether the labor of these aliens would not be more valuable to us in this crisis than turning them over to the enemy, where they would augment his forces on the other side.

Mr. LODGE. This does not touch enemy forces.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think not. I think that would apply just as much to our own citizens as it would to the aliens.

Mr. PHELAN. Oh, it is granted we are sending our own citizens abroad. We are divesting the fields of their labor. What substitute labor shall there be?

Mr. McCUMBER. Remember, we are not affecting aliens other than those whose nations are engaged in this war—none of the neutrals.

Mr. PHELAN. I realize that. There are a large number who are not citizens of the United States, who have not taken out their papers nor declared their intention to become citizens; and I was merely thinking, in this connection, of the labor shortage which would accrue by reason of requiring them to leave the country under the provisions of this measure.

Mr. McCUMBER. If we were required to raise a million men, and 300,000 of them were aliens, we would not affect the labor market any more than if we were to take the million wholly from the American citizens and none from the alien citizens.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do.

Mr. HARDWICK. If we can get away from the labor question just a moment and get down to the real merits of this proposition, I want to say to the Senator that I am in hearty sympathy with his resolution, and I thoroughly believe we ought to do just what the resolution seeks to do; but I quite agree with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] that we ought to strike out this fourth "whereas" at the bottom of the page. We do not want to declare solemnly to our own people nor to the world that we are fighting this war for the protection of foreign powers. Now, I wonder if the Senator would not be willing to strike that out and let us pass the resolution?

Mr. McCUMBER. I would be willing to strike out the entire preamble.

Mr. HARDWICK. Let us strike out all the preamble and pass the resolution then.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am perfectly willing to strike out the preamble; but I must say that I do not agree with the conclusion of the Senator that it is improper to say that by engaging in this war we are assisting the other nations who are fighting the battles over in Europe, and that, in reality, is all there is in it.

Mr. HARDWICK and Mr. SWANSON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To whom does the Senator yield?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield first to the Senator from Georgia, and then to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, of course I do not think the Senator who drafted this resolution meant it as we construe it; and yet, to my mind, it is hardly capable of any other construction, except that these words are words expressing a purpose, and I know the Senator did not intend to do that. He has disavowed that intention. Therefore, let us avoid that trouble by striking out this thing, and all of us who are for it vote for the resolution.

Mr. McCUMBER. I now yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, as I understand, under the rules the resolution must first be passed, and then the perfection of the preamble comes up as a separate proposition. I suggest that we first vote on the resolution, and then the preamble, under the rules, I think, would come up subsequently.

Mr. GRONNA and Mr. BRADY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, in reference to what has been said by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], I wish to suggest that it will make quite a little difference in the vote whether we vote upon the resolution with the preamble in it or with the preamble stricken out. I do not know of any rule that prohibits us from perfecting a resolution——

Mr. SWANSON. I think the rule of procedure is first to pass the resolution, and then the question comes up as to the preamble.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is in accordance with the decisions of the Senate, as the Chair understands.

Mr. SWANSON. I insist that the resolution, under the rules, must first be disposed of, and then we will take up the preamble.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, if my colleague will yield to me, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. GRONNA. Is it not possible to perfect any resolution by striking out the preamble, if there is no objection?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question on agreeing to the preamble comes immediately after the adoption of the resolution. If the resolution is defeated, of course it defeats the preamble.

Mr. GRONNA. We are now considering the entire resolution—the preamble and the resolution itself.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state to the Senator from North Dakota that the preamble is not a part of the resolution.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, there is no practical trouble of that sort. The author of the resolution states that he is willing to strike it out.

Mr. McCUMBER. I shall move, if the resolution is passed, to strike out the preamble entirely.

Mr. GRONNA. With that understanding, I have no objection.

Mr. HARDWICK. There is no trouble about it. Let us pass the resolution.

Mr. McCUMBER. The only purpose of the preamble is to explain why we are suggesting to the President of the United States that he take up this matter diplomatically with other nations engaged with us in this war

Mr. POMERENE and Mr. NORRIS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To whom does the Senator yield?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I feel greatly obliged to the Senator from North Dakota for presenting this resolution, and I hope it may be adopted. Apparently there is some difference of opinion as to whether this resolution should be passed or the joint resolution presented by the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee. My belief is that we do not now have the power to draft these aliens. I am not clear about it, however. As I understand, the State Department has at different times expressed different views upon the subject. For the most part, they have held that we did not have that power. Again, it was said that the Department of State would not concede that we did not have that power. But whatever may be the true construction of the present law upon the subject, I see nothing inconsistent in our adopting the resolution of the Senator from North Dakota and later adopting the joint resolution of the Senator from Oregon, if we now have the authority to draft aliens. My belief is that the adoption of the resolution of the Senator from North Dakota will simplify many questions which might arise hereafter as between the nations now at war.

I want, if I may, while I am on my feet, to make this further suggestion to the Senator from Oregon, as well as to others on the Military Affairs Committee, that when it comes to the drafting of aliens, we should not only draft hereafter the same proportion of aliens that we do of natives and naturalized citizens, but that we should draft a further number of aliens to equalize them with our native and naturalized citizens who have already been drafted into the service.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I just want to suggest to the Senator from Ohio that at least the Committee on Military Affairs seem to be divided in opinion or to have some doubts as to whether it would not be necessary to obtain the consent of the other Governments, because provision is made and the law itself is made subject to such modification of treaties or agreements as we may secure. The fact that we start immediately to secure those agreements certainly is not out of harmony with the purpose of the Senate joint resolution.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator a moment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The two resolutions start out to attain the same end, but the resolution of the Senator from North Dakota starts on the theory that before drafting aliens into the service we shall enter into negotiations with the Government and get that Government's consent, which is a long way to reach an end. Senate joint resolution 84 proceeds on the theory that we will draft the alien into the service. We have not any power to do it under the law at all, and would not have if the Senator's resolution passes. Now, I proceed on the theory that we will draft the alien into the service, and then his Government can make the request that he be exempted from such service.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. How are you going to find out whether his Government wants him exempted or not?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Why, the diplomatic representative of the Government in question represents every individual citizen of that country.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; but who is going to ask the question?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Then if nobody asks it, he will not be exempt. He will have to serve.

Mr. LODGE. But somebody has got to ask it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Not necessarily.

Mr. LODGE. Well, if there is no question asked, to whom does he go if he wants to be exempted?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. He goes to the diplomatic representative.

Mr. LODGE. Precisely; and you have got to start there under your joint resolution, just the same as under everything else.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN I insist, Mr. President, that an alien is not of necessity exempted from the draft. He may be drafted into the service, and if he goes voluntarily nobody can make any question; but if he does not want to submit to the terms of the draft, all he has to do is by letter to notify his diplomatic represenative, and if that diplomatic representative thinks he ought to be excused he will be excused, and that is all.

Mr. LODGE. That is a very clumsy way to go about it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, the only way in which you can get an alien into the military service is by his voluntary consent and the consent of his Government, or by drafting him; and, of course, you can not draft him if the treaties prevent it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. He can not even enlist now.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No. He can not even enlist now, because of international comity and the reciprocal custom of nations, but you have got to do one of two things—either make a new treaty or nullify present treaties. The Senator's resolution will nullify the present treaties, in my judgment.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. No.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It will operate pro tanto, to nullify our treaties which prevent service of alien subjects in the Army of the United States, unless exceptions are made by law. Over and over again, Secretary Seward, Secretary Stanton, Secretary Fish, Secretary Bayard, and Assistant Secretary Davis passed upon these questions during the Civil War. After the doctrine, at one time quite general, of the indefeasible allegiance had been abandoned our Government attempted to reach this kind of resident citizens, but you can not reach them appropriately except by treaty. We can nullify present treaties by the resolution of the Senator from Oregon, a very summary process, or you can start treaty making under the resolution of the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. If that is going to be the policy of this Government then we will not get the aliens. The aliens in some of the sections of this country are 50 per cent of the population.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. They are and should be reached.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is what this joint resolution 84 attempts to do. The result is that the American boys, 50 per cent of the population in some New England cities, go to serve permanently and the quota of alien population stay there and take the native American's place. Let me say to the Senator the purpose of this is to draft an alien and make him serve equally with the native-born American citizen. If his Government wants to exempt him let him make the claim for exemption.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I say to the Senator I trust these aliens can be taken by law. It is a very easy and simple matter for the Executive to make it possible for us to do this promptly by law. We found a great deal of fault with the disregard of treaties by other Governments, and we must not disregard them ourselves.

I agree with the Senator from Oregon that the invidious distinction which is made under our draft law of allowing a man to have a safe place to work and a safe place to live, and protect him by the law, and police his property, and yet not be able to take him in the service of our country when the Nation is in need is an outrageous thing. Aliens should have no premium placed upon their lack of national spirit.

The other day I was in a mining town in Pennsylvania where 40 per cent of the men who were registered were aliens. They are living under our law and protected by our Government, and they owe a duty to the country. Protection and responsibility should be equal under our flag. I favor the resolution. I want some law passed that will meet this situation promptly and effectively, and I really believe if we pass the resolution of the Senator from North Dakota we will in the correct and proper and diplomatic way, without offense to anyone, be able to take these people under the second draft, which is bound to come, and make them a part of the defensive army of the United States.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. McCUMBER. In just one moment. I think I ought to correct the statement made by the Senator from Oregon. I think he has not gone to the bottom of those legal rights. If I understood him correctly, he assumed that we would have the right to draft all these foreigners immediately and then we could hold them unless their own Governments made objection. Every alien under our treaties has the right to go into our courts. He has the same right as our citizens have to defend all his rights, and if we have no right to draft him he can immediately apply to the courts if we attempt to exercise those rights over him.

Mr. HARDWICK. In other words, any alien can claim it as much as his Government.

Mr. McCUMBER. Just as much as his Government. It is the individual right of the alien. I now yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. PITTMAN. I wish to direct my first question to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, the Senator from Oregon. I wish to know from the Senator from Oregon if he would feel that our Government had the same legal right and moral right to impress the aliens of countries with which we were not allied as of countries with which we are allied.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Oh, no; the resolution that I have prepared——

Mr. PITTMAN. I am not talking about the resolution; I am asking the Senator a question.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. An alien, a national of a country with which we are at war?

Mr. PITTMAN. I did not say at war; I mean with which we were not at war and with which we were not allied.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think we have, Mr. President. We protect him under the treaty obligations, and I claim that we have attempted to do that.

Mr. PITTMAN. Let me follow that up. Whether that be the law or not the law, it certainly is very poor policy for this Government to establish and would be a very disastrous precedent. Under those circumstances Mexico could impress our citizens in a fight with bandits. In a case of this character or kind China could impress our citizens in any fight it might have in that country. In other words, all control over the moral right or the legal right to impress our citizens in all characters of wars in foreign countries would be lost forever. In our present situation it may not be legally right but it is morally right that the nationals of our allies should fight either for their own Government or ours. It is morally right to compel these aliens to fight on our side or to fight on the side of our allies. But in the event that these aliens were not our allies it would be wrong for us to impress them in a war with a country in which their Government had not the slightest interest. Yet under the precedent that the Senator from Oregon is attempting to establish by his bill any other country would have that legal right to impress our citizens.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I want to qualify that statement just a little. We must protect the right of aliens. We have given two alternatives here. We have exempted the alien from the effect of a draft provided his diplomatic representative asks not that the individual be excused but that the national of that particular country be excused. That protects him under the treaty obligation. Then we give him the further right, if he is not satisfied with the ruling, he can leave the country, and that is what he ought to do.

Mr. PITTMAN. I am not saying——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Just a moment, if the Senator will permit me. That question was up in the Civil War between the United States and Great Britain. Great Britain insisted that we did not have the right to draft a British subject into the forces of the Union, yet if we did undertake to draft him we must at least give him an opportunity to leave this country, and Great Britain was satisfied when we gave them 65 days in which to leave the country if they did not want to be subject to the draft. That is all the resolution that I have proposed does. It says that the draft shall be applicable to the foreign subject unless the diplomatic representative asks that he be relieved because of treaty stipulations, and then if he does not see fit to submit to the draft and the diplomatic representative asks that he be excused it gives him 90 days to leave the country, and that is what he ought to do.

Mr. McCUMBER. Does not the Senator think that it is rather a harsh proposition to force people from the State who have come here, and lawfully come here, and say, "Enter this Army or we will deport you"? Does the Senator really think that any diplomatic agent of a foreign country without any change in our treaty could dictate whether or not any foreigner who is drafted into our Army should remain there? Has not the individual under our treaties the right to say, "Until that treaty has been changed between the Governments I have a right under the treaty to be relieved from compulsory military service," and can he not go into our courts and get his relief?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator from Nevada is on his feet and I will first yield to him.

Mr. PITTMAN. I shall not take much more of the time of the Senator. I simply want to make my position clear on this matter. It is not whether we are treating aliens justly or not justly. The question is whether or not the Government of those aliens should have any say as to what is justice. I am unwilling that the citizens of this country shall be impressed into military service in any other country, no matter whether that country thinks it just or unjust, unless our Government has an opportunity to determine for its own citizens whether or not it is just or unjust. I shall never vote for any policy or any precedent that would deny this Government the right to intervene hereafter upon behalf of its citizens when some other Government attempts to impress them into the military service. If we have not that legal right now it should be confirmed by treaties with every other country; a treaty not giving that right should not be allowed to continue longer.

There is no danger in this matter, because there is no question whatever that every one of our allies will instantly seek the opportunity to either impress these aliens in their own armies or in our Army. The result is exactly the same. The only difference is that we preserve our policies under this form of government by the resolution of the Senator from North Dakota, and yet just as effectually enforce enlistment of aliens.

Mr. McCUMBER. I now yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not as familiar with the subject as I might be if I had examined it carefully, but I believe there is a good deal of confusion and a good deal of error in some of the conclusions that I have heard announced. First, there is no difference in the legal status of an alien before he has declared his intention to become a citizen and afterwards, so far as this question is concerned.

Mr. McCUMBER. Up to the time he takes full citizenship papers.

Mr. CUMMINS. He still is the subject of a foreign country. He is entitled to no privileges in this country except those which follow his preparation and allow him to proceed with it to full citizenship. We have already passed a law which impresses aliens who have filed their declaration of intention to become citizens of the United States. If we have a constitutional right to draft such aliens, we have the constitutional right to draft aliens who have not declared their intention to become citizens. I am not speaking about the wisdom of pursuing or enforcing the right; I am simply speaking of it from its legal standpoint.

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield, if I have the right to yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. Of course nobody pretends for a moment that a declaration of intention forfeits citizenship. There is not a man who has declared his intention who is drafted who can not relieve himself from that by going into any court; but where they had declared the intention I suppose it was thought by Congress and by the department the probability is that they would not resist draft. If they resist it, of course, they are on exactly the same footing as the alien. Everybody knows that.

Mr. CUMMINS. I thought that idea had been somewhat lost in this discussion; but, assuming now that that proposition is well established, I do not agree with the subsequent statement of the Senator from Massachusetts that an alien who has declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States can exempt himself from the draft. I do not agree that any alien can exempt himself from the draft upon his own application unless there is a treaty between the United States and his nation which exempts him from compulsory service.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is what I am claiming, both by direct treaty and by the favored-nation clause in all the other treaties.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not believe that the favored-nation clause in the treaties covers the question. I am rather inclined to agree with the Senator from Minnesota that so far as those treaties are concerned they relate to commerce and traffic and not to individual status. I would hesitate, then, to take a course upon the resolution of the Senator from North Dakota that would preclude the insistence upon the part of the United States that aliens domiciled in our country belonging to powers which are neutral in this controversy may not be compelled to fight for the United States. If they are here without the intention of returning, if they are not mere visitors, if they have come here to live, without regard to their declaration of intention to become citizens, they are subject, in my opinion, to military service and can be impressed into it without any offense to the neutral country from which they come.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. Aside from that one idea, I would be very glad to see the resolution coming from the Foreign Relations Committee pass, because I really think that is a proper way to proceed with our allies, but I am not prepared to admit that we can not take these other people and make them stand in the armies of the United States for our own protection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. STONE. Will the Senator at this pertinent juncture allow me to read a very brief extract from what I think are authoritative expressions on this subject? I ask the Senator if he will permit me to do that for just a few moments?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. STONE. First I read three or four lines from Moore's Digest of International Law, three or four lines from a communication by Mr. Madison, then Secretary of State, to Mr.

Monroe, minister to England, dated January 5, 1804, in which the Secretary says:

> Citizens or subjects of one country residing in another, though bound by their temporary allegiance to many common duties, can never be rightfully forced into military service, particularly external service, nor be restrained from leaving their residence when they please. The law of nations protects them against both.

Again, August 14, 1862, Mr. Seward, Secretary of State, used this language in a communication to the minister addressed:

> I can hardly suppose that there exists anywhere in the world the erroneous belief that aliens are liable here to military duty. If you think otherwise, there will be no objection to your giving any publication you please to this communication.

Again, September 5, 1862, Mr. Seward, in a letter to Gov. Morton, of Indiana, said:

> There is no principle more distinctly and clearly settled in the law of nations than the rule that resident aliens not naturalized are not liable to perform military service. We have uniformly claimed and insisted upon it in our intercourse with foreign nations.

One other brief extract, and I am through. This is from Mr. Oppenheim's work on International Law, volume 1, page 394. He says:

> But apart from jurisdiction and mere local administrative arrangements, both of which concern all aliens alike, a distinction must be made between such aliens as are merely traveling and stay, therefore, only temporarily on the territory, and such as take their residence there either permanently or for some length of time. A State has wider power over aliens of the latter kind; it can make them pay rates and taxes, and can even compel them, in case of need, under the same conditions as citizens, to serve in the local police and the local fire brigade for the purpose of maintaining public order and safety. On the other hand, an alien does not fall under the personal supremacy of the local State; therefore he can not be made to serve in its army or navy, and can not, like a citizen, be treated according to discretion.

I have read that much, and I could go on reading from other authors like things almost without limit. I know nothing to the contrary.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Dakota allow me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. If the Senator from North Dakota will indulge me a moment, I desire to read a word or two from the report which the Committee on Foreign Relations has laid before the Senate. I have not examined this question, and I do not pretend to speak upon it as the result of an investigation. I did not expect to address myself to it all, but here is a statement to which the committee has given its authenticity:

> Secretary Seward, in 1868, wrote: "This Government is not disposed to draw in question the right of a nation in a case of extreme necessity to enroll in the military forces all persons within its territories, whether citizens or domiciled foreigners."

Under that statement the only question would be whether we have reached the point of extreme necessity.

Mr. STONE. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. Wait a moment. Let me read the rest of it, and then I shall be very glad to hear the comment of the Senator from Missouri. The report continues:

> The following year Secretary Fish wrote: "This Government, though waiving the exercise of the right to require military service from all residents, has never surrendered that right and can not object if other Governments insist upon it."

Mr. McCUMBER. That was Secretary Fish.

Mr. CUMMINS. That was Secretary Fish. Again he wrote, in 1871:

> I must decline to enter into the question to what extent and under what circumstances do our citizens, native or naturalized (in the absence of treaty stipulations, owe military service to a foreign Government in whose dominions they are domiciled for commercial or other purposes. They certainly do not stand on the same footing as mere travelers or temporary sojourners.
>
> Assistant Secretary Davis in 1873 wrote: "There is no treaty stipulation between the United States and Great Britain which exempts the citizens or subjects of either party from military duty in the forces of the other, either in peace or war. Consequently we can not claim such exemption as a matter of right.

I read now a comment from Moore, which is found in his Digest of International Law. It is also quoted in the report. He is discussing the question of the difference, if any, in the legal status between an alien who has declared his intention to become a citizen and one who has not done so. He reaches the conclusion, of course, that there is no difference, legally speaking, and the conclusion that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] very emphatically affirmed a few moments ago. Then he continues:

> As we have seen, there is a right, aside from treaty stipulations, to impress any alien into the military service of the country where he has gone to reside. This right is controlled by considerations of comity. But in the case of a declarant the considerations of comity are, for the reasons just indicated, much weaker. Therefore it follows naturally that military service is more likely to be successfully exacted of an alien who has declared his intention to become a citizen than of an alien who has not so declared. Great Britain in the precedent cited above doubtless did her full duty in securing for her citizens, declarants for American citizenship, a period of 65 days within which to leave the United States on pain of being subjected to military service if they remained. It is doubtful if any country would do more to-day; many might do less.

I am reading these extracts to indicate that the opinions in times past of distinguished jurists in this country have not been uniform with regard to the right of the Government to impress aliens within our borders who have taken up their residence for purposes of business, without regard to whether or not they have filed the declaration of intention to become citizens. I will not say at this moment that I believe the weight of opinion is upon one side or the other; but I do say that the course pursued by the Committee on Military Affairs could not be regarded as offensive to any nation, and it does give every foreign power and every foreign citizen ample opportunity to exert whatever right they may have in the premises.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I desire to close in a very few moments. There has been some conflict between the authorities upon the question of the right of the Government with reference to those who have merely declared their intention to become citizens and different rules have been applied. I have examined the later authorities down the line, and while in the earlier days, when we were in a war, we sought to justify ourselves when we impressed aliens into our service, the prevailing authorities at the present time seem to be against that view, and the later authorities all seem to be along the same line, that the mere declaration of an intention to become a citizen does not change or vary the legal status of the declarant, but that he has the same right to the protection of his home Government, the right to refuse to complete his declaration by actual citizenship, and to stop anywhere short of becoming a citizen. Even Secretary Fish seemed to have modified his opinion later on; at least, he said he did not intend to go to the extent indicated by what the Senator from Iowa has read, because in 1874 he wrote:

> We did not claim the right to impress aliens into our forces during the late Civil War, but it is understood that in one instance at least, in the case of a siege, we sought to justify such an impressment.

Then in 1888 Mr. Bayard summed up the situation thus:

> It is well settled by international law that foreigners temporarily resident in a country can not be compelled to enter into its permanent military service. It is true that in times of social disturbance or of invasion their services in police or home guards may be exacted, and that they may be required to take up arms to help in the defense of their place of residence against the invasion of savages, pirates, etc., as a means of warding off some great public calamity by which all would suffer indiscriminately. The test in each case as to whether a foreigner can properly be enrolled against his will is that of necessity. Unless social order and immunity from attack by uncivilized tribes can not be secured except through the enrollment of such a force, a nation has no right to call upon foreigners for assistance against their will.

Quite a number of these cases are cited in this report, and the final conclusion from them is given.

I simply desire to say, in closing, that there necessarily must arise conditions which will enter into any new treaty or arrangement we may make with foreign powers. Russia might be satisfied that we take all of her citizens; France might ask that we attach to such an arrangement a condition that she could draft American citizens resident in France; Great Britain might require one condition and some other country still another. We could not possibly anticipate all of those conditions in any law we might now enact.

So we gain time by initiating procedure immediately, and I hope we may pass this resolution before 2 o'clock, merely suggesting, as it does, the propriety of the President proceeding to obtain these agreements. That can not conflict, it can not interfere, with any other legislation that we may thereafter enact.

I ask for immediate action for another reason, and that is this: There is a great deal of dissatisfaction throughout the United States due to the fact that our own citizens are being forced into this war while the citizens of other countries joining with us in the war are being exempted. There is just cause for complaint along this line, and especially as the aliens so exempted take the profitable places that our own citizens must yield. I believe it would create a sense of assurance and contentment upon the part of our own people if the Senate of the United States would indicate immediately its purpose of bringing into our Army the citizens of countries engaged with us in war against the central powers.

Mr. President, I again say to the Senator from Oregon that I can see no conflict between my resolution and Senate joint resolution 84. I am fearful, however, that after we have passed a general law so many conditions will arise in reference to any new arrangements that our law will not be applicable and we would be losing rather than gaining time; but we lose nothing, we forfeit nothing, by asking the President to proceed at once to secure the very agreements which Senate joint resolution 84 admits will have to be secured before the law can become effective.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I shall not waste any of the short time that remains before the morning hour ends by going over international law. There is, to my mind, no question that at present under international law aliens are immune from military service. The growth has been steadily in that direction, as the authorities and citations show. That, however, is not important, because this whole matter must be settled by treaty. We have a treaty with Japan, we have a treaty with Italy, and I think with one or two other countries, in which it is expressly provided—and it is reciprocal, of course—that the citizens of those countries shall not be liable to compulsory military service in the United States. The favored-nation clause imports that clause embodied in the Italian and Japanese treaties into every other treaty in which the favored-nation clause is found.

Mr. President, I recognize this evil as strongly as anybody can possibly do. I think I was one of the first to call attention to it in the Senate. I am heartily in sympathy with the resolution proposed by the Committee on Military Affairs, and there is nothing in it that is offensive to any nation; but other nations have got to go through the same door that we are trying to open by this resolution. The only communications that can be held with foreign Governments must be held through the Executive. The resolution proposed by the Senator from Oregon, to which I absolutely agree, is worthless, unless the Executive initiates negotiations, so that the law can be carried out without the abrogation of treaties.

Mr. President, my point is this: The advisability of curing the great evil and injustice that exists because of the fact that aliens, subjects or citizens of the allied nations, living in the United States, can not be drafted needs no explanation from me or anybody else. There is only one way to meet that evil and that is to arrange with the powers engaged with us in the war against Germany to set aside for the time being the provisions of the treaties. They will all be glad to do it. There is not one of them that will not be glad to do it. They believe, and believe rightly, that these men ought to fight either for the country of their adoption or the country of their allegiance and that they can not live under the ægis of the country of their birth and escape service by dwelling in the United States. That is a wrong that must be remedied, but it can not be remedied unless the Executive acts.

I do not propose, for one, to give the impression to the country that Congress can remedy this evil. It can not. It is entirely helpless unless the Executive acts; and I think the proper course to pursue is to ask him to act. If he does not move, the legislation we pass here does not amount to a snap of the finger. I do not want to take a responsibility that is not ours. Our powers are being taken from us, but that is no reason why we should assume responsibility that it may be found agreeable to shift upon our shoulders. This is an Executive responsibility. The State Department and the President can settle this matter in a week, in my judgment, because I know that the powers allied with us are anxious to have their subjects and citizens fight under some flag when all the countries are at war. But we can not do it; we have no diplomatic connection. Under the joint resolution of the Senator from Oregon nothing could be done until the Executive had made the necessary diplomatic arrangements.

I am ready to vote for the joint resolution as well as for the resolution of the Senator from North Dakota, but I think the better and more recognized way is to request the President, on behalf of the Senate, to take the necessary steps; and, if he shall take the necessary steps, no laws will be needed. Under the treaty or agreement or convention, which would then be the supreme law of the land, he could draft them all. That is the way to proceed—go straight to the Executive and let him perform this important duty, as I have no question he will.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I realize, with the Senator from Massachusetts and the other members of the Foreign Relations Committee, that there are delicate questions connected with this legislation. I have no objection to the Executive entering into diplomatic negotiations with other countries in order to bring about some sort of an arrangement under the terms of which the nationals of our allies, at least, and possibly the nationals of some other countries, could be utilized in the emergency which now confronts the American people; but we all know from past experience that when this diplomatic negotiation is entered upon the subject involved in it sleeps the sleep that knows no waking. It may be concluded in six months, it may be concluded in six years, and it may never be concluded, as those familiar with these diplomatic representations can well testify.

In the meantime, Mr. President, a situation confronts us. The situation has been very well shown here in some of the cities, particularly in New England, where in some instances one-half of the population, and in other instances more than half the population, are aliens—not alien enemies but aliens. As many as 65 per cent of the population in some places are aliens, and under the method of applying the selective draft the result is accomplished of sending the American youth to fight while these particular nationals of other countries, as well as the nationals of enemy countries, are permitted to remain at home.

Mr. President, I for one want to see that condition cured, and this joint resolution No. 84 that has been reported out of the Military Affairs Committee undertakes to protect the situation that Senators are afraid is liable to bring about trouble.

Take the case of Japan: We always seem to be afraid of Japan for some reason; I do not know why. The Japanese people are just as reasonable as the American people, and I sometimes think a good deal smarter than the American people in that they give first consideration to their own country. We have provided for Japan and China in this joint resolution, not because they ought to be treated under ordinary circumstances as different from any other nation, but simply because we treat them differently in some respects than we do any of the other foreign powers, and the resolution that has been reported out by the committee provides, with reference to the subjects of Japan and China, not mentioning them by name, in subsection 4:

> Aliens not alien enemies who, because of treaty stipulations or act of Congress, are not permitted to become citizens of the United States shall be exempt from compulsory or other military service except as volunteers.

Now, that is perfectly proper. Either by treaty stipulation, as with China, or by gentlemen's agreement, as with Japan, we do not permit the citizens of those countries to become citizens of the United States.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; certainly.

Mr. LODGE. This resolution of the Foreign Relations Committee excludes China and Japan.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Oh, well, I am not making any question about that.

Mr. LODGE. And if they can be excluded by confining it to all European nations, why is it necessary to rub in the fact that they are not eligible for citizenship?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator is voicing the timidity about which I speak. We have had that question up here before. We have had it in the discussion of treaties. We had it particularly in the discussion of the immigration bill. I have no disposition to irritate any of these people, and I only mention China and Japan because they were mentioned by the Senators who advocated this Senate resolution which the Foreign Relations Committee have reported to the Senate. I say we have excepted China and Japan from the provisions of Senate joint resolution 84, not beause it is those particular countries but simply because we have applied a different rule of citizenship with reference to those nationalities. In other words, we have practicaliy, by treaty, stipulated that Chinese subjects should not become American citizens, and by treaty stipulation and a gentlemen's agreement we have practically said the same thing with respect to Japan.

Now, no alien who is not permitted to become a citizen of the United States ought to be drafted into the service to perform military service for the country; but that does not apply with reference to any other alien. Nearly all immigrants who come here from every corner of the globe can be admitted to full citizenship. We all know that. There are thousands of men who have been in this country for 25 years, and some of them for 50 years, who have accumulated fortunes on the western prairies in the cattle business and in every other form of business, who have nevertheless not taken out their final citizenship papers, and are still aliens, but to all intents and purposes they are American citizens, because they live under the protection of the flag, and they have built up their homes and amassed their wealth under the American system. Now, I can not see any reason, nor is there any, why such men should not be compelled to serve America in her dire distress. It is true that the Senate resolution does not prevent those men from being brought within the provisions of Senate joint resolution 84; but if the pending resolution passes, when the time comes to consider Senate joint resolution 84 Senators will say: "Well, the executive department now has that under consideration, and there is no use in undertaking to provide for it by legislation."

Now, Mr. President, let us look at Senate joint resolution 84. Subsection 1 provides that—

All aliens resident in the United States for more than one year who are not subjects of the enemy country, and have not declared their intention to become citizens, shall be subject to selective draft for military service pursuant to all the remaining provisions of the above act in the same manner as citizens of the United States, except so far as otherwise provided in the ensuing paragraph.

That provision takes them all in, but there are certain exceptions to it. Subdivision 2 provides that—

Subjects of such countries other than those allied with the enemy country shall be exempt from the draft if any treaty now in force with such countries exempts its subjects in this country from compulsory or other military service, unless the diplomatic representative of such treaty country shall have waived the provision of such treaty for the purpose of the present war; and aliens who claim the benefit of exemption under such treaties and the present paragraph shall be allowed to depart from the United States within 90 days from the date of the allowance of their claim of exemption.

That protects the treaty country absolutely and entirely; it not only does that but it does what Great Britain insisted ought to be done in certain cases during the Civil War. It gives an opportunity to the alien subject to get out of the country if he does not want to serve the country of his adoption as an alien, if not as a citizen. Now, that section takes absolute care of that.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] says: "But who is going to make the claim?" I say the diplomatic representative is here to listen to the appeals of the subjects of the country, and the diplomatic representative can make the demand if he wants to, either on the behest of the individual subject of that country or else upon his own initiative and upon his own motion for all such subjects.

Now, Mr. President, I want to call attention to a case that arose during the Civil War—and I want it understood that I am not going to insist here that the question is one that is free from doubt. But why can not America sometimes resolve a doubt in her own favor? It has sometimes seemed to me that we have been too generous in resolving all doubts that exist in the minds of Members of Congress in favor of some country other than our own. I note that when the test comes the doubt entertained by any other country is always resolved in favor of its own people.

During the Civil War in this country all persons who had voted as State citizens were claimed by the United States Government as liable to conscription, and the act of Congress of March 3, 1863, expressly declared that the levy should include all persons of foreign birth who had declared on oath their intention to become citizens. This, of course, included many alien residents, but no protest was entered, Lord Lyons merely being instructed, as the British representative, to abide by the decisions of the American law courts, even in instances where aliens had not declared their intention to become American citizens but had exercised the elective franchise under the laws of some States which permitted it. However, the British Government suggested that in the case of those who had merely declared their intention to become American citizens, but had not exercised any political franchise in consequence of such declaration, they ought to be allowed a reasonable period to leave the United States as an option of continuing therein with annexed conditions. Thereupon the United States allowed 65 days to such persons to exercise their option, and the British Government refused to interfere any further in behalf of any who had not availed themselves of the opportunity.

As was very well suggested by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], there is no difference between an alien and a man who has declared his intention of becoming a citizen. Our own laws may confer some right upon the man who has declared his intention to become a citizen which they have not conferred upon one who has not, but in international law there is absolutely no distinction between a man who is an alien temporarily residing or domiciled in this country and a man who has declared his intention to become a citizen.

This course, which was taken by Great Britain during the Civil War with reference to her subjects, seemed to be an acknowledgment by the British Government that aliens who had exercised political rights had subjected themselves to practical obligations to military service. In other words, Great Britain practically said that if a man had taken out his first papers—which does not make him a citizen by any means—he had then subjected himself by that single act to the laws of this country requiring of him military service. Now, if that be the construction—and I think it is a fair construction—of the attitude of Great Britain with reference to the subject, if it can be construed further as a recognition of the justice of the claim of foreign countries to require a limited military service of domiciled aliens, it is also a recognition of the right and duty of aliens to leave the country freely as an alternative to such service. This right has always been vigorously insisted upon beyond question.

Now, Mr. President, with reference to the impressment of our own citizens in other countries where they have gone, just as aliens of other countries have come here, have become domiciled there, have become residents there, and have remained in the country for a great many years, protected by the flag and the laws of that particular country, I, for one, do not see any reason why such men should not serve the country that has protected their property and their lives. I would feel if I went to Mexico and temporarily expatriated myself, had accumulated a fortune there, and received protection at the hands of the laws of that Republic, that if Mexico demanded my services she ought to have them, or I ought to ask only to be permitted to return to the United States. That is the most that any alien could claim. If they do not want to serve, let them come back to the country of their birth and render service there. I, for one, am opposed to permitting men to come to this country, as they have done, to remain here for a lifetime, and to accumulate vast properties here, and then, when the country is passing through stress and storm, for those same men to say, "We will remain at our posts and let the young men who were born on this soil go off and fight the battles of the country, whether at home or in the battle lines of Great Britain and France." They ought to be subjected to the same rule as our own citizens, and yet not quite the same harsh rule, for they ought to be permitted to return to their country if they do not want to fight.

I have in mind an individual illustration of that very proposition now, and I venture to say that up in New England, where they have so many foreigners, numerous illustrations can be cited. I know in my State of a family of American boys. Every one of those boys is subjected to the selective draft. All of them may go. Some of them may escape under the system that has been created under the law, but if all those young men happen to be drawn, all of them will have to go. Yet within a short distance of that same family is another family of a nationality with whom we are fighting, with the same number of boys in it, and not one of them will go.

Mr. President, there is absolutely no justice in any such condition of things as that. I have no opposition to the alien. I am glad to have them come here; but if a man comes here and remains long enough to make this country his home to all intents and purposes, and does not know any other home except by the ties of kinship and blood, he ought to be compelled to serve the country when needed, unless he is protected by treaty rights; and Senate joint resolution 84 protects him absolutely under the treaty obligation, and further protects him by giving him the permission which Great Britain insisted upon during the Civil War, of leaving the country within a reasonable time if he does not want to assist in the protection of the country. Now, there are countries—and I think the committee's report calls attention to the fact—there are a number of countries with which we have treaty stipulations.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask him if we are not both aiming at the same object?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think so.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Then why should there be any vexation over accomplishing a purpose upon which we are absolutely in accord?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. But the Senator was not here when I stated the only objection I had to the Senate resolution. It is that when we once start in upon diplomatic negotiations with these countries, we never get anywhere.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Ordinarily that might be so, but I do not believe it is so now.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator's joint resolution or a dozen others should be passed, you would have diplomatic negotiations just the same.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am not so sure about that.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think now, in the present situation, we can get prompt action, and when this second call is made that we will get those people, and we ought to get them.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. How many years did it take us to settle the fisheries dispute between the United States and Canada, and how long did it take us to settle the northwestern boundary dispute? This last was only settled within the past few years, and yet it was under discussion for a hundred years. I have no objection to this proposition of the Senator's, except I say that just as soon as that resolution is placed upon the statute books objection will be made to taking up a resolution which really means something. If once we enter upon these proposed diplomatic negotiations, we are not going to get anywhere within six months, nor during the continuance of this war; but if Senate joint resolution 84 is adopted by the Senate you can rest assured that the diplomatic representatives of these Governments will get busy.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, we sent resolutions of the same general purport, so far as their legislative status is concerned, to Mr. Cleveland over and over again regarding the Cuban situation. He treated them merely as an expression of legislative judgment. He was not moved by one of them; but the President now will be inclined to do this. This is proper, and he appreciates it. I do not want to say what some of my associates believe, but I really believe that it will find cooperation there immediately.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield; yes.

Mr. LODGE. I only wanted to say this: You can pass any laws you please, but they will have no effect. The President will not carry them out, and ought not to carry them out, in violation of treaties. You come back to the same thing, and no President would think of doing it.

Coming back to our negotiations, I think they can be completed in a fortnight, and they will come just as much in your bill as on the other. I am ready to vote for both, but I am sorry to see, owing to a little controversy between two committees, the legislation go to the ground. The President can do it without any resolution or legislation.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. This is not any dispute between two committees. It is a question of vital importance, and if we do not adjust it and consider it fearlessly we are going to have trouble between the American youth and those who stay behind and are excused from duty.

Mr. LODGE. I say to the Senator you will never do it except through the President of the United States.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The American people can do anything they want.

Mr. LODGE. Not except through the executive function.

Mr. STONE. The morning hour has expired, or practically so, and we can not conclude this matter. At the very first opportunity I shall move, if necessary, to take up the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate Senate joint resolution No. 17.

The SECRETARY. A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 17) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Oregon his theory——

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Does the Senator desire to interrupt me?

Mr. LODGE. I wanted to address the Senate on the unfinished business.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will be through in just a moment, if the Senator will pardon me.

Mr. LODGE. I thought this matter had gone over. I did not mean to interrupt the Senator.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to know the theory upon which the Senator from Oregon in his resolution regards citizens of Austria, Bulgaria, and Turkey as alien friends. Mr. President, we have recently been appropriating large sums of money, to be derived from the sale of bonds of the United States, or from taxes levied upon the property of the people, which we have turned over to Russia and Serbia and to France and to Italy for the purpose of equipping soldiers and procuring munitions of war to withstand the onslaught of the nations which the Senator from Oregon deals with in this resolution as friends of the United States.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Does the Senator desire to interrupt me?

Mr. LODGE. No; Mr. President, I thought the unfinished business had been laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business has been laid before the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] desires to address the Senate on that subject and so did I, and I thought, under the unanimous-consent agreement, those who desired to speak on the constitutional amendment would have an opportunity to do so. I would not interfere for a minute with the Senator from Washington, but I am obliged to leave the Senate to attend a committee meeting.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am very sorry, indeed; I had no advice that the Senator from Massachusetts desired to occupy the floor. If he had advised me to that effect, I would have hesitated to address the Chair.

Now that I am discussing this question, I desire to conclude it, which I will do in a very few moments, and yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

I simply want to say that whatever the legal status of aliens of the countries which I have named, because of the absence of a formal declaration of war by the United States, their actual status is that of alien enemies. We are organizing an expeditionary army about to be transported to France. Does the Senator from Oregon suppose when its ranks are thinned by the fire of Austrian regiments on the battle line in France our men will welcome them with the cry, "Here we have in front of us friends and not enemies"? If the President is sending missions to Russia, loaning money by the hundreds of millions to enable her to maintain an army to resist the Austrians, why should the Senator here, acting as an official of another branch of the Government, be at the same identical moment treating as neutral friends these same people who are opposed to Russia, attempting to destroy her army, and invading her country?

It illustrates the anomalous condition in which the United States finds itself in many of the negotiations which have taken place recently between the so-called entente allies. The cause of the allies for the purpose of this war is the cause of the United States. They are at war with these various countries, and so long as we are consolidating our resources and our armies with their resources and their armies we ought to put ourselves in the position by a proper declaration—and that is one of the advantages which the resolution of the Senator from North Dakota has over the resolution of the Senator from Oregon—to avail ourselves of all the international legal rights of the state of war which actually exists between the United States and the allies of Germany.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. HOLLIS. The Senator of course notes the distinction. The resolution offered by the Senator from North Dakota is merely a Senate resolution, and the Senate can not declare war. It must be done by a joint resolution.

Mr. POINDEXTER. But in so far as the expression of the Senate is concerned it declares and recognizes that a state of war exists. It does not, as does the resolution reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, take the opposite course, and, in so far as the power of Congress is concerned, establish by an express provision of the statute, as this resolution will be in effect if it is adopted by both branches of Congress, a state of peace between the United States and countries with which we are engaged now in deadly conflict, in an issue that involves, if it is reasoned out to a last analysis, the national existence and institutions of the United States.

It is illogical; it is perfectly anomalous. The resolution ought to be defeated unless that part of it is eliminated, and at the very earliest moment the United States ought by a proper, unequivocal resolution of Congress declare as a matter of law what is now a fact as a matter of military operation, a hostile state between the United States and these various Governments.

We can not go on with a proper and efficient conduct of the war in Europe with our hands tied, our international rights limited by the false assumption that there is no war existing between Bulgaria, Austria, and Turkey and the United States, and we can not properly guard our armies in the field by the proper regulations behind the lines if we have several hundred thousand alien enemies in the United States whom we persist in regarding as friends.

I want to call the attention of the Senator from Oregon to that clause of his resolution in order to make it perfectly clear, if he insists upon retaining it, that it is his theory, and I presume as chairman of this great committee he speaks for the administration, that the United States is now not in a state of war with the allies of Germany, although they have committed the same wrongs against the citizens of the United States and their property that Germany has committed. Austrian submarines have sunk our ships. Austrian subjects in the United States have carried on hostile operations against our munition plants to such an extent that we were compelled to sever diplomatic relations with the Austrian Government. As a matter of substantial consideration there is no material difference between the status of those countries who are allied with Germany, and whose soldiers are fighting side by side with hers on our battle fronts in Europe, and Germany herself.

NATION-WIDE PROHIBITION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 17) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, the pending proposal is that the Congress shall submit to the States for ratification or rejection an amendment to the Constitution prohibiting the manufacture, importation, and sale of intoxicating liquor for beverage purposes throughout the United States, and that final action shall be taken by the States on this proposal within six years from the date of its submission.

I am unable to support this proposition on principle, and I think it my duty to state briefly the reasons why I can not do so.

In the first place, three years ago when I submitted my candidacy for the Senate to the people of Georgia I stated emphatically and positively that I could not and would not support such an amendment. I was elected to the Senate with that declaration on my lips, probably not because of it, possibly in spite of it. I consider that I am bound, in honor, to vote in the Senate as I stated to the people I would vote if elected to the Senate. I can not subscribe to the monstrous doctrine that pledges in politics are not just as binding on honorable men as pledges in business or in any of the personal relations of life. I do not so regard it. Having taken a position in opposition to this amendment while seeking election, I am bound to stand by it after election, unless I had honestly changed my mind on the merits of the question and could frankly avow it, giving the reasons for my change of opinion.

I have not done so. I am opposed to this amendment now for the same reasons precisely that I was opposed to it when I was a candidate for the Senate. If all the whisky in the world could be poured into the ocean and the process of making it forgotten, I believe mankind would be happier and the world better off. At the same time, because I believe that, I can not ignore other considerations or stultify the principles and convictions of a lifetime to accomplish it or in the vain attempt to do so.

This amendment conforms, of course, to the constitutional requirements as to the manner and method in which the Constitution may be amended, and can not, therefore, be assailed as violative of the letter of the Constitution. It does, however, violate its spirit. It is in sharp conflict with one of the basic principles upon which the Constitution itself rests, with one of the fundamental and distinctive principles of our American system of government. It was the compact between the several States, formally and solemnly declared in the Constitution itself and by the convention that framed it, that each State retained its complete and exclusive control of all its domestic affairs and internal concerns, conferring upon the General Government powers over foreign relations and interstate commerce and other matters closely related to those two great subjects. But local self-government, the right of each State to regulate and control, in its own way and according to its own will, its own domestic affairs and internal concerns, was preserved to the State, and every attempt was made to safeguard it. That right, local self-government, is a part of the priceless heritage of liberty that came to us from our English forbears. To assert it and preserve it the War of the Revolution was fought; to defend it my fathers and my people shed their blood like water in the unfortunate Civil War, and though the grim verdict of that war may have determined the indestructibility of the Union and denied the right of secession to the States, it did not set aside or seek to set aside, it did not destroy or seek to destroy, the right of the States to local self-government. I can not for any sentimental reason, or because of any extreme case, prove faithless to the great doctrine for which my people have fought and bled through two great wars. It is a part, and it should be an indestructible part, of that priceless heritage of liberty that it is my duty to preserve and transmit.

Georgia has a right to regulate in any way she pleases, or to prohibit absolutely, the sale of liquor among her own people and within her own borders. She has that right, without regard to the views or opinions of all the other 47 States. It is purely a local question—entirely a domestic concern. This is especially true since the Congress has within less than a year made it possible for her and for every State to enforce her laws and carry out her policy without having them nullified in whole or in part by the interstate-commerce laws of the Nation.

The regulation or prohibition of the sale of whisky within a State is entirely and exclusively a local matter, a part of the wiser, far safer, far better that it should do so.

police power of the State. It ought to remain such. It is far

Let us for just a moment reverse conditions and see what the situation would be if we are to substitute national control for local police regulation of this question. Suppose Georgia were the only prohibition State in the Union, all the other 47 States being wet. Suppose that an amendment were proposed in Congress here, in the terms of this amendment, but providing that upon its ratification by the requisite number of States it should no longer be lawful to prohibit the sale of liquor in any State, but that the sale of liquor should be legalized in every State, under conditions and regulations to be prescribed by Congress. It might well happen that the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the wet States could and would force such a proposal through over the ineffective protest of one or a few dry States, but it would be everlastingly wrong for them to do so, and I for one would never support it. Indeed, the most vigorous opposition to it would come, I dare say, from the very influences and from the very gentlemen who favor the pending resolution. If so, is not the demonstration complete? Shall this question remain the football of politicians, theorists, and sentimentalists? Shall we do on one side of this question, with smug and complacent self-righteousness, what we would unquestionably denounce as a tyrannical interference with our rights and liberties if it were done on the other side? I submit that we ought not to do it. The principle of local self-government is basic and fundamental. I must stick to it. Exceptions to it are both insidious and dangerous. Once we embark on that course, who can predict where it will end or how it will stop? Will it embrace our election laws, and our elections themselves, substituting Federal regulation and control for State regulation and control? Who can predict? For one, I am not willing to risk it. For one, I can not desert my principles, however much I might like to put a ban on the liquor traffic.

For these reasons, Mr. President, I must cast my vote against the pending resolution.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I shall vote against the proposed constitutional amendment, and before doing so I wish briefly to state my reasons for my vote.

I am reminded by something which fell from the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] to say that I was reelected to the Senate last November by popular vote. My attitude on this constitutional amendment was extremely well known, because I had written a great many letters in regard to it, and some of them had been published and republished. Nobody voted for me under any misapprehension. The people of the State knew that if this amendment came up I should vote against it. Whether, as the Senator from Georgia said, it was on account of that or in spite of it that they voted, I shall not undertake to say, but there is no doubt of the fact.

Personally, I firmly believe that every human being would be far better morally, mentally, and physically if he never touched alcohol. For the benefit of mankind I wish to see that result brought about, and I hope that it can be done. But because I hold these beliefs I am not blind to the facts which surround the problem, and I can not vote for legislation which, in my opinion, would create a situation worse than that which now exists and probably long delay the coming of complete abstinence from alcohol among men.

From the earliest times of recorded history, so far as we know, mankind has devised for itself and consumed some sort of beverage containing alcohol. There is not, so far as I am aware, a tribe of savages, even of savages in the lowest stage, which has not in some manner invented liquor containing alcohol and which has not greedily accepted alcoholic liquors when it had the opportunity. We are, therefore, dealing with what is perhaps the most deeply planted habit of human nature. Except the natural instincts, there is nothing which has such roots in the life of man on earth as this habit of taking alcoholic stimulants. These facts should warn every reflecting man, no matter how much he desires to put an end absolutely to the consumption of alcohol in beverages, of the necessity of proceeding with some caution in dealing with an indulgence to which the human race has been so long habituated. My own belief is that practically complete abstinence may be brought about when a large majority of the people are convinced that it is wise and that it is for their benefit mentally, morally, and physically. I am aware that this will take time, but the steady growth of public sentiment in favor of complete temperance and of the abolition of the use of alcohol in any form proves, I think, that it is a well founded and entirely reasonable expectation. On the other hand, where people are not prepared and a major portion of them are not convinced of the harmful results of the use of alcohol, sudden and violent legislation to compel total abstinence before the people are ready to accept it can only serve to retard the advance of temperance principles and bring about a situation worse than that which now confronts us. I do not think the people of this or any other country are as yet prepared in opinion or by education to accept in good faith and with hearty sympathy the extreme legislation carried by this constitutional amendment. Without a prepared public sentiment among at least a majority of the people, such legislation as this is certain to fail. You will entirely destroy the control of the liquor traffic now exercised by regulations and licenses. You will attempt the impossible task of compelling large numbers of unwilling people to abandon a habit which, as practiced by them, they, however mistakenly, believe to be harmless and innocent. Multitudes of people will resent it as a gross and tyrannical interference with personal liberty. The result of sumptuary laws which are far in advance of public opinion is familiar to all who know anything of history. The excellent cause which it is sought to promote by such laws is not advanced. Resistance and even hatred against them are encouraged. The old habits are maintained, but to the undesirable character of the habits themselves there is now added that still more undesirable habit of lawbreaking. You will have a law incapable of complete enforcement, the disregard of which is considered by a large part of the population as wholly venial. This combination of circumstances always tends to weaken the respect for law and to create a distrust of the powers of government in the minds of those who are called upon to obey and support it.

This proposed amendment in its local application seems to me even more objectionable than in its general features. The States will, of course, cease to enforce prohibitory laws if they have them; they will be only too glad to get rid of the burden of the expense; and license laws will be impossible. The whole burden of enforcement will fall upon the General Government, assuming that the necessary legislation will be passed in order to execute the purpose of the constitutional amendment. To enforce throughout this country the prohibition of the sale or manufacture or importation of any form of distilled or fermented liquors will require at a moderate estimate 500,000 men. Distilled liquors are easily made. You will have to search hundreds of houses to make sure that liquors are not distilled in the kitchen, or fruit brandies made by some domestic appliance. Men who now drink quite harmlessly some beer or light wine will in a certain proportion turn to the consumption of distilled liquor, in most cases of the vilest and most poisonous kind. You can not hope to prevent the smuggling of liquor across our long frontiers and along our immense coasts. In the eighteenth century, when England had high duties on foreign liquor and manufactures, running cargoes of French brandy and laces was a large and profitable industry, and yet England had a very small coast to protect. I might add that down to the time of our Civil War, with all the nations of the earth combined against them, the slavers, nevertheless, managed to run cargoes of slaves onto our coast. Where large masses of the people would consider it even meritorious—at least quite venial—to evade and break the law the law would inevitably be broken constantly and in a large and effective way. I doubt if you could have an army large enough absolutely to enforce it.

It seems to me, therefore, that such sudden and violent action for the promotion of a purpose in which we are all agreed is a mistake in method, which will injure gravely the very cause we desire to advance. I think it will have a very bad effect on the public morals by creating a widespread indifference to law. As a measure of prohibition, the practical difficulties, in my opinion, will cause it to fail, and my own belief is that in a very short time we shall settle down to a condition like that presented by the amendments which attempted to confer full political rights upon the negroes of the United States, where the constitutional provision is entirely disregarded. They remain a dead letter in the Constitution, and this practical but most undesirable compromise is accepted by the great mass of the people of the United States as the only possible solution; and that, in my opinion, will be the ultimate result of this prohibitory amendment.

Where the majority of the people are thoroughly convinced of the need of prohibition there it will succeed and be practically enforced. But there are wide differences among the communities which make up the population of this great country, and for that reason I believe that the sound foundation for the prohibition of alcohol should be set up in the local community and thence be extended to the counties, if necessary, and thence to the State. This question is better dealt with by the States than by the National Government. The responsibility is more concentrated and there is greater harmony among the population of the smaller area inclosed within the State boundaries. The States as they gradually come to a majority belief in prohibition can and will enforce it well, although even State-wide prohibition should not be embarked upon too soon. The prohibition of liquor is essentially a police power, and wholly apart from the practical question of enforcement is the still greater question of general merit. I think we are taking a long step on a dangerous path when we take this police power from the States. The tendency now is to strip the States of one power after another that are conferred upon the National Government, forgetful of the fact that the strength and stability of our Government have depended upon the principle of local self-government embodied in the States. This attempt to hand over to the National Government the police power which properly belongs to the States will in its operation in other directions lead many people in the future to rue the day when they gave their support to a proposition so injurious to State independence and to State power.

I hold very strong and conscientious convictions on this subject. I believe the legislation attempted by this constitutional amendment will be in the highest degree damaging to the cause of real temperance; not to that temperance which contents itself with clamor for statutes and is satisfied with an unenforced law, but to the real cause of temperance, which seeks to put an end finally and conclusively when that end is reached to the consumption of alcohol by human beings.

For these reasons, believing as I do that this is the worst thing that could be done to advance temperance and total abstinence among the people, I can not vote for the amendment.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, of course, if I looked at this matter as do the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], I should take the same position which they take with reference to it. This is no sudden move, however. It is not the impulse of a moment. This is a question that has been agitated for many, many years. The matter of the passage of a joint resolution of this character has been pressed on Congress for many years, and it is only because of the continued and great growth of the sentiment in favor of action of this kind that this joint resolution now bids fair to be passed.

"Shall the people rule?" That was the political slogan of a great party a few years ago. Although I did not belong to that party, I believed in the truth interrogatively declared by that slogan. There could be no difference of opinion about it, and yet there are many who made that their shibboleth who do not now seem to believe in it. It is often so, that what serves a good purpose on the stump is disregarded in the legislature and those most vehement before the people are most backward in acting.

I may be wrong, but, as I see it, the real issue before the Senate now is whether we as representatives of the people will give them a chance to express themselves upon a great question in which they are vitally interested and upon which they alone can act. In other words, Mr. President, the real question presented to the Senate upon this joint resolution is, "Shall the people rule?"

It is conceded that Congress can not prohibit the manufacture or sale of intoxicating liquors within the States of the Union. The majority of the States and the majority of the people want the National Government to have that power. We as their representatives can not do their will, but we do have it in our power to give or refuse them the opportunity to say whether they want that power made a part of the fundamental law of the land.

I can vote to give them that right, no matter what my views upon the merits of the prohibition question may be; nor do I think that I am shirking any responsibilities in doing so. I will do my duty as I see it upon every legislative matter within my power to act. I do not believe a Senator should shirk his legislative responsibilities. He should not try to place them upon some one else or upon any other branch of the Government. I will vote according to my judgment and my convictions of duty regardless of public sentiment or of its effect upon my political future, relying upon the justice of the American people to vindicate my course.

The Constitution provides the way for its amendment. Congress can not do it, but it can propose amendments to the people, who alone can adopt them through their State legislatures. I believe it to be my duty as a Senator to vote to submit an amendment to the State legislatures when there is a strong, matured, widespread sentiment and demand from the people for such an amendment. To refuse to do so is to act as the master rather than as the representative of the people.

There is such a sentiment for the submission of this amendment. Great organizations of the best people of the Nation have been urging it for years and millions of our best and wisest citizens have petitioned us to submit it. Twenty-six of the States of this Union—Maine, Kansas, North Dakota, Georgia, Oklahoma, Mississippi, North Carolina, Tennessee, West Virginia, Virginia, Colorado, Oregon, Washington, Arizona, Arkansas, Iowa, Idaho, South Carolina, Michigan, Montana, Nebraska, South Dakota, Indiana, New Hampshire, and Utah—have enacted prohibition within their borders. More than 60 per cent, almost two-thirds, of our people now live under prohibition. Eighty per cent of the territory of the United States is under prohibition, and a large majority of the Senate of the United States is for prohibition and a large majority of the House of Representatives is for prohibition. If this does not warrant the submission of the amendment, the whim of Congress and not the will of the people will control in the submission of amendments.

"But," they say, "it is not right for some States to force upon other States a policy they do not want." Such a principle would lead to anarchy and chaos and would defeat the whole purpose of a democratic government. Our fathers acted wisely in providing for changes in the Constitution and they acted wisely in safeguarding that instrument against sudden and ill-considered changes and, under the limitations which they have imposed, we may be sure that no policy will be forced upon States that is not well considered and wise from the Nation's standpoint. The people of the entire State force upon particular communities laws which they do not approve. This is done for the general good. For instance, Seattle said she would not have prohibition. The people of the State of Washington said she would, and she did. It was well, and Seattle likes it now. Why should this principle stop at State lines? The Constitution recognizes it, and the people of the Nation for the Nation's good are demanding that the liquor traffic be prohibited by the fundamental law of the land in the way and in the manner provided by that law. They are demanding that the people of the Nation shall rule rather than the slums of our great cities. Mark my words, they are going to do it—if not in one way, then in another. If they are not given an opportunity now, they will force Congress to act in the near future.

This question has not heretofore been made a party question, but the time is ripe to make it such if Congress does not give the people an opportunity to act upon it. I am glad that it has been kept out of politics thus far. I think this has been wise. The sentiment of the country is so strong now, however, and so well matured that unless Congress submits it there is no power on earth that can keep it out of politics. It will become a party question, but not a party issue.

I am a Republican upon party principles. I believe in the intelligence and capacity of the membership of the Republican Party. I want it to succeed because I believe in its success is the greatest good to the Nation. It will succeed if it keeps abreast of the matured, progressive thought and sentiment of the country and makes the welfare and happiness of the people its highest aim and purpose. I do not claim to be a leader in the party, but I think I know the sentiment of the great mass of the people of this country, and I believe that the best politics is to promote the people's welfare. I want to say to the leaders of both political parties with all earnestness, you would better submit this question now. If you do not, you will meet it in the next national conventions.

The Republican Party will have to declare for prohibition. Why? Because it will be necessary to party success. Northern States now having prohibition laws cast 121 electoral votes. Of these, 100—if not more—are from States normally and reliably Republican. Republican success without them is extremely doubtful. The party will not dare to declare against prohibition in the face of these votes. There is something else the party will have to consider. Another western idea is sweeping the country. It will become a power in politics. Why these great progressive ideas come out from the West I do not know, but I think it is because many of the best sons and daughters of the East have gone to that great open country. Their vision has expanded, their ideas have enlarged, their sympathies are broadened, and they are giving these new aspirations expression in seeking to uplift humanity. They are trying to make Government a vital, living, helpful thing, and so it is that from the great throbbing West come these great movements. In Northern States casting 163 votes women vote for such electors, and of these 142 are normally and reliably Republican. The party can not long hope to retain the women's votes if it refuses to stand for prohibition, and if it does not retain these votes it can not hope to succeed.

I said that this question would become a party question but not a party issue. Why? Because, when the Republican Party declares for prohibition the Democratic Party will do likewise. Senators and Representatives will then have to act under the party lash. This amendment should be submitted now. The people demand it, public sentiment justifies it, expediency requires it, and above all it is our duty to do it.

Our mothers, wives, sisters, and sweethearts want this amendment submitted. They are for prohibition. They have the power to enforce their will, and they will do it. Business, industry, and genuine American labor will have prohibition. Humanity, decency, good government, and civilization demand prohibition. A world in arms needs prohibition to save democracy and human liberty. The forward-looking, high-minded, aspiring young men and women upon whom will rest the safety of the Nation want prohibition. All that is best in man and woman and government long for prohibition. The liquor interests should take warning. They should prepare to transform their plants and interests into some other line of work and endeavor. The conflict is on; the saloon must go; victory is inevitable; decency, sobriety, law, and justice must triumph. Abraham Lincoln said in 1842, referring to the War of the Revolution:

> Turn now to the temperance revolution. In it we shall find a stronger bondage broken, a viler slavery manumitted, a greater tyrant deposed. In it more of want supplied, more disease healed, more sorrow assuaged. By it no orphans starving, no widows weeping. By it none wounded in feeling, none injured in interest. Even the dram worker and the dram seller will have glided into other occupations so gradually as never to have felt the shock of change, and will stand ready to join all others in the universal song of gladness.

These were almost prophetic words. What Lincoln saw as in a vision we hope to see in reality.

Mr. President, the great reliance of the opposition to prohibition now seems to be the laboring man. He is made the shield from behind which the liquor traffic wages its fight. Long petitions alleged to be signed by laboring men and alleged to represent the views of members of labor organizations are presented to the Senate protesting against prohibition. A few days ago a two-page advertisement appeared in the Washington Times, alleged to represent over 2,000,000 workingmen, protesting to the President and Congress against the proposed prohibition of beer. This advertisement was published without any signature to vouch for its truth, and, while purporting to speak for the workingmen, it certainly was not paid for by the workingmen. Who paid for its printing? Who had it inserted in the paper as an advertisement? Not labor but the liquor interests. It is interesting also to note that the number of labor unions alleged to be represented on this petition is only 445, out of a total of 22,000 in the United States, and yet it is claimed to represent almost as large, if not a larger, membership than can be found on the official roster of the American Federation of Labor. Forty of the labor unions listed are bartenders' unions, and no doubt many of the other unions acted solely out of sympathy with their fellow workingmen.

Mr. Charles Stelzle, a labor expert, shows in another advertisement, appearing in the Washington Star on Friday, June 15, that in this petition the members of many labor organizations are counted two, three, and four times. First, in their local union; second, in the central labor union; third, in the State union; fourth, in some national or international organization; and, fifth, in some cases in such organizations as "personal liberty leagues" and "mutual benefit societies."

Mr. Stelzel has shown that only 15,000 persons in the whole country are engaged in occupations peculiar to the liquor industry, such as brewers, malsters, distillers, and rectifiers, the remaining three-fourths of the whole are carpenters, electricians, machinists, teamsters, and others for whose labor there would be immediate demand to take the place of those who are going into the Army and to make up for the shortage in immigration. The total number employed in the manufacture of liquor, even in the related trades last named, is 62,920. No doubt many workingmen have been alarmed by the industrious agents of the liquor traffic as to losing their jobs, and very likely many have been willing to sign petitions out of sympathy for labor unions connected with the liquor business because of the brotherhood very naturally felt among labor unions, but we may sympathize with this solicitude without accepting its wisdom or the validity of the grounds upon which it is based.

A most significant fact about this labor petition is that all of the alleged petitioners except two come from 21 States without prohibition. The omission of protests from prohibition States is the most eloquent part of the whole document, for it suggests at once to those who come from States where the workingmen have seen the effect of prohibition and have no disposition to petition against prohibition even as an act of sympathy with their fellow workmen, that they know they will be doing them a great kindness to give them the prohibition that has worked so well for labor as well as capital in the prohibition States.

Of all men who should be against the liquor traffic the laboring man, individually and collectively, should be its strongest foe. It takes his wages and gives nothing in return except a weakened body and an inflamed mind. His wife and children suffer and his home is filled with poverty, distress, disease, and death. His employer distrusts him, he loses his work, his liberty, and his all. Many of the best and strongest labor leaders recognize this and have taken a firm stand against the liquor traffic, and I hope to see the day when the man at the head of the greatest labor organization in the world to-day, who has done so much for labor, who has so well deserved its trust and confidence, who has lead it along right lines in many ways, and who can do more than he has ever done before to bring to himself the love and admiration of millions of men, women, and children, may lend the might of his influence upon the side of this great movement which means so much to those who he has so ably represented. When Samuel Gompers takes a stand individually and as the head of the American Federation of Labor for prohibition, then indeed will he rise to the full stature of his great ability and great leadership.

Mr. Thomas L. Lewis, president of the United Mine Workers, speaking for that great organization of men who toil in the bowels of the earth in order that our people may have warmth and our industries motive power, says:

If you want to know where the miners of America stand upon the temperance question, I will tell you. In our constitution we have a clause which forbids any member to sell intoxicants even at picnics. Some people say that the saloon is a necessary evil. I do not believe in that kind of doctrine, because the liquor traffic tends to enslave the people, to make them satisfied with improper conditions, and keeps them ignorant. The leaders of the trades-unions are called on to fight the saloon.

One of the esteemed labor leaders is Mr. John Mitchell. He was formerly president of the United Mine Workers of America and represented them ably in the arbitration which was ordered by President Roosevelt, and was subsequently made vice president of the American Federation of Labor. He says, and experience in prohibition States verify his statement:

If a brewery is closed down, in its place springs up a factory. If a saloon is closed, in its place comes a store. It is simply a process well known to union men, the same process as follows the introduction of machinery. It is a readjustment, a changed condition of society. Almost every disturbance in the ranks of organized labor can be traced back to some connection with the saloon.

In a letter dated January 19, 1917, he says:

I believe that liquor has contributed more to the moral, intellectual, and material deterioration of the people and has brought more misery to defenseless women and children than any other agency in the history of mankind.

Mr. John B. Lennon, treasurer of the American Federation of Labor says:

The saloon stands for ignorance and degradation.

In the same strain Mr. H. F. Travelock, president of the National Eight-Hour League, says:

The use of liquor and its influences have done more to darken labor's homes, dwarf its energies, and chain it hand and foot to the wheels of corporate aggression than all other influences combined.

The Right Honorable John Burns, one of the most eminent of living labor leaders, confirms this statement as also true of British workingmen when he says that:

My experience of the workshop, the street, the asylum, the jail have given me exceptional opportunities of seeing the ravages of alcohol. My participation in many of the greatest labor movements of the present generation has enabled me to witness how drinking dissipates the social force, industrial energy, and social strength of the people.

These quotations, which might be very much extended, may be properly concluded with the words of Chief B. M. Arthur, of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers:

If I could I would inaugurate a strike that would drive the liquor traffic from the face of the earth.

After prohibition had been in effect in the State of Washington for more than a year I wrote to the labor leaders in the larger cities of the State for a frank expression of their views of prohibition from the labor standpoint. I never received a single adverse reply. Many of the letters were not written until after my letter had been submitted and considered by the local organization, so that the expression of opinion given by the writers of these letters represented not alone the opinion of the writer but the opinion of the organization itself. It will be noted that the opinion expressed by the great labor leaders, some I have quoted, are more or less confirmed by statements contained in these various letters. The suggestion that sobriety and temperance increases the power and enlarges the ability of labor and its organizations to cope with the wealth, power, and organization of industry should have the careful attention of every laborer.

Mr. President, I have here a letter from E. P. Marsh, president of the Washington State Federation of Labor, dated Everett, Wash., April 27, 1917, and addressed to me, in which he says:

WASHINGTON STATE FEDERATION OF LABOR,
Everett, Wash., April 27, 1917.

Hon. WESLEY L. JONES,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have yours of recent date, asking what in my opinion has been the effect of our State-wide prohibition law.

I am glad to answer. I opposed the passage of that law for several reasons, which led me to believe it would be an economic disaster and entail a hardship upon many thousands of workmen belonging to trades and industries directly and indirectly connected with the liquor traffic, workmen belonging to organizations affiliated with the organized-labor movement.

And that, Mr. President, is the basis for much of the opposition to the submission of this proposed constitutional amendment. It is made by organizations out of sympathy for those who are directly employed in the industry. That was one reason why this gentleman opposed prohibition in the State of Washington. He continues:

Undoubtedly the law did work some great hardships, particularly upon men with families past the prime of life, who had no other trade to follow. The greater good to the Commonwealth following so quickly upon the passage of this law greatly outweighed the individual hardships, in my opinion. We have experienced none of the dire disasters so freely prophesied and which some of us feared. From a labor standpoint—an organized-labor standpoint—let me say that the change has been noticeable in that we have had a different class of men to deal with right away—sober, a little money in their pockets, amenable to discipline and sound reasoning. It may be significant—I think it is—that the past 12 months has seen the task of organizing the work people of this State become vastly easier than in the old saloon days. You can talk sense to sober men, men with a dollar in their pockets to pay their initiation fee.

No; I would never go back to the wet régime; I believe and trust that it is gone forever in the State of Washington.

With kind regards, I remain,

Sincerely, yours, E. P. MARSH, President.

Mr. President, I have here copy of a letter from James A. Duncan, secretary of the Central Labor Council of Seattle, representing 25,000 or more laboring people, together with an interview which he gave to the papers; also a letter from Mr. H. L. Jones, acting secretary of the North Yakima Trades and Labor Council; also a letter from Robert L. Proctor, president of the central labor council, belonging to the United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America. I ask that they be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks, without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCNARY in the chair). Without objection, permission is granted.

The letters and interview referred to are as follows:

CENTRAL LABOR COUNCIL OF SEATTLE AND VICINITY,
AFFILIATED WITH AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR,
Seattle, Wash., April 30, 1917.

Hon. WESLEY L. JONES,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your letter of April 21 requesting information regarding the effects of prohibition, I am very pleased to inform you that I was a strong advocate of the abolition of the liquor traffic in the interests of the workers particularly, before the measure took effect in this State, and when the fight for a dry State was on was the target of many bitter attacks because of my position.

At that time I predicted that a dry State would redound to the best interests of labor and fought against our Central Labor Council going on record against initiative measure No. 3. It was a bitter fight, and I hesitated a long time before consenting to run for the secretaryship for fear of opening up the old wet-and-dry question but was extremely gratified upon making the race to be elected while the wets were still in force.

My predictions have been more than justified by the results. As is indicated by the clipping which I am inclosing, labor has prospered as never before and is forging ahead by leaps and bounds until we have reached the point where there is a very noticeable silence upon the part of those who fought to retain the name of Washington in the list of wet States.

In order that you may feel assured that I am not injecting too much of my personal viewpoint, I might say that as long ago as last October I was sent to a law enforcement meeting at the Arena to officially represent organized labor upon this question and expressed the sentiment then and there that I am expressing to you at this time.

Of course, it was hard for some people to see the consistency of some of us in refusing to stand by the brewery workers in their struggle for existence, but there have been a great many converts won since the State went dry, and who now see things from a much broader viewpoint; in fact it is a rare thing now to find an advocate of a return to the old condition of affairs.

Trusting that this information will be helpful to you in forming conclusions and assuring you of my hearty cooperation, I am,

Yours, very respectfully,

JAMES A. DUNCAN, Secretary.

[From Seattle Star, Sept. 9, 1916.]

LABORERS ARE CLAD AS WELL AS BANKERS SINCE LIQUOR IS NO MORE WELCOME IN SEATTLE.

(By James A. Duncan, secretary Central Labor Council.)

A year ago our enemies hoped and some of our friends professed to believe that when the State went dry the labor movement would go to the dogs.

These hopes and fears have all proved groundless.

True, this law had the effect of putting not to exceed 450 Seattle trade unionists who had been directly or indirectly connected with the liquor business out of employment, but, on the other hand, the membership of the garment workers' union has increased in the past year over 40 per cent, which equals more than one-fifth the number thrown out of employment, while the number of waiters losing their positions is to some extent offset by the additional number of waitresses put to work in places that have ceased to dispense liquor.

In addition to this, at least 3,000 more members have joined other unions not directly affected by the operation of the dry law, except, perhaps, in so far as some may now find themselves in a better position to pay dues. Some of the organizations report great improvement in this regard.

It is indeed encouraging to see men of such crafts as the longshoremen, who were content but a short time ago to walk around during their leisure in overalls, now dressed in such manner as would do credit to bankers.

It has been said by some officers of the longshoremen's organization that the splendid solid front and unwavering determination which insures victory in the present strike could never have been maintained if the saloons had been open, and much more serious violence and disturbances would surely have occurred.

A city of sober, organized workers means a city of workers earning fair wages within reasonable hours, with sufficient funds and leisure to take recreation, visit the stores to make purchases, and with the mean. to live under wholesome, sanitary conditions.

The prosperity of the present is being most largely enjoyed by the skilled workers, not because of indifference on the part of the skilled worker to the interests of the unskilled worker but because the skilled workers are the most generally organized, while it is a much more difficult matter to organize unskilled workers.

However, great strides are being made in the organization of the unskilled workers, and while it is not wise to advertise the details in connection with new organization work, it is safe to say that several organizations of unskilled workers have recently been organized, with excellent prospects for the future

Prosperity for the workers, like prosperity for the business man, consists in grasping and improving every opportunity that comes along, whether it be in the industrial field or the political, and the sooner the workers recognize this fact the greater and the more rapid will be their progress.

NORTH YAKIMA TRADES AND LABOR COUNCIL,
North Yakima, Wash., May 3, 1917.

Hon. W. L. JONES,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Your communication of April 21, relating to the prohibition law in this State as affecting the workingman, was read at the meeting of the trades council last evening, and I am instructed to inform you that the laboring men of North Yakima and vicinity are more than satisfied with same, believing no one is more benefited through its application than the wage earner, and we will heartily indorse any action you might take furthering the prohibition movement.

Respectfully,

NORTH YAKIMA TRADES AND LABOR COUNCIL,
H. L. JONES, Acting Secretary.

LOCAL UNION NO. 131,
UNITED BROTHERHOOD OF CARPENTERS AND JOINERS OF AMERICA,
Seattle, Wash., April 27, 1917.

Senator WESLEY L. JONES,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: Regardless of what my personal opinion might have been on the question of prohibition prior to its enactment into law in this State, I have this to say of its operation and consequent effect on the standards of the workingman.

This point can be aptly illustrated by the following: I am an officer of the carpenters' union, and consequently more intimately in touch with the financial condition and the home life of the members, and can say that the operation of the prohibition law is a decided advantage to the workingman.

Being a salaried officer, I am naturally the first to be appealed to when a member is in financial difficulties, and will say that since the dry law has been effective my loan business has fallen off fully 75 per cent, and those loans which have been made have been, for the most part, promptly liquidated

I also notice that the members are keeping up their union dues and our loss of membership from the nonpayment of dues has been very little.

The families of the membership have been, until recently, when the prices are prohibitive, able to maintain better living conditions, and consequently make better citizens.

On the whole I believe the prohibition law is a decided advantage to the workingman, and I am looking forward with sincerest interest to the time when liquor will be an unknown quantity in this country.

Sincerely,

ROBT. L. PROCTOR,
President Central Labor Council.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, this testimony could be duplicated from other States where prohibition has been adopted.

It is a significant fact, and one which the American workingman should carefully ponder, that the Socialist Party in Porto Rico put a prohibition plank in its platform and aggressively led a campaign at the recent election in Porto Rico, with the result that the industrial centers and large towns have a dry majority, and Porto Rico set an example to the people of this country by giving 30,000 or 40,000 majority for prohibition.

The socialists of Europe are moving toward prohibition on the ground that even a few glasses of beer being used daily drowns the aspirations of workingmen to better their own conditions and that of their fellows.

Mr. President, for the consideration of the laboring men, and in connection with the claims of the brewery people that their industry is in the interest of the laboring man, and asking his support in order that this industry may be continued, I desire to read two extracts from the 1915 Year Book of the United States Brewers' Association. There are quite a number of articles in this book, and some very interesting things in it. I think we have a right to conclude that what they say that may be against their interest is the truth. At page 287 I find this language:

> And just as a system of credit tends to make people extravagant, to outrun their income, squander their capital and become bankrupt, so resort to alcohol tends to make a man expend more than the rightful amount of physical or mental energy, to draw upon his reserve, and become finally bankrupt in body, mind, and estate. It is the fatal facility which alcohol gives to a man for drawing upon his reserve, making him feel stronger, wiser, and happier for the time, that constitutes its chief danger.

That is, as I have stated, found in the Brewers' Yearbook for 1915. At page 291 I find this:

> It would be of very great advantage if it were possible to prevent the sale of intoxicating liquor entirely to youths under 21, and thus prevent them from making drafts on their physiological capital, just as the law already recognizes that minors should be prevented from making undue drafts on their monetary reserves by obtaining loans from money lenders.

I hope that the laboring men, when the campaign comes on, will consider these statements and the source from which they come.

Labor and labor organizations should consider well the character and effects of the liquor traffic before they protest against prohibition. I do not blame them for looking at the matter from their own standpoint. They ought to do so, and I want them to do so. When they see that it is using them solely for its own advantage and to their detriment I have so much confidence in their intelligence and good character to believe they will not lend it their aid further.

There are some wage earners directly employed in the liquor industry. These, of course, will be directly affected. The records show, however, that from five to six times as many men are employed with the same amount of capital in other industries as are employed to an equal amount of capital in the liquor industry. Such and new industries would soon absorb these workers if the liquor industry were stopped. This has been the actual experience in prohibition States. The wages paid in other industries are as a rule higher than in the liquor industry. While it is commendable for labor and labor organizations to strive to protect the interests of their fellow workmen in the liquor industry, they should not sacrifice the welfare of the many for the good of the few, and especially when those few can be and will be well cared for in other lines of industry. This is especially true now when so many of our best young men are taken from every line of work. Many times the number of those employed in the liquor traffic will be needed to take these vacant places.

Mr. President, in connection with the letters from labor leaders as to conditions in our State I want to ask at this time also permission to have printed an interview in Collier's Weekly of March 24, 1917, by Hon. C. B. Blethen, the editor of the Seattle Times. I want to say that this paper was one of the strongest opponents to prohibition when the campaign in our State was on; but in this interview he takes up all of the objections that were made at that time, and shows that the evils prophesied have not only not occurred but that they have actually been refuted by what has taken place in our State. I want to print that in connection with the letters from the labor leaders. The Seattle Times is now one of the strongest advocates of prohibition in our State.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[C. B. Blethen in Collier's Weekly, Mar. 24, 1917.]

Now, I say to you, not as a man who has never tasted liquor, but as a business man whose principal occupation is to observe and then write of what he sees, that prohibition does not have to be discussed from the moral standpoint at all, though any halfwit knows there is no excuse for a saloon. It may be discussed from the standpoint of business, of commerce, of bank clearings. Let us then examine the following facts:

We insisted, for example, that Seattle would have miles of empty stores as the result of prohibition. Yet to-day the only vacant places formerly used as saloons, outside the old tenderloin, do not, as I have shown, exceed 20 in number, and each of these is in a district no longer of use in retail business. The rest of the vacancies are new stores not yet completed. Before me as I write is the bulky list of these old saloon locations, each one tabulated like this:

"J. O. Short, 915 Second Avenue. Two-story brick. Florsheim Shoe Co."

Of the 211 places vacated when the saloons were put out of business 191 have been occupied by new businesses.

We said that taxes would go up in the city of Seattle. They went down from 18.98 to 18.11 mills.

We insisted that bank clearings would go down. The total bank clearings of 1915 were $612,928,879. Those of 1916 were $790,217,950, an increase of more than $177,000,000.

Of course, I know that Seattle has been doing a lot of shipbuilding and that her ocean-borne commerce has increased a lot. What of it? We said certain things would happen. They did not. We said that bank deposits would go down. Look:

At the end of 1915, $87,815,076.

At the end of 1916, $106,000,000.

Savings-bank deposits are not available, but the banks assure me that there has been a tremendous increase in deposits and numbers of new accounts.

We all agreed Seattle would lose in population. The Government says we have gained more than 15,000, having on December 21, 348,639. Post-office figures confirm this.

The liquor dealers said, the business men concurring, that crime would increase, particularly drunkenness.

Note this tabulation of crime taken from police records of two years:

	1915	1916
Arrests for all offenses	18,325	10,653
Drunkenness, disorderly conduct, etc.	6,303	3,651
Murder	23	23
Other crimes of violence	173	149
Suicide	95	54
Burglaries, theft, etc.	422	264

The liquor men insisted destitution would increase. Yet the newspapers which for years have conducted their own charity bureaus found only about 1 case in 20 this winter as compared with last. Police records show:

	1915	1916
Professional begging	708	128
Abandoning families	15	3

One of the pet wet arguments has always been that the population of jails and houses of correction increases in dry territory. The record shows:

	1915	1916
King County (Seattle) jail	2,464	1,182
Chehalis Reform School	184	160
Walla Walla Penitentiary	735	645

Collections are much better The grocery stores and meat markets say that in addition to buying more, the average small-account man is paying quickly—two or three times more promptly than ever before. There were many vacant homes and flats in 1915, although that was a good year. You can't rent a place in which to live in Seattle now unless you search long and have great luck. We said general business would decline. While this is well covered in the statement of clearings, let me say right here that there is not a merchant in Seattle who was in business in 1915 who has not done a much better business in 1916.

CAN YOU BEAT IT?

Prohibition, even in the limited form adopted by the State of Washington, is an unqualified business success. The loss to certain property owners caused by the reduction of rentals and real estate values, which were based on the continued existence of the saloon, has injured neither the city of Seattle nor the State of Washington. In fact, there is another side to the shield.

Crime has been reduced almost one-half. The money formerly passing over bars is almost entirely spent for better living, benefiting every person it reaches, beginning with man, wife, and children, and running through all lines of trade, and particularly through the middle-size and smaller shops, and all of it staying at home, and much of it going into savings deposits. With the raising of the living standard comes a series of other benefits. Efficiency in all lines of business has been greatly increased. This begins in the lumber and construction camps, where from 30 to 50 per cent more work is accomplished with the same crews. It appears on the docks, where a full day's labor is had every Monday instead of practically none, and a full day's labor is had Tuesday instead of the former half. It is visible in the records of industrial accidents, now cut down to less than half the average of wet years. It shows up in every business house in the large cities in the efficiency and contentment of clerks and workmen.

The sum total of human happiness has been increased immeasurably. When women and children have more and better food and clothes and thousands of men, formerly sent to jail as the result of booze every year no longer get into the scrapes and crimes that cause mental and physical anguish to themselves and all depending upon them, no one can dispute the fact that this is becoming a better world for many.

Out here in the State of Washington we are pretty dry now, but we are going to be drier. And the drier we get the better business will be—that has been proved in this first great year! More and better clothes and more and better food for the wife and kiddies! More and better business for everybody! Fewer and fewer people in the jails or behind on their bills! Can you beat it?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Let labor study over and answer these questions:

What good can come to labor from a traffic that produces only evil?

What good can come to labor from a traffic that takes his money, and with it his time, his mind, his body, his position, and his all?

What good can come to labor from a traffic that discredits him and his organization and brings crime and riot to his door?

What good can come from a traffic that plants in his children the seeds of crime and disease?

What good can come to labor from a traffic that brings to his wife and his home only sorrow, poverty, disease, and death?

What recompense is offered to labor for all these things?

Liberty! Liberty to drink away his wages. Liberty to drink away his health. Liberty to drink away his happiness. Liberty to drink himself to death; and they impudently ask why should the State or the Nation interfere?

But this is not all. Having gotten some labor organizations to go on record against prohibition, the liquor interests now slander labor by suggesting that it is unpatriotic, that if the laborer is denied his drink even in war times, he will rebel. They, in effect, say that the laboring man measures his patriotism by a glass of beer. Who says this? Not labor, but the liquor interests. Who threaten us with rebellion? Not the laborer, but the liquor interests. In a statement given out by the brewers a short time ago under the heading of "Nine reasons for liquor," they say:

It (prohibition) would produce anger, resentment, and disaffection among millions of American workers.

In whose interest was this uttered? Not labor, but in the interests of the brewers. It is a base libel upon American workers. They are as loyal and patriotic a class as we have. They will make the greatest sacrifices for their country, and surely they will resent this base slander. Was this spoken for their good? What can they hope from a traffic that will use them so?

Labor protests against its unjust burdens. It complains of the smallness of its share of the proceeds of its toil. I think there is much justice in these complaints, but does it realize how it is being used to its own detriment by the liquor traffic?

The liquor man, whether he runs a saloon or owns a distillery or a brewery, is not a philanthropist. He is in the business to make money, and generally he does not care how he does it. He is frequently a teetotaler himself. He generally lives in a good house, if not a fine mansion. The influences that surround him and his business do not tend to sympathy or philanthropy. They are evil, degrading, and base. The brothels and the gambling dens go hand in hand with his place of business. Thugs, thieves, murderers, corruptionists, and traitors all congregate in and about his place of business along with those who may be regarded as respectable. What can labor hope from a traffic of this kind? Does it know what the traffic is seeking to do next?

Do they realize that it is seeking to place upon them a tremendous tax burden for the years to come? The liquor traffic would have us believe that labor is its main support. It pays to the Government two or three hundred millions in taxes. From whom does this come? Not from the pockets of the saloon man, the brewer, or distiller, but largely from the pockets of the laborer. What does the liquor interests propose to do now? It magnanimously welcomes an increase in its taxes. It says it will cheerfully pay four or five hundred millions in taxes to the Government. Where will it get this amount? From the laborer. Of course it is glad to pay if some one will put up. How does labor like this cheerful imposition of two or three hundred millions additional in taxes upon his earnings?

No one points out to labor any benefits that come to him from the use of liquor. The most that has been claimed is that a glass of beer does no harm. The brewers have even abandoned this in the face of the almost universal testimony of experts, scientists, and physicians that alcohol in any form is a noxious poison and that beer is a most harmful drink. It has been left to the honorable and learned Senator from Massachusetts to refute in a most positive manner the testimony of these men who were supposed to know. The matured opinions of experience and investigation will have to give way before the profound knowledge of this great Senator.

A few days ago, when we were considering legislation to conserve the food supply of the country, the senior Senator from Massachusetts in his anxiety that the production of beer might not be stopped said:

It is an innocent drink.

He does not tell us of the long nights of study and investigation to reach a conclusion so contrary to the mature thoughts of the day. He does not tell us whether this dogmatic assertion has been evolved from the subtle alchemy of his inner consciousness or from historical research. A jubilant thrill must have gone through the liquor lobby when that statement was made. What matter to them the opinion of experts and physicians that beer is a harmful drink! They now have high and honorable, though inexperienced, authority to the contrary. In the campaign after this amendment is submitted the brewers will adorn every billboard throughout the country with a beautiful picture of the learned Senator from Massachusetts. In their next annual Yearbook they will doubtless place upon the front page a splendid engraving of his classic features over the legend, "The Hon. HENRY CABOT LODGE, author, historian, diplomat, and United States Senator, who declares beer is an innocent drink." The brewers did not overlook this sentence. It had hardly been uttered when telegrams were pouring into Senators like this:

"Beer is a harmless drink. Do not take it from the laboring man." What is the truth about it? Dr. Eugene L. Fisk, medical director of the Life Extension Institute of New York, said a short time ago that the moderate drinker, who takes two or three drinks a day is on dangerous ground, and that "he is putting a narcotic poison into his system, and ultimately it will break him. It will shorten his life, impair his mind, shatter his nerves, and wreck his stomach. These conclusions are not based on theory. They are scientific facts." He then referred to figures based on statistics furnished by 43 life insurance companies and said:

Individuals who took two glasses of beer or a glass of whisky or their alcoholic equivalent each day showed that the mortality in this class was 18 per cent in excess of the average.

And the Senator from Massachusetts says it is an innocent drink. One of the Senator's colleagues, who is not only a distinguished Senator but also a learned physician, the Senator from New Hampshire, said in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 8, 1901:

Beer is an intoxicating drink, as every physician in the entire world knows, a drink that does harm to every man who habitually uses it.

The Senator from New Hampshire on that occasion, at page 676 of volume 34, part 1, of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, for the second session of the Fifty-sixth Congress, placed the opinions of a multitude of able physicians of Toledo, Ohio, in the RECORD under the heading:

Beer and the body—terrible testimony of the physicians against this monstrous evil of the day.

I would suggest that the learned Senator from Massachusetts read these statements from these physicians, and then give us the authority for his astounding assertions.

Mr. President, I heard the health officer of the city of New York a short time ago declare without qualification that alcohol in any form and any amount was a poison and injurious to those who might take it.

In the speech by the Senator from New Hampshire, to which I have already referred, he said:

Mr. President, every physician in the land knows that beer is intoxicating, and the medical profession is quite united in the opinion that the continued use of it is more detrimental to health than almost any other form of intoxicating drink.

But the Senator from Massachusetts says "it is an innocent drink."

Most significant is the attitude which business of various kinds is taking regarding intemperance. It is beginning to realize the effects of liquor upon those who labor and of the results that are likely to follow its use. It is putting the bars up against the use of liquor by its employees, and this action is giving a great impetus to the temperance movement. It is looking at intemperance from the business standpoint, just as labor should do. In the Literary Digest for March 4, 1916, is an article under the heading "No 'booze' for big business." I ask permission to insert that without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

A workman for the Illinois Steel Co. in Chicago recently secured a better job in Pittsburgh, and before he left his fellow workmen gave him a banquet at a hotel, with 25 foremen and clerical workers as guests. There was a cocktail at every plate. When the men left the table not a cocktail had been touched. This story is told by a writer in the Sunday-School Times to show how the antiliquor campaign in industry is working out. An investigation, says Mr. C. W. Baines in the Philadelphia Weekly, was recently made among the great steel and iron concerns of Ohio, West Virginia, Pennsylvania, Indiana, and Illinois to ascertain their attitude toward alcohol, and 140 corporations, some operating more than one plant, and with an aggregate capital of over a billion dollars, were included. The report, says Mr. Baines, is not meant for a Sunday-school document. It is, rather, "a cold-blooded business and economical deliverance intended to determine industry's hostility toward alcoholic drink and drinkers, which has been very indefinitely discussed in the public press; to throw an illuminating ray of light on its attitude toward the movement for abstinence and prohibition in commercial life." It does not concern itself with the moral aspects of the drink question, but, it is insisted, "we must not have our Sunday-school boys ignorant of the attitude of our business princes toward the imbibers of bad booze." Of the 140 corporations, 113 replied to the inquiry. Mr. Baines thus classifies the returns:

"1. Of the 113 answers, only 6 permit the use of alcoholic drink in their shops or plants.

"2. One hundred and seven firms, the world's greatest steel and iron producers, absolutely prohibit the use of strong drink in their works. Almost without exception they testify that the abstainer is more efficient, more reliable, and that teetotalers alone are considered when promotions are made.

"3. One hundred companies prohibiting drinking during working hours report that they are also doing 'everything possible to prevent drinking by employees out of working hours.' One corporation discharges any man who enters a saloon going to or from work; another suspends such an employee one week for the first offense, and for the second he is usually discharged.

"4. Eighty-three of the 113 concerns when employing or promoting men discriminate against those who use alcoholic liquors, even though they use liquor outside of working hours only, absolutely refuse to promote men who drink; there the 'most moderate use of rum is fatal to a man's chance of promotion.'

"5. Sixty-three corporations have undertaken constructive abstinence work to determine the deleterious influences of the moderate use of alcohol upon a workman's efficiency, producing power, and reliability.

"6. Ten concerns not only prohibit drinking during work hours but absolutely prohibit employees drinking at all times."

Of some 60 statements in these replies the following are said to be typical:

"When it becomes necessary to reduce the force, regular drinkers are the first ones let go." (Lockhart Iron & Steel Co., Pennsylvania.)

"We do not allow any liquor on the premises, discharge immediately any man under the influence, preach abstinence through foremen and bulletin-board literature, and we are succeeding famously. Most important is the fact that our men also see the good of it." (Interstate Steel & Iron Co., East Chicago.)

"The efficiency of a man is reduced in exact proportion to the amount of alcohol he drinks. The total abstainer ranks above the moderate drinker in reliability and efficiency in all classes of work nearly as much as the moderate drinker does above the heavy, regular drinker." (The Follansbee Furnace Co., Follansbee, W. Va.)

"The moderate use of liquor tends to impair efficiency and reliability, and we do not knowingly employ men who drink, nor advance them to positions of authority if they are employed." (The Crane Co., Chicago.)

In this industrial antialcohol campaign we read further, electric signs and posters play no small part—

"Over the main entrance to several steel plants can be seen such large electric temperance-teaching transparencies as:

"'Did booze ever do you any good?—Did booze ever get you a better job?—Did booze ever contribute anything to the happiness of your family?'

"Throughout another plant this bulletin, signed by the general superintendent and approved by the president, is posted in conspicuous places:

"'For the promotion of safety and welfare, it is hoped that all employees will avoid the use of intoxicating liquors.

"'Under the rules of the Joliet Works any employee who uses intoxicating liquors while on duty will be discharged.

"'In making promotions in all departments, of the plant superintendents of departments and foremen will select for promotion only those who do not use intoxicating liquor.'"

This movement, according to Mr. Baines, has attracted the attention of the liquor trade papers, one of which has called "the steady and increasing tendency of big corporations to encroach upon the personal liberties of the workers" one of "the most pregnant signs of the times." And the Brewers' Journal is quoted as saying:

"There are even companies and individual employers who threaten to discharge employees for drinking alcohol at any time. They do not care if that is social and economic slavery. Their main object is to protect their pocketbooks."

Mr. JONES of Washington. Also, in connection with that article and touching upon the same matter, I have here an article prepared by Alexander Fleisher, supervisor of the Welfare Division of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Co., of New York, read at the National Conference of Charities and Corrections in Indianapolis, which I ask permission to put in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the matter will be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

ATTITUDE OF LARGE EMPLOYERS TO USE OF ALCOHOL BY THEIR EMPLOYEES.

[By Alexander Fleisher, Ph. D., supervisor of welfare division, Metropolitan Life Insurance Co., New York, read at National Conference of Charities and Correction, Indianapolis.]

Has industry taken a stand in regard to the use of alcohol by its employees? If so, what is it? If it is opposed to its use, why has it taken this attitude? The interest of the national conference in the welfare of the workers of the country has broadened. There is developing an increasing interest in preventive and constructive work as opposed to remedial. The working life is receiving more and more consideration at these meetings. These facts make proper a discussion of one phase of the problem of employment and tenure of position: What are the drinker's chances of getting a job, of holding it, of securing promotion, in comparison with those of the man who does not drink?

In order to secure answers to these questions, we made an analysis of other studies of this subject, we sent a letter and questionnaire to 100 of the largest employers of labor in the United States; we studied the benefit funds of some 20 corporations; and we reviewed all publications that might throw light upon the subject.

OTHER STUDIES.

Only two studies have previously been made in this identical field. The first to be considered is the twelfth annual report of the Commissioner of Labor (1897–98) on the "Economic Aspects of the Liquor Problem." One chapter of this study deals with the experience and practice of employers relative to the use of intoxicants. It was based upon the answers to a schedule sent to 30,000 employers. About 25 per cent replied. These 7,025 establishments employed 1,750,000 persons. Of 6,976 employers answering the inquiry, 5,363 reported that, in employing new men, they took into consideration the use of intoxicating liquor. The largest percentage of employers considering this question was among the transportation companies. There were four methods used in ascertaining the employee's drinking habits—personal knowledge, appearance, the questioning of the applicant, and outside inquiry. In some establishments the rule existed that no one using intoxicating liquors was employed. In other cases this applied only to certain limited occupations. One thousand seven hundred and ninety-four plants reported on this point; the reason given by two-thirds of them can be grouped under two headings, because of responsibility of position, and in guarding against accidents.

Of these 7,025 firms, 3,527 had some regulation as to the use of alcoholics by employees; 855 demanded that no employee use intoxicants while on duty; 696 that no employee use intoxicants either on or off duty; 692 that in certain occupations no employee use intoxicants while on duty; and 1,284, in certain occupations, placed a complete restriction on the use of alcoholics either on or off duty. It is interesting to note that at this time 138 of the 708 transportation organizations reporting had no requirements in regard to the use of intoxicating liquors.

The second study, though smaller, is more recent. It was made during the past year by the research department of the Temperance Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church. This study covers the iron and steel companies of Pennsylvania, Ohio, Illinois, and West Virginia. Information was secured from 140 companies, many of which have more than one plant. Of the 120 concerns replying to the question as to whether it was a custom among their workmen to send boys out for beer during working hours, only 6 stated that at the time this was still permitted. Ten concerns not only prohibited drinking during working hours, but prohibited it absolutely at any time. Eighty-three of the 120 concerns replying discriminated in employing and advancing men against those who use alcoholic liquor.

One of these studies was made two decades ago; the other was limited to one industry. In making our own study we sought to cover as wide a field as possible. Obviously the material that we have to present is impressionistic. With the time and equipment at our disposal, it was impossible to make a study in which the results could be presented statistically. We received 50 responses to our 100 letters; these embrace a considerable variety of occupations and cover three-quarters of a million employees. Although the number of employers is 50 to 7,025, the employees considered are 43 per cent of the number of the Government study.

Practically all the returns received were from the presidents or other high executive officers of the organizations with which we communicated. The returns were carefully worked out and were in almost all cases accompanied by a letter expressing interest in our attempt, in the problem as a whole, and in the attitude and approach of other employers.

RAILROADS AND USE OF ALCOHOL.

We received answers from 10 railroads, having over 400,000 employees. All of these have rules in regard to the use of alcohol by employees, of which the following quotation is typical:

"The use of intoxicants by employees subject to call is prohibited. Their use by any employees or the frequenting of places where they are sold is sufficient cause for dismissal."

The wording of this prohibition varies with the railroad company.

Two of the railroads mention only the habitual use of alcoholic drinks as being cause for dismissal. In each case these rules are printed in the general rule book of the organization. According to the statements made by the railroad officials, they are strictly enforced.

These companies make an effort to determine a man's habit before he is employed. Should any facts in regard to his use of alcohol be disclosed, he would be debarred. This information is obtained by inquiry, observation, references, and, in the case of two of the roads, by a medical examination of those seeking positions.

The efficiency of this ruling is not questioned by the railway executives. One official reports to us that—

"The policy of the company as expressed by its chief officers in their personal lives and influence is to eliminate entirely the use of intoxicants whether on or off duty. With that idea in view, the sale of intoxicants has been taken off dining cars and out of all eating houses where the company is in absolute control. This has been done so as to show the employees an actual example of the desire of the company to remove intoxicants from its premises and to let those who wish to use them obtain them off the lines of the road rather than on railroad property."

This is, however, more definite than the position taken by most railroads. One company, for example, states that—

"This rule (similar to the one just quoted) is strictly enforced, but we, of course, can not control the individual actions and habits of our employees so long as they do not interfere with efficient service to the company."

But it is fair to conclude that the railroads are opposed to the use of intoxicants by their employees, whether on or off duty, and that they will continue their present method of "careful observation and investigation and discipline; discharge in case practice is continued."

Foreign railroads are also beginning to take a definite stand against the use of alcoholic beverages by their employees. The Saxon State Railways have issued instructions that officials are to employ nondrinkers exclusively. The Dutch railways provide for a medical examination at the time of employment and urge all employees to join abstinence societies. The German Trade Association of Private Railways advocates the employment of sober men only. The Swiss railways insist on sobriety.

An interesting development among common carriers is reported in the monthly bulletin of the American Iron and Steel Institute for June, 1915. At the suggestion of the captain and engineers of the lake carriers' association a rule was adopted providing that temperance be made a consideration of promotion between men of equal merit and that no person be allowed to carry liquor aboard a vessel.

Judging from these returns, representing a large percentage of the railway mileage of the United States, there has been a marked change in attitude among these corporations since the Government study of 20 years ago. At that time there was a large number of railroad organizations that had no rule in regard to the use of alcohol and made no attempt to reduce its consumption among their employees. Now, apparently, it is difficult for a man to secure a position in the operating branches of the railroads unless he is a teetotaler, and any employee is liable to lose his position if he indulges in intoxicants or frequents places where alcoholic beverages are sold.

PUBLIC-SERVICE CORPORATIONS.

We received replies from six public-service corporations, employing about 200,000 persons. The results from this group are for the most part unsatisfactory. In few cases was the questionnaire filled out; the responses came principally in the form of a letter. One exception was a metropolitan traction company employing over 8,000 men. This corporation has a strict rule against the use of intoxicating liquor and forbids the visiting of saloons. Among the questions to be answered under oath by an applicant for position is, Do you, or have you ever, used intoxicating liquors? The information obtained is checked up by references and by inquiry of persons not referred to by the applicant. If he uses intoxicants he is not employed. From other statements in the letter from this corporation it would seem that, in the case of those already employed, only a resulting accident or an instance of an employee's being "notoriously intoxicated in public" would ordinarily be considered ground for discharge. Persistent use of alcoholics by any employee would be a matter of serious discipline.

The general conclusion that can be drawn from the replies of telephone, gas, and electric companies is that, although they have never had the problem seriously presented to them, intoxication on duty will result in discharge; that the use of alcohol is not permitted during working hours, and that if its outside use interferes with an employee's work he will be discharged. The vice president of one of the largest of these corporations wrote to us that "the general character of our employees is such that such rules (rules in regard to the use of intoxicants) seem hardly necessary."

Dr. Alvah H. Doty, medical director of the employers' benefit committee of the Bell Companies, in a publication dated June, 1914, has summarized the attitude of these corporations:

"It is generally accepted, however, that it is their abuse (the abuse of alcoholic drinks) rather than their use which is injurious, not only to the individual but in a way to the public also; therefore it is logical and fair to assume that much may be gained, so far as the betterment of this condition is concerned, if temperance as well as prohibition is preached, for drinking is very much a matter of habit and is increased largely because the danger of overindulgence is not considered."

These organizations seem to emphasize temperance rather than prohibition.

RETAIL STORES AND MAIL-ORDER HOUSES.

We received returns from three large mail-order corporations having about 25,000 employees, three department stores in three different cities having 15,000 employees, and a chain of retail stores having 3,600 employees.

The mail-order corporations in two cases have no definite rules on the subject of the use of alcohol. One, however, has the following regulation:

"Absence from work because of the use of liquors is cause for immediate dismissal. For the protection of minors and women working for us, we feel it necessary to prohibit employees from patronizing saloons within eight blocks of our store. Violation of this rule will place the offender in a position where his services are no longer desirable."

This rule is given to new employees and is strictly enforced. The use of intoxicants during nonworking hours, if it does not affect the individual's work, is not considered. In all three corporations a person who is shown to be, or admits that he is, a user of alcohol to any extent, is not employed. This is determined by questioning the applicant, by general observation, and in one case by physical examination of applicants for employment.

Two of the department stores have rules against the use of intoxicants during business hours. In the case of one store if it is known that alcohol is used by an employee outside of working hours such knowledge will not directly affect his standing in the company but will work against his advancement. The general statement on the part of these concerns is that drinkers will not be allowed to continue in their employ.

One of the regulations of the chain of retail stores questioned is that intoxicating liquor may not be carried into nor used in its place of business.

These organizations, with one exception, have considered the question of the use of alcoholic beverages by their employees only in so far as it relates to their contact with customers. The retail stores which deal directly with the customer do not tolerate its use during business hours.

SALES ORGANIZATIONS.

We communicated with two life insurance companies in order to determine the attitude of employers whose fundamental problem was in the handling of a large number of salesmen. In such companies supervision is necessarily less close than in factories or stores. One of these companies, employing almost exclusively commission men, many of whom do not devote their full time to the business, has no rules at all in regard to the use of alcohol by employees.

In the other case the employees receive salaries and commissions and are consequently under more rigid discipline. This organization has an unwritten rule that employees shall not drink during business hours. Men whose references show that they drink to some extent are not employed. This corporation holds numerous meetings of salesmen at which, according to its printed book of rules, the serving of intoxicating liquor is forbidden.

MINING COMPANIES.

We received answers from three mining companies, one of which is located in a State in which a prohibition law became effective January 1 of this year. Before the passage of the law this company had made numerous efforts to lessen the amount of alcoholic beverages used by its employees. On December 22, 1915, it issued a general statement to its employees that every effort would be made to assist in the enforcement of the prohibition law, and urged employees to observe it in letter and in spirit. A second company forbids drinking on its premises, but places no restrictions upon an employee's habits outside of working hours. A third follows a similar practice, but is seeking to lessen the use of alcohol by educating its employees, most of whom are foreign born, to an American standard of living. This, it states, would of itself reduce the desire for intoxicants and the amount of money available for them.

These three companies take precautions against allowing employees under the influence of liquor to enter their shafts, and enforce the prohibition that liquor should not be carried underground.

In employing men none of these concerns raise any question in regard to the use of alcohol. In connection with the growing practice among those companies to seek to affect the habits of their men outside of working hours, it is interesting to note that the United Mine Workers have a rule which forbids members to sell alcoholic beverages even at picnics.

STEEL COMPANIES.

Replies were received from two steel companies. We have, in addition, information in regard to the regulations of two others. One of these companies prohibits the use of alcohol by employees at any time. Three of the four companies do not forbid the use of alcohol, but have issued notices to their employees that they hope that they will refrain from the use of intoxicating liquor, that any person using intoxicating liquor while on duty will be discharged, and that the nondrinking men will at all times be given preference in promotion and in continuous employment. All four corporations have been very active in the organized safety movement. Two of these companies have urged total abstinence repeatedly through their employees' magazines. Another company provides for the medical examination as a test in addition to the inquiries usually made of applicants.

In connection with this group it is perhaps appropriate to repeat the opinion of C. L. Close, manager of the bureau of safety of the United States Steel Corporation, recently quoted in the Technical World Magazine, that in 10 years through the combined efforts of American industry, the manufacture and sale of liquors will be at an end in the United States.

MANUFACTURERS OF STEEL AND WOODEN PRODUCTS.

Seven organizations that manufacture steel and wooden products sent us replies. Three of these have a general requirement concerning the sobriety of employees. In another company, while there is no written rule, it is understood that drinking is considered a disgrace. In a large measure this requirement is enforced by the employees themselves.

In one of these concerns the matter is carefully considered in employing men. No mention of this precaution was made to us in the other replies from this group.

One company has introduced regular physical examinations and requires all employees to report to the medical dispensary after absence. If absence can be attributed to the use of intoxicants, the physician in charge seeks to show the employee the advantage of total abstinence. This plan is said to have decreased the use of alcohol among the company's employees.

In addition, mention might be made of the recent discharge of 30 employees of a large steel manufacturing plant for signing a liquor petition.

We have information about three automobile manufacturing companies. Two of these have unwritten rules forbidding the use of alcohol. They will not employ men who drink. In these instances a careful effort is made to check up references, and there is the attempt to eliminate the man who previous to employment has been accustomed to drinking. One company has begun an educational campaign on the value of total abstinence by the distribution of literature and by talks to employees.

In the third concern we find the usual practice reversed. The fact that a man drinks does not necessarily stand in the way of his appointment. Continuation of this habit, however, affects his becoming a profit sharer in the organization and his promotion. According to the procedure of this company an employee is placed on six months' probation. During that time efforts are made to educate him in the proper use of his wages. One of the things that is insisted upon is sobriety. Here the pressure comes after he is employed, rather than before.

MISCELLANEOUS.

In a miscellaneous group, hard to classify, representing 11 different industries, such as printing, oil, and tobacco etc., all the corporations responding to our inquiry stated that drinking was forbidden in their plants. Three of these have printed rules to this effect; in one case this rule is signed by the applicant. Those who reported upon restrictions on employment stated that although they would much prefer the man who does not drink at all, they rely, however, entirely upon questioning the applicant and upon the references that he gives. It is generally understood in all these plants that the employee must be "in good working condition" during working hours.

One concern with practically no regulations on this subject has nevertheless through its employment manager made a determined effort to eliminate drinking among its employees at any time. He is the first person with whom a new employee comes in contact and from whom he receives his earliest impression of the concern. This manager impresses upon the new man the importance of the elimination of drinking, not only during working hours, but at all times. This plan is said to be raising the grade of men employed.

Another corporation has adopted the following rule in regard to this subject: "All employees of the company must refrain from using intoxicating liquors, and all officers shall refuse employment to men known to frequent saloons." But this is exceptional severity.

USE OF ALCOHOL IN PLANTS.

To the questionnaire of the research department of the Temperance Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, previously cited, 6 of the 120 firms replied that employees were permitted to have alcoholic beverages brought into the plant. These are the exceptions; they have probably always been the exception in American industry. The usual practice has been to forbid the use of intoxicants in workrooms or on corporation property. In Europe, however, the custom is in general use in industrial establishments. But the recent study made by Dr. William H. Tolman, of the American Museum of Safety, indicates that many foreign employers are trying to eliminate brandy from their plants and to substitute coffee and milk for the beer and wine in common use. The efforts made since 1908 by the Allgemeine Electrische Gesellschaft among its 10,000 employees have resulted in a marked reduction in the sale of alcoholic drinks per individual and an even more marked increase in the sale of nonalcoholic beverages.

EMPLOYEES' BENEFIT ASSOCIATIONS.

In the endeavor to secure further light upon the attitude of employers we examined the regulations of a number of employees' benefit associations. In these the final control is usually vested in the employers, although the management is by employees and employers jointly. Ordinarily the corporation makes a lump-sum contribution, pays overhead expenses, or shares the premium of the insured. The rules of these organizations may be said to indicate the attitude of the employers represented. Among 20 examined, 10 have a statement in regard to intemperance or to sickness or accident induced by intoxicants, somewhat like the following:

"No member shall under any circumstances be entitled to benefit when sickness, injury, or death was, in the opinion of the board of trustees, caused or occasioned, directly or indirectly, by the use of intoxicating liquors."

Several of the clauses only refuse to pay benefits for accidents directly resulting from intoxication.

One of the largest of these funds, however, goes further and states that "if sickness of or injury to any person insured hereunder is due to violation of the law by or to malicious and unlawful acts or culpable or intentional negligence or intemperance or immorality of such persons," benefits will not be paid. The by-laws of another fund make the following provision: "Superintendents shall have authority to cancel membership upon receiving reliable information of habitual or frequent drunkenness."

ADVERTISING.

Although it does not lead to any positive conclusion, it is nevertheless interesting to learn that the two leading general business men's magazines in the country do not carry liquor advertisements. Whether this boycott exists in the various trade journals we had no opportunity to ascertain.

REASONS FOR OPPOSITION TO USE OF ALCOHOLIC BEVERAGES.

In our investigation we were interested not only in rules but the reasons for their existence. Our questionnaire sought to obtain statistics of the relation of alcohol to efficiency, accidents, and sickness. We received no replies to these questions. Evidently the answers must come from the laboratory rather than from the shop or the factory.

A number of organizations did make the statement, however, that rules against the use of intoxicants had resulted in a noticeable reduction in the number of accidents. But none of these furnished us with figures to substantiate such statements. The basis for establishing a connection between alcohol and accidents is usually the statistics reported by the German sickness societies. These show that the accident rate is highest on Monday; that it decreases toward the middle of the week, with a marked increase on Friday and Saturday. It is usually claimed that the greater frequency of accidents at the end of the week is due to increased fatigue, but that the Monday accidents can only be explained by the heavy drinking of the working classes on Sunday. Other explanations of these facts, however, are possible. There are few American figures. The Lucens Iron Co. has declared that there was a decrease of 54 per cent in the number of their accidents in the first six months after the closing of the saloons in Coatesville, where their plant is located.

At a meeting of the National Safety Council the statement was made that "it is recognized that most industrial accidents are brought about with the use of alcoholic stimulants." As an answer to this statement an analysis of accidents appears in the Yearbook of the United States Brewers' Association for 1914 and again for 1915. To quote the conclusion of this organization, "The loose statements in regard to the part played by drink as a factor in industrial accidents are without foundation." But the effect of alcohol upon the reaction time of workers has not been given adequate consideration in this controversy.

The National Safety Council is composed of 1,800 members found in over 150 industries, and represents the employers of upward of 2,500,000 people.

Moreover, in practically all the workmen's compensation laws it is stated that the employer shall not be responsible for accidents due to intoxication. These clauses indicate a general conviction that there is an important group of accidents for which employers are in no way responsible, and for which they should not be charged.

In our questionnaire we asked if alcohol had a place in the problem of irregularity of attendance. Here again the answers, though unaccompanied by statistics to bear them out, were without exception in the affirmative. Foreign experience frequently cited—for instance, that of the Leipzig Sick Benefits showing that drinkers lose two and one-half times as many days as nondrinkers, must be seriously discounted, because, in this case, the definition of drinkers is those who show signs of chronic alcoholism. It fails to consider that much larger group of the occasional drinkers.

COMBATING THE USE OF INTOXICANTS.

In addition to the rules previously summarized efforts have been made by some employers to discourage the use of alcoholic beverages among workers. This is particularly true of the industries in which the employer is still in close touch with the individual employee.

Efforts to educate employees are in force in a number of organizations. Publications of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., the Commonwealth Steel Co., the Avery Co., the Illinois Steel Co., have contained messages to employees against the use of intoxicants. A number of concerns have issued special leaflets bearing upon this, and in two instances that have come to our attention addresses are made to the employees on this subject.

In addition, the weekly bulletin of the National Safety Council has in a number of instances mentioned the use of alcoholic beverages. These paragraphs were posted on shop bulletin boards by many employers.

In isolated instances, employers are endeavoring to develop substitutes for the saloon. We find, for example, a statement of the Brooklyn Rapid Transit Co. that clubrooms have been erected at its depots and terminals in order to combat the saloon. This is also being done by other traction companies and by a number of railroads. Housing conditions are being improved in several corporation communities and many factories are providing lunchrooms with this.

To come now to a summary of our study. We have returns from the employers of 750,000 individuals; this is 4 per cent of those engaged in trade, transportation, and the mechanical and manufacturing industries of the United States. These employers forbid alcohol in their plants; in many instances its use is considered in the promotion and retention of employees; its use at any time is prohibited in such industries as transportation, and this practice is being followed by some industrial establishments.

This analysis indicates that a number of employers are making up their minds on the use of alcohol by their employees. By whatever reasoning they are arriving at their conclusion, whether they feel it is in the interest of the public, of the employee, or of good business, they seem to be taking a stand against the man who uses alcohol. They are not considering the detailed and intricate question of the effects of alcohol on the mind and body—these preliminaries have been ignored; they find the nondrinker the more satisfactory employee.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I also want to insert an article from the Literary Digest headed "Two years' sobriety in Russia."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the Literary Digest, Mar. 24, 1917.]

TWO YEARS' SOBRIETY IN RUSSIA.

Drawing sober breaths of rejoicing, Russia does not forget the time when "there were entire drunken villages, drunken cities, a drunken army, a drunken Russia." So the Petrograd correspondent of the Neue Züricher Zeitung presents a survey of the results of the prohibition ukase of July 29, 1914. "What would have become of Russia without the revolutionary proclamation?" is a question put by many. A representative of the Duma has said that "the very thought of the fateful consequences on the battle field and in the country itself of a continuation of the inveterate alcohol régime makes every patriot shudder." The writer continues:

"We are, therefore, more than overjoyed to know that it has been statistically proved that the daily producing capacity of the workingman since the promulgation of that message of salvation has been increased by 15 per cent, and that Monday, the day when millions of muzhik (farmers) were found in the gutters, has become a normal workday in Russia. But not only the mir (village community) felt the consequences; the life also in the city was as if of a sudden transformed. The population rushed to the schools and savings banks, cooperative societies opened their counters by the hundred. The whole aspect of the family life, the very looks of the people on the street, were changed. How quickly the population grasped the prospective benefits of the great reform is best shown by the fact that when it became known that the imperial ukase, in order to become legally valid, will need the express consent of the majority of the mirs, only an exceedingly low percentage refused the indorsement. To-day there is hardly a village in the vast Empire where the blessings of heaven are not called down on the Little Father in Petrograd.

"January last (1916) the zemstvo (county assembly) of Moscow circularized the peasants in order to ascertain in the most direct possible way the impression of the population. A few of the replies made by the village elders, most of them as illiterate as their charges, have a great economic and psychological value:

"'The men feel stronger. Their treatment of their women folk and attitude toward their neighbors is not the same as before.

"'The children are now nicely dressed and have even shoes on their feet. One hears no more quarreling in the izbas (farmhouses).

"'I was amazed to find among our farmers some who subscribe to newspapers.'

"'The people have become more honest.'

"There are, however, some who do not give up all hope to see again the vodka bottle in its ancient glory: 'The war will end with our victory; our heroes will return, and then, of course, moderately, one will have to drink again.'"

Our authority states that the malcontents are mostly found among the lazy farm hands and the city loafers, who try to replace the old wine and alcohol by all possible substitutes. The substitutes offered by the Government and the municipalities are theaters, moving pictures, reading rooms, clubs, tea houses, and similar institutions.

"Nobody has so quickly and completely grasped the import of the social revolution as woman, the greatest sufferer from the old alcohol curse. We are, therefore, not astonished to learn that as soon as the saloons were definitely closed the peasant women marched to the churches in Indian file to burn a candle each, thanking the Lord for the great delivery.

"When last spring the question of repermitting the sale of beer and red wine came up in the Duma, Tarasov, a farmer deputy, exclaimed: 'If the women would hear you, they would pull you down from this platform.'"

Mr. JONES of Washington. People have come to realize that there is no good in alcohol as a beverage; that it is a noxious poison; that it stimulates only to weaken; that it undermines the brain and weakens the body; that it incites the mob and fires it with hate and savagery; that it fills the homes with sorrow, suffering, poverty, and death; that it kills love and begets hate; that it destroys reason and enthrones brutality; that it wastes the earnings of the laborer; squanders the profits of business; closes the door of opportunity; hinders advancement and turns success into failure; that it knows no politics save its own selfishness; no law save its own will and no patriotism save its own ends; that it destroys health, wastes wealth, weakens the will, paralyzes the brain, corrupts morals, excites lust, enmity, and hate, breeds riots and anarchy; that it fills our jails with criminals, our poorhouses with paupers, and our asylums with imbeciles and lunatics; that it blasts the hopes and aspirations of the individual, undermines and destroys the home, and weakens the State.

No one defends the saloon or the liquor traffic. No one points out any good that comes from it to the individual, the home, or the Nation; to industry, enterprise, or labor. I trust this resolution may be passed, and I hope this amendment will be adopted. It will mean more of comfort to the man, more of joy to the home, and more of strength to the Nation than anything Congress can do. I would rather have an humble part in doing this great thing than to lead in any other legislation that is likely to come before the Senate of the United States.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, I wish first to congratulate the able, courageous, and industrious Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] on finally succeeding in getting the time fixed for a vote on the national prohibition amendment resolution. This is the first time in the history of the country that the Senate will have been given an opportunity to vote on this important question.

I have always been favorable to national prohibition. I have regarded it as one of the most important questions before the American people, and as most vital to the welfare of our Nation. Entertaining these views, I have introduced a national prohibition resolution, similar to the one we are now considering, at the commencement of every Congress since I have been in the Senate. I am therefore greatly pleased that we will soon be able to vote on this resolution, and I sincerely hope that the necessary two-thirds vote required by the Constitution will respond to the roll call.

Mr. President, owing to the fact that Kansas has always taken the lead in prohibition legislation and has been the beneficiary of so many blessings resulting therefrom, and our people are practically unanimous for national prohibition, whenever this question comes up Kansas seems to bear the brunt of the fight. The enemy appears to center its guns upon the strongest opposition with the hope of destroying it first. We would not complain of this if our opponents were fair and correctly represented our attitude toward this law and the results obtained therefrom. What we do object to is the false representations usually made, and the tirade of abuse, slander, and calumny heaped upon us by the opposition. If our exact situation and conditions were truthfully represented we would have no fault to find, because we are proud of our standing and record in this respect and have nothing to conceal but everything to reveal, and want the world to know all about it.

As evidence of the unfair and unwarranted methods of the opposition, I desire to call special attention to the action of Representative JACOB E. MEEKER, sometimes referred to as the "Preacher Congressman," who on March 3, 1917, just before Congress adjourned, obtained permission from the House to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

While he denied in the House the other day that he had ever been a Methodist minister, yet the denial was specific in those terms; but it would seem from the ecclesiastical obituary as composed by the official body of the St. Louis Association of Congregational Ministers and Churches that they simply placed him in the wrong pew, and that he was at one time a Congregational minister, and resigned under censure. As evidence of this, Mr. President, I desire to send to the desk and have read a letter which was written to Supt. W. S. Shupp, of the Missouri Anti-Saloon League, of St. Louis, Mo., by Dwight S. Bayley, registrar, in connection with this subject, showing the resignation of the Member.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, is the Senator referring to a gentleman who is now a Member of the House of Representatives?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). The Chair so understands.

Mr. OVERMAN. Is not that against the rules of the Senate—referring to a Member of another body in a way that reflects upon him?

Mr. THOMPSON. I know of no rule of this body which makes it improper to show a public record.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think it is against the rules of this body.

Mr. THOMPSON. It is simply a letter and a published record showing a particular fact. I desire either to read or to have read the letter and the record of this ecclesiastical body. It simply shows the resignation of this man from membership in the Congregational Ministerial Association.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Kansas pardon the Chair? Is it a reflection upon a Member of the House of Representatives?

Mr. THOMPSON. It is simply proof, Mr. President, as I understand it, that he was a minister of the Congregational Church and resigned under censure. I know of no rule of the Senate that deprives me of the right to show that fact, for I would not, of course, want to violate any rule of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina raise the point of order that the discussion, or proposed discussion, with reference to a Member of the House is not in order?

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not know anything about this matter, Mr. President. I simply want to preserve the rules of the Senate. It is against the rules of the Senate for any Senator to refer to a Member of Congress in any opprobrious terms.

Mr. THOMPSON. I should not think it would be regarded as opprobrious to show that a Member of the House had been a Congregational minister and had resigned, and that his resignation was accepted by the ministerial association.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks there is such a rule that would make it improper and out of order to refer to a Member of the House of Representatives in opprobrious terms and to impute to him unworthy motives. If there is not, there ought to be.

Mr. THOMPSON. I know of no such rule, Mr. President. I do not want to violate any rule, even impliedly, but I think it is a fact that ought to be known in connection with what I have to say following the letter and the record I desire to have read.

Mr. OVERMAN. I will state to the Senator from Kansas that the reason of the rule is this: The gentleman to whom he refers is not here to be heard, and they have a rule similar to ours in the House of Representatives. If that man is a Member of the House of Representatives, he can rise on the floor of the House of Representatives and refer to the Senator from Kansas in opprobrious terms. There is a comity between the two bodies by which, if the Senator refers to him in this body, of course he can say what he pleases on the floor of the House about the Senator from Kansas.

I do not care what the Senator does about it; I am simply calling his attention to the rules.

Mr. THOMPSON. I want to proceed, of course, according to the rules; but I know of no rule of the Senate that deprives me of showing this fact, which I think is important in connection with what I have to say, for I will show before I am through that this gentleman violated the rules of the House in his conduct there.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is not clear whether the Senator from North Carolina raises a point of order or not. However, the Chair hopes he will be pardoned for stating that, as he understands the rule, no Senator ought to make any statement that would be a reflection upon any Member of the House or impute to him improper conduct or an unworthy motive. He is not here to defend himself. It would seem to the present occupant of the chair unfair for any Senator to make any comment upon the life or character or political conduct of a Member of the House of Representatives that would reflect upon his honor or his integrity or his good faith.

Mr. THOMPSON. In view of what the Chair has said, I will withdraw the statement and not insist upon the reading of the letter and church record. I will say, however, that this gentleman represents the tenth Missouri district, in which is located 15 large breweries. Shortly after Congress adjourned, on March 8, 1917, instead of extending his own remarks in accordance with the special privilege accorded him he took occasion to grossly abuse that privilege——

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I am bound to make a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. OVERMAN. It is for the Senator's own protection that I make this point of order, because to-morrow probably the gentleman from Missouri will rise and make a severe attack on him. The rules of the Senate ought to be preserved, and I do make the point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, I am stating the acts of this Congressman in obtaining permission of the House to extend his remarks, and that instead of extending his own remarks he extended the remarks of a paid attorney for the breweries to the extent of 68 pages of solid printed matter which appears in nonpareil type, at pages 622 to 690, inclusive, of the Appendix to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Sixty-fourth Congress, wherein the State of Kansas and her people are wantonly and maliciously slandered and abused. I think that that is squarely within the rule, as long as the Congressman himself has resorted to this method and has violated the rule of the House as I contend.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator from Kansas is addressing his remarks to the Chair, the Chair will say that an infraction of the rules of the House by a Member of the House would not, in the opinion of the Chair, warrant an infraction of the rules of the Senate by an attack upon a Member of the House.

Mr. THOMPSON. I am not attacking a Member of the House. I am attacking the conduct of an entirely outside party, an attorney for the breweries, who wrote the article printed in the RECORD.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I will simply read the rule:

It is a breach of order in debate to notice what has been said on the same subject in the other House or the particular votes or majorities on it there, because the opinion of each House should be left to its own independency, not to be influenced by the proceedings of the other; and the quoting them might beget reflections leading to a misunderstanding between the two Houses.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair could not hear all of the matter read by the Senator. The Chair will ask the Senator please to send it to the desk.

Mr. THOMPSON. I am simply calling attention to what was inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. If this is out of order, it is a strange proceeding to me. Things of this character are said every day in the Senate without any objection being raised to them, and I have the RECORD here before me, in which the Congressman himself states that an attorney of Kansas City, Mo., prepared the data.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have no interest in this particular matter, Mr. President. I always make this point of order whenever a Senator says anything that might be considered a reflection upon a Member of the House.

Mr. THOMPSON. I have simply stated that under the rule of the House permitting this Member to extend his remarks in the RECORD he extended the remarks of a paid attorney, and I will prove it by his own statement.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I remember the case to which the Senator refers. It came about by what I was going to say is the unjustifiable practice that the House continues in of allowing remarks of Members to be extended in the RECORD.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, if the Senator from Utah will pardon me, I think he is out of order when he refers to a practice of another body in this Capitol as unjustifiable.

Mr. SMOOT. No; if the Senator had just waited, I was about to explain in this way: Of course, I have no right whatever to say what the rules of the House should be, and in referring to it as I did, I simply referred to it, not as something for which any one House Member is responsible, yet it is a practice, as a practice, that nobody can defend.

The Senator refers to a large number of pages printed; I do not know how many. I know that it has not only occurred once, but it has occurred many, many times; and I know one case where I called the Member's attention to it and stated that the extension of his remarks criticized a Member of the Senate, and he himself admitted that he had not read the statement and did not know that there was any such thing in the statement which he had put in the RECORD by way of an extension of his remarks.

Now, I do not believe that the House would have allowed a Member to have delivered the speech referred to by the Senator upon the floor of the House. No one in the House knew what was in the extended remarks. They were put in the RECORD, but if it had been undertaken to announce them upon the floor, which ought to be done in all cases, then they never would have appeared in the RECORD. Of course it is clearly a violation of the rule for a Senator to follow the same practice in a speech that he may deliver.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, I am simply calling attention to the abuse of this rule, for the benefit not only of the public but of Congress itself. This is a special privilege of the House, and this matter was inserted after Congress had adjourned, and it seems to me that it certainly deserves the mild criticism I have attempted to give it here.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will announce, if the Senator from Kansas will pardon him, that in the opinion of the Chair nothing should be stated by a Senator that would be a reflection upon the integrity or moral character of a Member of the other House or impute to him improper or unworthy motives. The Chair may be in error, but the Senator from Kansas has the view of the present occupant of the chair, and the Chair hopes the Senator will conform to that view.

Mr. THOMPSON. I shall certainly endeavor to conform to the ruling of the Chair, for whose opinion I have the greatest respect. I wish, in closing the controversy, to simply call attention to this practice, which ought to challenge the serious thought of the membership of that honorable body to bring about a modification of its rule so as to protect itself as well as the country against willful abuse. I want the Congress and the country to know that this statement, or "data" as he calls it himself, which does not rise to the importance or dignity of a speech, was bought and paid for in so many dollars and cents.

The statement shows on its face that it was prepared by one Paul S. Conwell, of Kansas City, Mo., a young lawyer with whom I have been personally acquainted practically all of his life, having lived in the same town with him in Kansas during our boyhood. This young man was educated to be a lawyer, and I wish to say for him that he is really worthy of a better calling than the representative of the whisky and brewery interests of the country in writing and talking against prohibition. He has been employed in that capacity for the last few years simply because of the money he gets out of it, for he told me himself that the only reason he was doing it was because he could make more money out of it than in the legitimate practice of the law. Any man with no higher conception of the ethics of the legal profession can never hope to attain distinction in the profession. However, Mr. Conwell is already receiving some punishment. For this article which Representative MEEKER introduced in the RECORD Mr. Conwell claims he was to be paid $1,600 for preparing, but the brewing companies, with their usual display of honor and honesty, paid him only $250. After reading the article one can hardly blame the breweries for objecting to the payment of this exorbitant sum for an article which is not actually worth 16 cents. Yet if they agreed to pay it they should follow the old adage which exacts honor among thieves. I have here an article taken from a recent issue of the Kansas City Star giving an account of the bringing of suit by Mr. Conwell for the collection of the balance due for preparing this statement, which I send to the desk and ask that it may be read as a part of my remarks.

Mr. SMOOT. I thought the Chair had ruled on this question once.

Mr. THOMPSON. I hope that the time the Senator from Utah occupies will not be taken out of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah rises to a point of order and is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SMOOT. This is a direct personal attack upon a Member of the other House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks so.

Mr. SMOOT. I thought the Chair had already ruled upon it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair ruled two or three times on the question and thinks the point of order is sustained.

Mr. THOMPSON. This is simply an account of a suit brought by Mr. Conwell in corroboration of my statement that the speech was prepared by this very man. I can not see how the Chair can hold it to be out of order. It is simply in corroboration of the statement I made of the fact that a suit was brought by Mr. Conwell to collect a balance due for preparing this speech.

Mr. SMOOT. The rule provides that when a question of order is raised the Senator violating the rule of order must either proceed in order or take his seat. I do not ask that the Senator from Kansas shall take his seat, but I ask the Senator from Kansas to proceed in order. It is not that I care anything about what the newspaper article contains if not a criticism of a Senator or Member of the House. All that I care about is that the Senator should obey the rule of the Senate.

Mr. THOMPSON. I expect to proceed in order and to obey the rule of the Senate as well as it is obeyed by any of the other Senators. I simply desire the right to present the paper to corroborate a mere statement of fact. Every Senator does that every day on this floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of opinion that an attack may be made upon the honor or the integrity of a Member of the other House by having read an article to the same extent as if the attack were made orally by a Senator. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. THOMPSON. In view of the ruling of the Chair I will withdraw the article clipped from the Kansas City Star, and ask that it be expunged from the RECORD, and refer simply to an article taken from the Kansas City Post of June 19, 1917, already contained in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, on page 4534, introduced by Representative RANDALL, of California, on June 29, 1917, and call attention simply to that part of the article concerning the bringing of suit by Mr. Paul S. Conwell, in the following language:

In a suit filed to-day in the circuit court here by Paul S. Conwell, who declares he was hired to write the speech by Conrad Mann, general manager of the Breweries Co., but never paid for his work. * * * The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD printed the speech in full.

Conwell declares in his petition that he was hired early this year by Mr. Mann, who agreed to pay him $1,600 for writing the * * * speech and some other incidental publicity work. Conwell says that after the speech was delivered and given nation-wide prominence Mann paid him $200, and told him to look to other brewers for the balance of the $1,600 promised him.

I will proceed now with a discussion of the article itself.

Mr. President, very little of this article is devoted to the question of prohibition, but is confined largely to scurrilous criticism of our political policies, prominent citizens, and various institutions in the State of Kansas, together with a recital of the most disreputable, fiendish, and heinous crimes that could be imagined, alleged to have been committed in the State, and attempting to leave the inference that they were caused by prohibition, when, as a matter of fact, if the crimes were actually committed, liquor was no doubt at the bottom of nine-tenths of them. In many of the alleged cases those committing the crimes enumerated, the article itself shows, were not Kansans at all, but were people from outside the State, and in other cases those responsible for the crimes are shown to have been residents of other States. As a whole, it is the grossest misrepresentation, and the meanest, lowest, foulest, and most contemptible publication ever issued against the State, and under ordinary circumstances would have been deprived of circulation through the mails. It was only protected by its official character as a part of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. No one with the best interests of the public at heart would think of publishing such rot. It only shows how far an ordinarily decent sort of a fellow will sometimes go for a little money to the extent of even slandering the State of his birth and maliciously abusing or reflecting against his relatives, neighbors, and friends, many of whom still live in Kansas, merely for the purpose of promoting the liquor interests.

Now, Mr. President, when this question was up at the last session of Congress the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] made the statement in substance that there were more drunkards in Kansas to the square acre than in any place he had ever been. Now this is a pretty harsh and reckless statement coming from a Senator representing a great State which contains, according to the papers of Missouri, a town named by some one in a spirit of humor "Drydale," pronounced by Missourians to be "the wettest town in the world."

I have here a picture of the place taken from the Kansas City Star of June 24, 1917, which is labeled in large type, reaching across the entire page, "Drydale, the wettest town in the world." The town consists of 4 saloons and 12 wholesale liquor houses. There are no homes, no stores, and nothing but places to sell or drink intoxicating liquor. So much drunkenness and lawlessness prevailed there that the President exercised his war power and recently established a dry zone around Fort Leavenworth so as to include this place, in order to protect the soldiers at the fort.

If I chose to make comparisons, which are always odious, without in any way intending to reflect on the good people of Missouri, whom I respect most highly, I could point out to the Senator a single wet city of about 40,000 inhabitants in Missouri where there were more arrests in a year for drunkenness than in all the State of Kansas for the same period of time.

If the statement of the junior Senator from Missouri as to drunkenness in Kansas is correct, his travels must have been extremely limited, or else he becomes blind in the presence of drunkards everywhere he goes except when in Kansas. While this statement, as well as the Meeker data, could be disproved by statistics, yet, as statistics are always more or less unconvincing, in order to get at the exact facts from living witnesses on the ground, which is the best evidence after all, I addressed a letter to practically all of the law-enforcing officers in all of the counties of Kansas, including the district judges, the sheriffs, and county attorneys, and also to the mayors, chiefs of police, and police judges in all first and second class cities. This letter was as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 30, 1916.

MY DEAR SIR: As you have perhaps observed, the old question as to whether prohibition in Kansas is a failure or actually prohibits—thereby lessening drunkenness and crime and resulting morally and economically advantageous to our people—has again been raised in our prohibition fight in the Nation.

As one of the law enforcing officers of the State, I would be glad to have your experience, observation, and views on these propositions by early mail, with authority to use the same in the Senate should it become important to answer the misrepresentations usually made by the opposition.

Thanking you in advance for your trouble, I remain, with best wishes,

Sincerely and cordially,

WM. H. THOMPSON.

I received something over 100 replies to my letter from nearly every county in the State, which I have arranged alphabetically by counties. I desire to call particular attention to a few of the terse statements in some of the letters, and I shall then ask to have the letters made a part of my remarks without reading. I shall take up the letters by counties alphabetically, commencing with Allen County.

Mr. SMOOT. Did I understand the Senator to say that he desires all those letters made a part of his remarks?

Mr. THOMPSON. I desire to have most of the letters I have received made a part of my remarks. I shall refer particularly to only a small number of them.

Mr. SMOOT. The only way I can give consent to that at this time is to have the Senator from Kansas give me assurance that in none of those letters is there any reflection upon Members of this body or of the other House.

Mr. THOMPSON. Of course I would cut out any reflection upon any Senator or upon any Member of the House. I have already done that in several instances.

Mr. SMOOT. I want it distinctly understood now that it will be cut out; and if it is not cut out, I wish to notify the Senator that if it is put in the RECORD I shall ask that it be cut out from the permanent RECORD.

Mr. THOMPSON. I have no objection to that. There will be no attempted violation of the rule in that respect.

Commencing with Allen County, in the southeast section of the State, I have a letter from the police judge of Iola, Kans., Mr. W. L. Bartels, who signs himself as a lifelong Democrat and a veteran of the Civil War. As this is of more than usual importance on account of the fact that Mr. Bartels was at one time very strongly opposed to prohibition, I desire to read the entire letter.

IOLA, KANS., January 6, 1917.

Hon. WILLIAM H. THOMPSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: You asked me for the result of my observation and experience of the effect of the prohibitory law in Kansas, and in compliance with your request will say that I moved to Kansas in 1860 from Illinois and have lived in Kansas ever since. I was in the United States Army three and a half years during the Civil War; was deputy collector of internal revenue from 1885 to 1890; have been mayor of Iola two terms and served on its city council five years; and was engaged in active business in Iola for 25 years, and for the last three years have been police judge of said city, which has a population of 10,000.

When the prohibitory law was first brought before the voters of Kansas I voted against its adoption. But in the years since its adoption I have carefully observed its workings and effects, and have become convinced that it has been so beneficial to the State, its citizenship, and business that I have become and now am a stanch supporter of prohibition, State and National.

I believe the prohibitory law has decreased crime and pauperism in Kansas fully 95 per cent. During the last year an average of four cases of drunkenness per month has been brought in my court.

You have my permission to use this statement in any way you see fit.

Yours, very truly,

W. L. BARTELS,
Lifelong Democrat and Veteran of the Civil War,
Police Judge of Iola.

The chief of police, Mr. Thomas I. Christy, of Iola, says:

I firmly believe that the prohibition law in Kansas has been the main cause in reducing crime, poverty, sickness, and distress from 75 per cent to 90 per cent as compared to former conditions.

Mr. J. J. Varner, mayor of Iola, says:

Prohibition in Kansas has eliminated at least 90 per cent of drunkenness, crime, and poverty since its adoption. When you learn that 50 per cent of our jails and poorhouses have no inmates and compare this record with the States that permits the sale of intoxicants, you can very easily conclude that the reason is the cause of John Barleycorn in one State and the freedom from it in the other.

From Anderson County, I desire to call attention to the statement of the police judge, Judge J. E. Calvert, at Garnett, Kans., a town of 2,500 people, and the county seat, located in the east central section of the State:

I beg to say that there have been but two cases of drunkenness in the police court of this city in the past two years and but few cases of bootlegging in justice court during the same period.

The mayor of Garnett, Hon. B. F. Acuff, says:

Prohibition is certainly one of the things that is pushing Kansas to the front. We have less crimes, less insanity, and I am in favor of national prohibition.

From Atchison County, the statement of the county attorney, Mr. Charles J. Conlon, is as follows:

It is my unqualified opinion that prohibition has been and is resulting in less drunkenness, less crime, and in a higher standard of morality among our people, and my opinion in the matter is being reflected by thousands of others in Atchison County, some of whom have heretofore been strongly opposed to the prohibitory law.

The mayor of Atchison, Hon. Louis Weinman, states:

This city and suburbs have a population of about 20,000 people. Last month there were 40 arrests by the police department and $128 fines collected in the police court. Probably one-half of these arrests were drunken persons who came from East Atchison, Mo.; the other arrests were for petty stealing, violating traffic rules, etc. Were it not for the conditions in East Atchison, our police force would have very little to do.

From Barber County, located in the southwest section, the county attorney, Mr. Samuel Griffin, writes:

There is no question but what prohibition in Kansas prohibits. Ninety per cent of those who are arrested for being drunk are of the old stock, men who have drank all of their lives, and were brought up in States where there were open saloons or in Kansas before the law was enforced. The man who gets it now has to send off and get it, and that fact becomes of public record, and this deters him in the use, as it affects his standing and business credit, etc. The bootlegger usually sells it to these old topers, but hardly ever to the young man, because he runs greater chances of being caught. The bootlegger is usually soon caught, and spends most of his time either in jail or the penitentiary.

The person who contends that prohibition in Kansas does not prohibit does not know either the conditions in Kansas now or what they were in the past. There are fewer paupers and more families who own their homes. Men and women go better dressed. They give better service to their employer; hence every line of business meets with better success under prohibition.

P. S.—There should be national prohibition without doubt.

The police judge, W. H. McCayne, of the county seat, Medicine Lodge, writes:

I have been police judge since April, 1911, and since that time there has been on the docket 183 cases filed, of which 79 have been for drunkenness, of which 10 cases have been against the same man, 6 against another, and 5 against a third, making a total of 21 cases against three. These men have all ordered their liquor directly from Kansas City, Mo., not only by their own statements, but corroborated by the records of the county clerk's office.

From Barton County, in the central west, I have a letter from the district judge, Hon. D. A. Banta, who, after reviewing the situation in Kansas and the gradual betterment in the enforcement of the law and conditions there, says:

As a result of all this there is no consideration that could induce the people of this State to return to the old system.

The mayor of Great Bend, Hon. O. W. Dawson, says:

I have had a number of years' experience as an enforcing officer, and have no hesitation in saying as a result of that experience and from my observation generally throughout Kansas as compared to the handling of the liquor question in other States, that prohibition is by all means the best method of handling this evil.

From Bourbon County, in the southeast section, the county attorney, Mr. James G. Sheppard, writes:

Prohibition in Kansas is a success in every possible way, and any person who says that it is not a great benefit to the State is either misinformed or willfully falsifying, and the same is true of any person who says that prohibition has injured the State in any possible way.

The sheriff of the county, Mr. J. W. Hartman, states:

You never see a young man drunk in Bourbon County; it is some old fellow who got the habit during saloon days that is drunk. As soon as these old fellows die there is going to be a marked change in the number of drunkards. Since the saloons have closed in Nevada and Rich Hill, Mo. (our sister State), we have but little trouble with bootlegging. Crime grows less every year in Bourbon County, Kans., on account of whisky being harder to get.

BROWN COUNTY.

This is the county in which Hiawatha, one of the most law-abiding cities of the State, is located, and where the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] tried a lawsuit some 25 years ago, and to which he referred when he stated in his speech on December 19 last, speaking of the members of the bar of that city, that "it seemed to him there was not a lawyer at the bar who was not a common drunkard." I have here a letter from a man who was living there at that time, and who is now a member of the bar and editor of one of the leading newspapers of northeast Kansas, Mr. F. M. Pearl, who answers that statement most thoroughly and completely. Mr. Pearl is one of the ablest and most reliable men in the State, and you can rely absolutely on what he says.

In justice to the members of the Brown County bar, with whom I am personally and intimately acquainted, I shall read this letter in full. He says:

HIAWATHA, KANS., January 12, 1911.

Hon. WILLIAM H. THOMPSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I observed in the RECORD the attack made on the Brown County bar of 25 years ago by the junior Senator from Missouri, in which he stated that the bar of that period were noted as common drunkards. I remember the case in which Senator REED appeared. It was that of Craig Bros. failure at Horton. At that time our bar was composed of such lawyers as R. F. Buckles, James Falloon, W. F. Means, Sample F. Newlon, William I. Stuart (now judge), S. L. Ryan, D. E. Reber, W. F. Shale, James A. Clark, Flintoff Smith, A. B. Crockett, Elliott A. Davis, A. G. Hobbs, Grant W. Harrington, Col. E. Bierer, Ire J. Lacock, R. I. Rea, W. P. Todd, and George Newlon. Your father, J. F. Thompson, was on the bench at that time, and you were court reporter, and you can of your personal knowledge bear testimony to the high character, sobriety, and intelligence of our bar at that time. Of all these lawyers, there were but four who were known even as moderate drinkers. Unfortunately for all moderate drinkers they sometimes take on a little more than moderation requires, but aside from these four, the other members of our bar were then, as now, total abstainers and rarely if ever were known to take a drink of intoxicating liquor. The lawyers of Brown County have always sustained a high character for intelligence, sobriety, professional ethics, and respect for the law, and it is to be regretted that a lawyer in the exalted position of a Senator should find it necessary in defense of the brewers and distillers to hold up his brethren to public scorn and contempt, especially when it is entirely undeserved as in this case.

Speaking of the effects of the prohibitory law, I can cheerfully bear testimony to its efficacy in this county. The law is universally observed and is not violated by the rank and file of the people to any greater extent than any other law. It is true that we have an occasional drunk on our streets, but when it is investigated it is found that the victim is a fresh arrival from our neighboring State of Nebraska or Missouri, and he is usually picked up within a few minutes after the departure of the train upon which he arrived and is always found to have his pockets well filled, as well as his anatomy.

We have a generation of young people in this State, and more especially in this county, that have grown up without having ever looked in a place where intoxicating liquors are sold. Public sentiment is strongly in favor of the law and its enforcement, and the drinking man is ostracized in this State and no longer admitted in good society.

As a member of the bar since 1894, I have known but two Hiawatha attorneys to drink to excess, and one of them is now in his grave and the other has long since retired from practice. The aspersions cast upon our bar is wholly unwarranted and far-fetched, and the brewers and distillers are in sore straits when it is necessary that the good name and reputation of the bar has to be execrated in this manner for the sole purpose of bolstering up a waning cause.

With all good wishes, I remain,
Very truly yours, F. M. PEARL.

Mr. REED. Who says that?

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. F. M. Pearl.

I will leave it to the Senate and the people of the country to judge for themselves as to who has correctly represented the character of the bar at Hiawatha as to sobriety at that time.

I have a letter from the mayor of this same city, Hon. George C. McKnight, in which he states:

The law prohibits absolutely here in Hiawatha, Kans. During the past year there have been 27 arrests for drunkenness; 26 of these were persons returning from across the line in Missouri or Nebraska. The only liquor they brought home with them was in their stomachs. These parties were promptly arrested and placed in jail. One arrest was for drunkenness or sickness from taking too much Hostetter's bitters. "Bootlegging" is unknown here in Hiawatha and has been for several years. In September a circus visited our city, and on that day over 20,000 people were in town. Not a single case of drunkenness was reported to the police, and we have not heard that a single drunken person was seen. The prosperity of our city is beyond anything ever known here. Thirty thousand dollars' worth of city 4 per cent bonds sold last month for a premium and that to local purchasers.

I have a letter from the sheriff of the county, Mr. C. W. Biddle, in which he states:

The prohibition law of the State of Kansas actually prohibits, and we absolutely have less drunkenness and crime than our sister States Nebraska and Missouri. I know whereof I speak, as I am in a position to see and learn. Kansas has been troubled some by having two wet boundaries—Nebraska and Missouri—but, thank the good people of Nebraska, they blowed up the wet element last election, which will make us three dry boundaries, with Missouri going dry slowly but surely. I am for nation-wide prohibition, and I am thankful that Kansas has as grand and good a Senator that has the backbone to fight the everlasting curse, liquor.

The county attorney, Mr. W. E. Archer, has this to say:

The prohibition laws of Kansas are not a failure, but do prohibit. * * * Kansas would no more think of giving up its prohibitory liquor law than it would its public-school system or the right of the people to worship God according to the dictates of their own conscience.

Hon. J. F. Bailey, mayor of the city of Horton, a railroad town of 4,500 people, says:

I have been a resident of the city for about 30 years and I want to say prohibition is not a failure in Kansas but a grand success. As you know, Horton has a population of about 4,500 and is a railroad-shop town, and I can truthfully say it is seldom one sees a drunken man on the streets, and that is usually some one that comes in on the train from some point in Missouri. There is but very little crime committed in our city, and I don't think we average three arrests per month, and our city jail is empty most of the time.

From Butler County I have a good letter from the mayor, Hon. G. W. Stinson, of El Dorado City, in the heart of the new oil field, which is destined to be the most productive oil field in the world. I will simply call attention to his letter in full, as it appears under the head of Butler County.

The mayor of Sedan, in Chautauqua County, Hon. Norman L. Hay, in the southern part of the State, writes:

We have little drunkenness. If you will give us a law making it necessary for those that hold a Government license to sell intoxicating liquors to come out in the open, or better still, have the Government refuse to license them to sell it, we will make a State law making the point of delivery the point or place of sale, and then we will be able to enforce the law with little or no effort. This administration and the people of Sedan stand for the enforcement of the prohibitory law.

From Columbus, Cherokee County, in the southeast section of the State, I have a letter from the judge of the district, Hon. J. N. Dunbar, who states the difficulties in enforcing the law by reason of its close proximity to wet territory, and then makes this statement:

We are also situated immediately adjacent to the city of Joplin, Mo., a large mining center, with large brewing and distilling interests, but in spite of all these disadvantages, it has been demonstrated abundantly that the law can be enforced.

* * * * * * *

I am heartily in sympathy with any effort you can make for national prohibition, and you have my sincere wishes that you may succeed, as we are in a community whose peculiar situation will be most benefited by that law.

Hon. A. L. Remaley, mayor of the city of Columbus, writes, in answer to the question as to whether prohibition prohibits:

Yes; the fault lies not with the law, but with its enforcement. Nine-tenths of all arrests made here in Columbus are drunks caused by our close proximity to the Missouri line. Were we 100 or 150 miles from Missouri, instead of 25 miles, our city prison would be of no use.

From Clay County, going more to the north central section of the State, I have a letter from the mayor, Hon. M. M. Smith, in which he makes this statement:

The writer is 35 years old and is a native Kansan and does not ever remember of seeing an open saloon in this State. What I would like to see is nation-wide prohibition.

From Coffey County, in the southeast section of the State, Hon. S. D. Weaver, mayor of the city of Burlington, the county seat, states:

I beg to say unqualifiedly that prohibition is a mighty good thing for Kansas.

It is a success in our city and in our State, a success not only that it prohibits the sale of intoxicating liquor, but that it makes our city and State better in every way and a much more desirable place in which to live. And it is a success financially.

* * * * * * *

Nothing could induce or influence our people to return to the saloon or the sale of intoxicating liquor in any manner. We are more than satisfied, and would not think of changing.

From Cowley County I have a letter from the police judge, Hon. F. Harbue, of Arkansas City, one of the leading cities of that county, located on the border, which states:

I believe the arrests for intoxication have been reduced about 90 per cent; other crimes accordingly. * * * Better to pass a law prohibiting the manufacture of all intoxicants.

I also have a letter from the district judge of that district, Hon. O. P. Fuller, who states:

No one will contend that Kansas prohibition prevents all drunkenness or crime as a result of drunkenness. But that drunkenness and crimes resulting therefrom are greatly reduced by reason of prohibition is so patent a fact that I know of no fair-minded and sane Kansan who would declare otherwise. The beneficial effect of Kansas prohibition will be inestimably furthered when we are assisted by national prohibition.

Coming now to the eastern border, to one of the largest cities, is Pittsburg, where we have had great trouble in the enforcement of the law. The chief of police of Pittsburg, Hon. Roll Rakestraw, writes this letter. After dealing with the difficulties on account of being able to buy liquor just across the line, he says:

But notwithstanding all this, our city is in a much better condition than it was 12 years ago. Then we had in the neighborhood of 28 saloons running open in our town, which then had a population of about 12,000. When the order was given to close the saloons in Pittsburg it was rumored that Pittsburg would go dead and that business houses that were vacated by the saloons would remain empty; but, on the contrary, as fast as the buildings were vacated by the saloons they were immediately occupied by some legal business. And to-day our city has a population of 20,000, with no saloons and not an empty business building in town, and we have never had a lull or panic in business.

Judge Leo J. McKenna, police judge of the city, has this to say:

We are too near the Missouri State line to feel the full benefit of prohibition, being only 4 miles away, but in my two years experience as police judge of this city of 20,000 I have not had a single drunk tell me that he became intoxicated upon liquor bought in Kansas. They invariably get their liquor across the State line, and on account of this condition we are deprived of the real benefit of prohibition.

Hon. A. J. Curran, district judge of this district, states:

The law against the sale of intoxicating liquor is being fairly and reasonably well enforced in Kansas. * * * Unquestionably the prohibitory law greatly restricts and reduces the sale of intoxicating liquor.

From Decatur County, in the northwest, a letter from Judge J. S. Leake, police judge at Oberlin, the county seat, says:

Drunkenness is getting less and less, and, in fact, it is almost a thing of the past; but the Government is at fault for licensing the sale of the stuff, and I am hoping that national prohibition is not far off.

The judge of that northwest district, comprising six counties, Hon. W. S. Langmade, says:

We can truly say we have a dry State. A drunken man is seldom seen and crime is lessened and the standard of morality much higher, especially among our young men, than it was a few years ago. In fact drinking is unpopular and growing more so under the influence of prohibition.

From Dickinson County I have a letter from Hon. W. D. Nichols, mayor of the city of Abilene, a city of about 5,000 people, which contains this statement:

In the last 10 years there has not been a man killed in any fight which could be charged up to liquor, and there are no homes being foreclosed on account of liquor. Every year the few bootleggers are getting less. Last year in this town of 5,000 there were only two arrests for drunkenness.

I will put that record up against the record of any city of its size anywhere in the world.

The police judge of the city of Abilene, Judge J. C. Porter, states:

Prohibition certainly does prohibit with us. During the year 1916 there were five warrants issued and two arrests made for drunkenness and one bootlegger and no joints running.

From Doniphan County, the northeast county of the State, Judge J. M. Knight, police judge of the city of Troy, states:

I have had five cases before me for drunkenness during the year 1916. Our city has a population of some 1,500 and we are in favor of prohibition, and the people of this community would never vote to do away with the prohibitory law. When we had open saloons we had terms of court lasting from four to six weeks. Now we have terms lasting from two to three days each term. People are more prosperous and are building and owning their own homes and are well satisfied and are helping enforce the laws.

From Douglas County, in the eastern section of the State, the county attorney, Mr. Thomas Harley, writing from Lawrence, Kans., states:

The prohibitory law is not a failure in Kansas. It is a marked success, and I am speaking from experience that I have had as an officer—four years as city attorney of this city and six years as county attorney of this county.

From Ellis County, located in the northwest section of the State, I have a letter from the mayor of Hays, Hon. H. W. Chittenden, in which he states:

I know of no law on our statutes which has a greater sanction by the people of this State than this law, and I do not suppose that anyone will contend that Kansas is a lawless place.

The population of the city of Hays is about 3,000. Out of this number of people there is not one drunkard; in fact, we have no drunkards, paupers, or idlers, but our people are contented, happy, and prosperous. Nearly seven-eighths of them own their own homes and have money in the bank.

From Finney County, my old home county, located in the western section of the State, I have a letter from the sheriff, Mr. Oll Brown, who makes this statement:

I have lived in Kansas all my life and for the last two years have been sheriff of Finney County, and have been in a good position to observe the workings of the prohibition law. I would say that it has worked in Kansas and has done the State more good than any one law that I know of. It most certainly reduces crime, lessens drunkenness, and raises the morality of the State to a very high degree. * * * Take it is a whole, prohibition has been enforced at least 90 per cent in Kansas, and has made Kansas 90 per cent more efficient.

From Ford County, in the western end of the State, the mayor of the county seat, Dodge City, Hon. W. T. Hale, writes:

As you know, our city before prohibition was enforced had a very bad reputation for drunkenness and all other kinds of vices that go hand in hand with the liquor traffic, but to-day we have a city of 5,000 people with only a day and night marshal, and it is very little they have to do on account of liquor.

The sheriff of this same county, Mr. C. W. Woolwine, states:

The people here are so well satisfied with it we will vote almost to a man and woman for national prohibition.

From Franklin County, the sheriff, Hon. Nick Johnson, at Ottawa, the county seat, states:

To my mind, open saloons in Kansas would be a crime equal to taking the lives of our younger generation.

The district judge of this district, Hon. C. A. Smart, states:

You can put it down as a settled fact, prohibition is here to stay. It is as firmly fixed in the minds of our people as the abolition of human slavery, and is no longer a disputed question. It is a fixture in this State because our people have become thoroughly convinced that it is a paying investment; that is, that sober men are to be trusted in all stations in life rather than drunken men, and the situation resolves itself down to that proposition.

From Junction City, Geary County, where one of the present officers' training camps is located, Judge J. I. Kern, police judge; Mr. M. D. Peeso, city marshal; and Mr. I. M. Platt, city attorney, state over their signatures:

It has been the earnest endeavor of the officers at all times during the past 10 years to enforce all laws, and especially the prohibitory liquor law. Naturally drunkenness has materially decreased, as have all other crimes. We have made an examination of the records and find that our police and district court records show a decrease in crime and prosecution for offenses of at least 500 per cent. This may seem large, but an examination of the records will bear us out.

The county attorney of Geary County, Hon. William W. Pease, of Junction City, states:

As to the question whether prohibition in Kansas is a failure, I have to say that no statement can be more absurd or false. The influence of the saloon and its accompanying vices are gone and our young men no longer influenced by the glittering attractions to entice them into the web of damnation.

From the city of Gove, Gove County, located in the northwest section of the State, the county attorney, Hon. E. F. Beckner, states:

The prohibitory law in this State and county is a decided success. * * * Even the fellows, or a majority of them, that use the liquor would be opposed to the open saloon.

From the city of New Ulysses, Grant County, in the southwest section, the county attorney, Hon. H. W. Stubbs, writes:

My observation of the operation of the prohibitory law in Kansas leads me to believe that even though it has been in some instances indifferently enforced it has done more to lessen drunkenness and crime than any other one thing.

From the city of Eureka, Greenwood County, in the southeast section, in the oil and gas district, Hon. M. A. Miller, mayor, states:

I think I can answer your question about as intelligently by repeating to you a conversation I had with a young lady, who is bookkeeper and cashier in our store. I asked her the question if she often saw a drunken man in Eureka. She said she never had seen one, and she has been raised right there.

From the city of Syracuse, Hamilton County, one of the counties of my old judicial district, my successor in office, Hon. George J. Downer, judge of the district composed of the nine southwest counties of the State, says:

I spent over 20 years of my life in a State that has local option, and have been in Kansas 18 years, the last 12 of which time the prohibitory law has been enforced. I think the conditions in Kansas are much preferable under the prohibitory law than in States which have local option. I am confident that our people would never consent to a change. The drunkenness that exists in Kansas should not be charged to the prohibitory law, but should be charged to the liquor interests which ship liquor from wet territory into Kansas. When we are protected against the liquor traffic from the outside, we will then be able to control the situation, and a case of drunkenness in Kansas will be very, very rare, indeed.

From the city of Newton, Harvey County, in the central section of the State, Hon. A. J. Duff, mayor, states:

There is absolutely no question in the minds of our city commissioners or our citizens as to the success of prohibition in Kansas and in our city. Our officers are greatly handicapped by private shipments of liquor into the State, this being the most serious obstacle to full enforcement of the law.

The county attorney of Harvey County, Hon. L. C. Kelley, of Newton, states:

The prohibitory liquor law in Kansas is not a failure. The prohibitory liquor law in Kansas actually prohibits. As a result of our prohibitory liquor law, there is less drunkenness, less crime, and less immorality than in many States and places other than the State of Kansas with which I am familiar and which are not blessed with a similar law. * * *

In Harvey County during the past month of December, 1916, and with a strict enforcement of the liquor law, I have caused the arrest of only two people for drunkenness, and in the city of Newton, with a population of approximately 10,000, there has been only three arrested for drunkenness.

From Hodgeman County, in the western section of the State, the county attorney, Hon. Albert H. Wilson, of Jetmore, states:

I am fully satisfied with the law and the manner in which it is enforced. All that is required is action by our National Congress in order that our State law may be made more effective.

From Jackson County, Mr. Charles E. Johnson, sheriff, of Holton, writes:

If there is any one issue that I think should become a national law, it surely should be the question of prohibition. * * * I have kept a record of the men that have come under my control as sheriff in the years of 1915 and 1916, and find that 96 per cent of them drink intoxicating liquors and 90 per cent are cigarette users. I know these figures to be correct, and I am sure that it is an easy matter to decide what liquor will do for a man.

From Jefferson County, in the northeast section of the State, the sheriff, Mr. E. W. O'Brien, of Oskaloosa, states:

The consumption of intoxicating liquors in this county is not more than 10 to 15 per cent of what it was before prohibition. * * * It is nearly impossible for a respectable looking person to buy a drink of liquor within the county. During the past two years the jail has been vacant 704 days, over one-fourth of the time.

From Jewell County, in the northwest section of the State, the county attorney, Hon. C. Clyde Myers, states:

I would rather cut off my head than to go back on the things given us by the people in the eighties, which have been a great help and blessing to us. I am for national prohibition first, last, and for all time.

From Kearney County, Mr. B. L. Hart, of Lakin, county attorney, states:

Prohibition in Kansas has been a great success.

From Kingman County, the mayor of Kingman, Hon. Clyde Murphy, states:

Whatever failure might be charged to the law in this State is chargeable to the attitude of the National Government. * * * At this time we have the most in our city jail that there has been at any one time in three years. We have three there. Two for New Year's drunks and one for bootlegging. I presume that this will compare favorably even now with cities of this size in other States having the saloons. We have a population of about 3,000.

From Labette County, in the southeast section, Mr. T. A. Murry, chief of police of Parsons, states:

Prohibition in Kansas is a great success. * * * Prohibition has lessened drunkenness and crime and has resulted economically as well as morally advantageously to our people.

The mayor of the city of Chetopa, in the same county, Hon. Sigmund Lehman, states:

I came to Chetopa shortly after Kansas became a prohibition State, and I am convinced that prohibition is the proper method of reducing crimes, and also aids very materially in providing better homes and better families. And I am not classed among the strict prohibition people, either, although I am now serving my tenth year as mayor of this prohibition city, and I believe absolutely in the enforcement of the law."

From Leavenworth County, the city attorney of the city of Leavenworth, Hon. C. P. Rutherford, states:

I desire to say emphatically that prohibition in Kansas has not been a failure. * * * Notwithstanding all of the difficulties of enforcement, I am confident that there is not on the statute books of the State another law or dozen laws which have and will continue to have such beneficial results to our people both economically and morally as the prohibitory liquor laws. The sentiment in favor of prohibition is growing stronger all the time. The drunkard is a disgrace and the rum seller is an outlaw in Kansas.

The mayor of the city of Tonganoxie, in the same county, Hon. J. H. Dreisbach, states:

I think I can say that we have none or very little drunkenness in our town now. We are too near Kansas City, Mo., to do away with all drinking, but I know that there is far less drinking than if we had saloons. We certainly would not go back to the wide-open saloon.

From Lincoln County, Judge C. H. Berry, police judge of the city of Lincoln, states:

Prohibition has prohibited in this city for the last 15 years.

From Linn County, the county attorney, Harry W. Fisher, of Mound City, states:

During the holidays just passed, in an entire county of over 15,000 inhabitants, only two cases of drunkenness were reported. * * * A drunk is so scarce as to be a curiosity; half the youth of Linn County never having seen a drunken man and few, indeed, who ever saw a drunken woman.

The mayor, Hon. Samuel Tucker, of the city of Pleasanton, a town of 1,500 people, in the same county, states:

We have not had occasion to cause the arrest of a single individual in nine months. We have had three convictions in nearly two years, and two of these were for packing whisky in from Missouri and one was drunkenness.

From Lyon County, Judge John H. J. Rice, police judge of the city of Emporia, states:

In looking over the police-court docket for the month of December, 1916, and including both holidays, I find that there were only four cases of drunkenness coming into the police court. * * * My experience of 11 years flatly contradicts the claim made by the enemies of prohibition that it is a failure.

From Marion County, the mayor of Hillsboro, Hon. H. Brunig, states:

Kansas is greatly benefited by prohibition; its failure exists only in the written pamphlets of its opponents. Resubmission in Kansas would only increase its dry vote.

From Marshall County, the mayor of Blue Rapids, Hon. A. R. Dean, states:

We feel thankful we have no saloons in Kansas.

From Meade County, in the western section of the State, the county attorney, Hon. Frank S. Sullivan, states:

Prohibition does prohibit, and anyone making statements to the contrary shows either woeful ignorance or willful desire to mislead.

From Miami County, the sheriff, Mr. M. E. Stevenson, at Paola, writes:

I have seen more drunkards in Kansas City, Mo., in one day than in Kansas in my entire term of office of a little over two years. * * * The prohibition law is enforced in this county as well as in other counties of this State that have come under my observation. The people as well as the officers of the law and the courts insist upon enforcing this law.

From Mitchell County, city attorney of Beloit, a city of about 4,000, Hon. A. E. Jordan states:

During the past 25 years we have had but one murder case in this county.

For several terms of our district court we have had no criminal cases whatever. The present bar docket shows not a single criminal case.

We scarcely average two cases a month in our police court, and some years have not averaged more than one a month.

We have held public meetings, such as barbecues and the like, here in this town in which there were over 10,000 in attendance without having a single police court or a county criminal court case arising therefrom or in connection therewith.

Our pauper list is almost nothing.

The sheriff of Mitchell County, Mr. John W. Hayes, of Beloit, states:

Prohibitory law is a good law, but needs the cooperation of the Federal Government. I really believe a nation-wide prohibitory law would be the best remedy.

From Montgomery County Hon. Milton Cook, mayor of the city of Cherryvale, writes:

Prohibition in Kansas is not a failure; it certainly has lessened crime, uplifted morals, our people have lived better, dressed better, which fact I attribute to prohibition law. Kansas has demonstrated the fact that liquor is a menace to everything that is good, upright, and honest, and that people can get along without liquor. I know that in our city our people would vote 9 to 1 in favor of national prohibition.

Judge Revilo Newton, police judge of the city of Cherryvale, states:

Individually I have not seen a drunken person on our streets for two years.

Hon. T. C. Hansen, mayor of the city of Caney, Montgomery County, states:

National prohibition is the next forward step we of Kansas expect to see along this line. And may its coming be hastened by the action of Congress.

From Morton County, the extreme southwest county, Mr. James C. Fullenwider, of Richfield, sheriff, states:

I am heartily in favor of national prohibition. Let's get national prohibition in four years from now—in 1920.

From McPherson County Judge Allen Wilber, police judge of the city of Lindsborg, states:

I have taken the trouble to look at my docket for the past seven years, from January 1, 1910, to January 1, 1917, and I find that I have heard 86 cases, of which 47 were for drunkenness. Our population has ranged from 2,000 to 2,200 during this time. I will venture to say that I believe that one saloon in Lindsborg in three months' time would have brought more business to the police court than I have had in seven years.

From Nemaha County, the county in which I first settled in Kansas, the county attorney, Hon. Horace M. Baldwin, at Seneca, states:

The best argument for the success of the prohibitory law in Kansas is that the sentiment of the State is overwhelmingly in its favor. * * * I suggest that it would be a very pertinent inquiry for you to make of the opponents of prohibition, whether or not they could cite you to any other law which they claimed to have been a failure and yet which grew in popular favor as the years went by.

Judge J. L. Musgrove, police judge of the city of Sabetha, Nemaha County, states:

I will give you my experience as police judge, which office I have filled since May, 1914. During this time I have tried 21 liquor cases in my court. However, of this number one man was tried 4 times, and two others 3 times apiece, reducing the number of persons before me to 14 for violation of the liquor laws.

Hon. A. S. Ross, mayor of the city of Sabetha, Nemaha County, states:

I will say that in our city we are strictly enforcing the prohibitory law and we have very little drunkenness, and as a consequence our police court has very little or nothing to do.

From Neosho County, the county attorney, Mr. R. B. Smith, of Erie, states:

I know that the prohibitory liquor law in Kansas lessens the sale and use of intoxicating liquor and lessens many other classes of crimes, such as immoral conduct, assaults, murders, burglary, larceny, and highway robbery, for these are several of the classes of cases that intoxicated men or men craving intoxicating liquor are most likely to commit.

From Ness County, Hon. Albert S. Foulks, judge of the thirty-third judicial district, of Ness City, containing nine counties, states:

So far as my experience of prohibition goes, whisky selling has been driven out of this State, except in case of transient bootleggers. I do not believe there is a single place in my district where liquor is kept for sale, and it is a rare thing to see an intoxicated person in any of the nine counties to which my duties call me.

Mr. A. W. Wilson, the county attorney of Ness County, of Ness City, states:

In the 10 years that I have been prosecuting in Ness County, Kans., there has not been a saloon or a joint operating. There has been occasional bootlegging, which has been easily suppressed as soon as known.

Hon. L. H. Wilder, of Norton, county attorney of Norton County, states:

Prohibition seems to have taken up its permanent abode in the country, and all would do well to recognize this fact and to govern themselves accordingly.

From Osage County, Hon. Ben Heilbrun, mayor of Osage City, states:

I would say conditions compared to open saloons is 99 per cent in favor of Kansas. I am no prohibitionist and not hysterical on the question, yet must say prohibition in Kansas looks good to me.

Hon. B. F. Chilcott, mayor of Osborne, Osborne County, states:

It seems almost foolish for men to talk any more that prohibition does not prohibit. It does prohibit in Kansas and always will.

From Hon. George W. Finney, of Larned, county attorney, Pawnee County, states:

You know and I know and every man who has the sense of a last year's bird's nest knows now and have known for years past that prohibition in Kansas is a success.

Mr. C. M. Mills, of Phillipsburg, county attorney of Phillips County, states:

I feel positive that the prohibition law is a success, and we have many young folks who do not know what a saloon is as they never saw one. We have a few drunks, but I tell you they take to the woods quite rapidly, or their friends take them there.

Hon. Floyd Funnell, mayor of Wamego, Pottawatomie County, states:

You will find that prohibition in this locality is a real success. We do not have 1 drunk now where we had 30 then. Our police court is nearly out of business. We have not had an arrest for over three months.

From Reno County, Hon. F. F. Prigg, judge district court at Hutchinson, states:

I have not seen a drunken man in Kansas for so many years that I have not any recollection of when I did see one. All of this talk about prohibition not being effective in Kansas is simply nonsense and not worthy of very much consideration.

From Republic County, the sheriff, Mr. A. T. Huntington, of Belleville, states:

We have a city of about 2,300. I do not believe that there has been a drunk in the city jail for six months. * * * Prohibition in Kansas is a success.

From Rice County, Judge J. C. Antrobus, police judge of the city of Sterling, states:

I have been police judge in this town two years and only six men have been brought into court for being drunk. This is a town of 2,500.

The county attorney of Rice County, at Lyons, Hon. H. C. Crandall, states:

It is folly to argue against the question of national prohibition. All farseeing men can see the necessity of such a law, and it is only a question of time until national prohibition will actually be here. Kansas has found prohibition a success, as have other States which have tried it.

From Riley County, the sheriff, Mr. C. E. Schermerhorn, of Manhattan, states:

Prohibition in Kansas is a decided success.

Judge Alfred S. Porter, police judge of the city of Manhattan, states:

I am more than proud of the fact that I reside in a dry State and only hope that soon it may be Nation wide.

From Rush County, the county attorney, Hon. Frank U. Russell, at La Crosse, writes:

Let's dissolve the partnership between Uncle Sam and booze. It is a disgraceful alliance.

From Russell County, Hon. J. C. Ruppenthal, of Russell, judge of the twenty-third judicial district, comprising six western counties, states:

This judicial district is an average district of the rural parts of Kansas. Ten years ago there were considerable prosecutions for the violation of the liquor law, and these have grown steadily fewer and fewer until a liquor prosecution is rather rare in any county of the district, and at the same time joints are unknown and bootleggers are scarce. Hardly anyone any longer defends or excuses the violators of this law or upholds the regular use of liquor for beverage purposes. * * * In no department of business—financial, social, educational, or other activity—is there any disposition on part of anyone to curry favor with the liquor interests, but instead all are united against it.

From Sedgwick County, in which is located Wichita, the second largest city in the State, Hon. Thornton W. Sargent, district judge, states:

Take the State as a whole, my observation is that there is not one-tenth of the drunkenness in Kansas that there is in the wide-open States. Over 90 per cent of the children of Kansas has never seen a saloon; a large majority of the children do not know what a saloon means except from hearsay.

Hon. Thomas C. Wilson, district judge at Wichita, in the same county, states:

Prohibition in Kansas is a great success. In the thickly populated centers the law is violated more or less, and until we have national prohibition it will be impossible to absolutely prevent the sale of intoxicating liquor. * * * It is a rare exception to see a drunken man on the streets, and the benefits of prohibition to the rising generation are inestimable.

The mayor of Wichita, Hon. O. H. Bentley, states:

In my judgment the solution of the problem is national prohibition.

From Saline County, the county attorney, Hon. L. W. Hamner, of Salina, states:

There is no question, nor can there be any successful controversy over the fact that prohibition does prohibit. In our own community here we have practically no drunkenness. Crime of every nature has decreased since the enforcement of the prohibitory law, conservatively, 50 per cent.

From Shawnee County, in which is located the city of Topeka, the county attorney, Hon. W. E. Atchison, states:

We have no saloons in Topeka and no joints. A few bootleggers remain, but they are being so constantly hounded and prosecuted by the officers that their business is exceedingly small. There is less drunkenness in the cities of Kansas than in any other cities of which I have any knowledge.

Hon. George H. Whitcomb, judge of the district court at Topeka, states:

There are, in my judgment, no evil effects resulting from the prohibitory law, but, on the contrary, the results have been entirely in the way of the promotion of sobriety and law observance and the saving of money for increased expenditures for the betterment of schools and homes and generally for what goes to make life more worth while.

From Scott County, the county attorney, Mr. H. A. Russell, of Scott City, states:

Prohibition prohibits in Scott County. There is no liquor used in this county except what is privately shipped in from Kansas City, Mo. There are no sales and there are no drunks. * * * Prohibition prohibts in western Kansas, the wet advocates to the contrary notwithstanding.

From Sherman County, Hon. George Kelly, mayor of the city of Goodland, states:

I think we are at least 90 per cent better off than we were before, as we practically have no poor people any more; the people in general all pay their debts better, hold their jobs better, and it is a very rare thing to see a person under the influence of liquor. While I am not a strict prohibitionist myself, I am sure against the saloons, for I know we are much better off without them.

The county attorney of Sherman County, Mr. Elmer E. Euwer, of Goodland, states:

I am only a young man, but I believe I can say with authority that prohibition is not a failure in our State. I was born and raised in Topeka, Kans, having lived there 25 years, and I was 20 years of age before I ever saw the outside door of a saloon, and then I had to go to Kansas City, Mo., to see that. I can further say that I have never seen the inside of a saloon, nor have I ever touched a drop of liquor in any shape or form, and I owe the fact that I can make that statement to prohibition in our State.

From Sumner County, the mayor of the city of Caldwell, one of the principal border cities, Hon. I. M. Horton, states:

My conclusions regarding prohibition formed from a long observation of its workings are that prohibition does prohibit in spite of the fact of the liquor interests arguments to the contrary. * * * Previous to the enforcement of prohibition the police court fines ran into hundreds of dollars per month, while for the whole of last year (1916) the total fines collected for all misdemeanors was $94.

From Washington County, the sheriff, Mr. D. W. McLeod, of Washington, states:

I can say that prohibition in this county is a success as far as I know in regard to the duties of this office, and I am safe to say that when Nebraska's dry law takes effect that the duties of my brother officers along the State line will be somewhat lessened.

From Wilson County, the mayor of the city of Fredonia, Hon. J. W. Moss, states:

I am a native of Missouri but have lived in Kansas for over 36 years, and anyone who says that prohibition in Kansas is a failure misrepresents the facts. There is not as much misery and crime caused by drunkenness in the entire State of Kansas as there is in one of the larger cities of Missouri. We have a few cases of chronic drunkenness and a small amount of bootlegging, but taken altogether it is not a drop in the bucket as compared with States where the open saloon is allowed.

The police judge of the city of Fredonia, Mr. P. H. Mattheus, states:

The effects of prohibition is plainly apparent on every hand, to every unbiased observer making more happy homes, a better and cleaner citizenship.

From Woodson County the mayor of Yates Center, the county seat, Hon. L. R. Wallace, after reviewing the situation, states:

This leads me to the firm belief that our Nation ought to be a dry Nation, and I believe the greatest piece of legislation our Congress could pass would be the submission of an amendment for prohibition.

From Wyandotte County, my home county, in the city of Kansas City, which is practically a part of the great city there, nearly one-third of the population being on the Kansas side, the judge of the district court, Hon. W. H. McCamish, writes:

If Missouri, or Jackson County even, were dry, it would leave us with no problem to contend with along these lines.

The sheriff of the same county, Mr. R. L. Hinch, of Kansas City, Kans., states:

There was a time in Kansas when prohibition did not prohibit, but the day is gone, never to return. Whisky has been the downfall of millions of good people. The saloons were closed in Kansas City, Kans., about 10 years ago. Kansas City, Kans., has prospered ever since; business rents commenced to increase when the saloons were closed here. There are no vacant business houses in Kansas City, Kans., and has not been since the saloons were closed, excepting some building that was erected in the resident district by brewery companies for the purpose of selling liquor in. At this time most of them are occupied.

So I could go on all through these letters, but I have already shown from every section of the State the same unanimity of opinion.

The letters arranged alphabetically by counties, which have not been read in full, are as follows:

ALLEN COUNTY.

IOLA, KANS., January 4, 1917.

Hon. WILLIAM H. THOMPSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE AND DEAR SIR: In reply to your favor of December 30, 1916, regarding the prohibition regulating the sale and manufacture of intoxicating liquor in Kansas, will say that I have been a citizen of Kansas all my life (having been born here), and have been all over the State and have had a good opportunity to note the effect of the liquor traffic in and under both conditions. For the past seven years I have been patrolman of the city police department, the last three years chief of the department, and in this locality we, as elsewhere in our State, can not prevent the importation of liquor. We do prohibit its sale, and if those whose duty it is to enforce the laws will do so it can be eliminated from any community. I firmly believe that the prohibition law in Kansas has been the main cause in reducing crime, poverty, sickness, and distress from 75 to 90 per cent as compared to former conditions.

Yours, very truly, THOMAS I. CHRISTY,
Chief of Police.

IOLA, KANS., January 4, 1917.

Hon. WILLIAM H. THOMPSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: In reply to yours of December 30, 1916, regarding prohibition in Kansas, will state that the writer has resided in Kansas 27 years, and has, of course, seen a few persons under the influence of liquor. My belief is that prohibition does not, nor will it ever, prohibit the importation of intoxicants so long as our Government permits its manufacture and States permit the traffic. While the above statements are true, the fact remains that prohibition in Kansas has eliminated at least 90 per cent of drunkenness, crime, and poverty since its adoption. When you learn that 50 per cent of our jails and poorhouses have no inmates, and compare this record with the States that permit the sale of intoxicants, it will be very easy to conclude that the reason is the cause of John Barleycorn in one State and the freedom from it in the other.

Trusting that this may be of some use to you in your efforts toward forwarding the cause of national prohibition, which I am certain will meet the approval of all good Kansans, I remain,

Yours, for national prohibition,

J. J. VARNER, Mayor.

ANDERSON COUNTY.

GARNETT, KANS., January 6, 1917.

Hon. WM. H. THOMPSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Replying to your favor of the 2d instant in regard to prohibition in this part of Kansas, I beg to say that there have been but two cases of drunkenness in the police court of this city in the past two years and but few cases of bootlegging in justice court during the same period; and in my opinion, the prohibitory law is not violated any more than other State laws, and there is no doubt in my mind that prohibition does lessen drunkenness in Kansas.

You have my consent to use this in the Senate for what it is worth, if you wish.

Sincerely, yours, J. E. CALVERT,
Police Judge and Justice of the Peace.

GARNETT, KANS., January 5, 1917.

Hon. WILLIAM H. THOMPSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In regard to prohibition in Kansas, will say that it certainly is one of the things that is pushing Kansas to the front. We have less crime, less insanity; and I am in favor of national prohibition and hope to live long enough to help put the United States on the dry list. Kansas has less crime than any wet State in the United States. Hoping you will be successful in your work; and can say that 75 per cent of Kansas people are with you.

Respectfully, B. F. ACUFF, Mayor.

ATCHISON COUNTY.

ATCHISON, KANS., January 6, 1917.

Mr. WILLIAM H. THOMPSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your esteemed favor of December 30, would say the present city administration is fairly successful in enforcing prohibition, there being only one retail liquor license in the city and that being held by a wholesale drug firm.

Of course, it is rather hard to prevent the delivery of liquor and bootlegging by the East Atchison saloon keepers and liquor dealers. East Atchison, as you have probably heard, is known as the wettest spot in Missouri and is a disgrace to that great State.

This city and suburbs have a population of about 20,000 people. Last month there were 40 arrests by the police department and $128 fines collected in the police court. Probably one-half of these arrests were drunken persons who came from East Atchison. The other arrests were for petty stealing, violating traffic rules, etc. Were it not for the conditions in East Atchison our police force would have very little to do.

The present city administration of Atchison is very much in favor of national prohibition, and you are authorized to use this letter in the Senate if, in your judgment, it would help to accomplish something along this line. Thanking you for your interest in this matter and hoping this Nation will soon follow the example of Kansas, I am,

Yours, truly,

ATCHISON, KANS., January 3, 1917.

Hon. W. H. THOMPSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Yours of December 30, asking me, as prosecuting attorney of Atchison County, Kans., to give you the result of my observations as to the effect of the prohibitory law in lessening drunkenness and crime and the effect morally and economically to our people, received.

I have acted as county attorney of Atchison County for four years, during which time my opportunity to observe the effect of prohibition in Atchison County (which is a border county of the State) has placed me in a position to judge of its workings among our people, and it is my unqualified opinion that prohibition has been and is resulting in less drunkenness, less crime, and in a higher standard of morality among our people, and my opinion in the matter is being reflected by thousands of others in Atchison County, some of whom have heretofore been strongly opposed to the prohibitory law.

I venture to say that should Atchison County be asked to vote upon the question of prohibition, or resubmission of the question, that three-fourths of the votes of the people of Atchison County would be cast in favor of the law.

So well satisfied are the people with the results of prohibition thus far that the question ceases to be any longer an open question for discussion

I hope that you will use your great influence in the Senate to bring about national prohibition.

Yours, truly,

CHAS. J. CONLON,
County Attorney of Atchison County, Kans.

BARBER COUNTY.

MEDICINE LODGE, KANS., January 6, 1917.

Hon. WILLIAM H. THOMPSON,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: Your inquiry of the 3d instant at hand. In answer to same, will say that there is no question but what prohibition in Kansas prohibits. Ninety per cent of those who are arrested for being drunk are of the old stock, men who have drunk all of their lives, and were brought up in States where there were open saloons or in Kansas before the law was enforced. The man who gets it now has to send off and get it, and that fact becomes of public record, and this deters him in the use, as it affects his standing and business, credit, etc. The bootlegger usually sells it to those old topers, but hardly ever to the young man, because he runs greater chances of being caught. The bootlegger is usually soon caught, and spends most of his time either in jail or in the penitentiary.

The person who contends that prohibition in Kansas does not prohibit does not know either the conditions in Kansas now or what they were in the past. There are fewer paupers and more families who own their homes. Men and women go better dressed. They give better service to their employer; hence every line of business meets with better success under prohibition.

This is my judgment, based upon observation and actual experience as a lawyer and mayor of this city, where I have lived for 31 years.

Very truly, yours,

SAMUEL GRIFFIN,
County Attorney.

MEDICINE LODGE, KANS., January 6, 1917.

Hon. W. H. THOMPSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Yours of the 2d instant, addressed to the police judge of this city, came to hand this morning, and your humble servant has held that extra responsible position since April, 1911, and since that time there has been on the docket 183 cases filed, of which 79 have been for drunkenness, of which 10 have been against the same men, 6 against another, and 5 against the third, making a total of 21 cases against three men. These men all have ordered their liquor directly from Kansas City, Mo., not only by their own statements, but corroborated by the records in the county clerk's office. This is done under the protection of the Federal Government by virtue of the interstate-commerce act. During the same time there were 47 cases for disturbing the peace, and a few of these were the direct result of liquor.

I will here state that the Hon. Samuel Griffin, mayor of this city, and acting as city attorney, investigated each case as it came up, and we found in most of the cases the liquor had been shipped in by the defendants themselves—or at least they so claimed—which makes it hard to catch the professional bootlegger. That we have them there is no doubt, as was revealed in a case of a man who got on train at Lake City to come to Medicine Lodge. He was sober when he left Lake City, and ere he arrived at Medicine Lodge he was too drunk to walk. And we found out from him a gang worked out from Kiowa who bought their liquor and had it shipped to a town in Harper County—go there in an auto and get it, then work out on trains from Kiowa. One made the trip through here to Belvidere and returned to Kiowa on same train, reaching Kiowa at 1 o'clock p. m., and another was ready to go out the next morning. The reason they ship to Harper County station was to avoid the filing with the county clerk a statement by the freight or express agent in this county as required by statute law.

Taking into consideration that at all times in the past six years Barber County has had a population ranging from 8,500 to 10,100 people, and this city from 1,400 to 1,500, it shows that there is not a bad case here, as some would make out. An incident occurred here a few years ago. My father-in-law came from Alva, Okla., to visit us. He was here two weeks. One day he said to me: "I have seen more drunkenness in Medicine Lodge in two weeks than I ever saw in Alva, with open saloons." I asked him how many he had seen drunk in town. He told me he had seen six. I said, "All right." And about two months after I went to Alva. Riding around the square, I pointed out to him 17 drunks. He looked up at me and said: "Mac, I never saw as many drunks in Alva before." I asked him, "Is it not because you have open saloons? You are so used to seeing drunken men that you do not notice or pay attention to it." He replied, "Mac, that is just it. When we go to Kansas we look for and note every one, but we are so used to it down here we do not pay any attention to them." And he added, "I guess a fellow can generally find what he is looking for, but you beat me in the find."

I do not want you nor Congress to think I claim that the prohibition laws of the State of Kansas prohibit the sale of liquor in Kansas any more than the laws of other States prohibit murder, adultery, perjury, or grand or petty larceny. And while the Federal Government defends and upholds the shipment of liquor into prohibition territory the lawmakers themselves are as morally responsible for the crimes committed as the distiller and the saloon keeper or the wholesale liquor dealer is my candid opinion, and, at your request you can use this in any way you may see fit, and if I can do anything more to aid you in this fight, command me and I'll be there.

I worked with J. K. Cuddingan trying to make this country dry; and what little I can do I will do, yet not for the grown men of 35 or over, but for the young men and women and the boys and girls—the coming bulwark of the Nation.

Yours, truly,

W. H. MCCAYNE,
Police Judge at the city of Medicine Lodge, Kans.

BARTON COUNTY.

GREAT BEND, KANS., January 6, 1917.

Hon. WILLIAM H. THOMPSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I have your letter of the 30th ultimo, and carefully noted, and am pleased to know that you are standing up for Kansas and for prohibition.

What appears to be a question in some quarters as to whether or not prohibition is a failure or actually prohibits and thereby lessens drunkenness and crime and results to the moral and economical advantage of the people is no longer a question in Kansas. I have had a number of years' experience as an enforcing officer and have no hesitation in saying as a result of that experience and from my observation generally throughout Kansas as compared with the handling of the liquor question in other States that prohibition is by all means the best method of handling this evil.

With the adoption of friendly legislation on the part of the Federal Government, cooperating with the State rather than handicapping the State, as has heretofore been the apparent policy of the Federal Government, it can be made still more effective. One step along this line would be to deny the use of the mails to liquor advertisements; another would be to cease issuing bootleggers' licenses in prohibition States.

With best wishes to you in your efforts along this line of work, I am,

Very truly, yours,

O. W. DAWSON, Mayor.

STATE OF KANSAS,
TWENTIETH JUDICIAL DISTRICT,
Great Bend, January 4, 1917.

Hon. WILLIAM H. THOMPSON,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I am in receipt of your esteemed favor of the 30th ultimo and hasten to give you the benefit of my conclusions relative to the practical operation of the prohibitory liquor law of Kansas. I have lived in this State since 1884, coming here soon after the adoption of the prohibitory amendment, and have had ample opportunity to observe its operations.

When I came to Great Bend there were in full operation several places where intoxicating liquors were being sold openly, and a prosecution for a violation of the law was rare, and a conviction under such prosecution still more so. The impression seemed to obtain in Great Bend that if these places were closed the town would lose materially in its trade and business operations. This was a conviction that was honestly entertained by myself and a majority of the citizens of the city and county, else the condition could not have existed. As time passed sentiment in favor of the law grew and crystallized until about 15 years ago the saloon and joint were compelled to go. Up to that time drunkenness on our public streets was a common sight, and the court calendar was full of prosecutions for all manner of criminal offenses; so much so that the time of the court was largely consumed by the trial of the criminal calendar. When the open joint or saloon was doomed, we were happily surprised with the result. Not only did our business interests advance and improve, but our city began to grow as never before, and since that time drunkenness upon our streets is a rare thing indeed. Crime has diminished until at this time, if we have a criminal calendar at all at the beginning of our term of court, six to eight cases are the most we have, and not 1 per cent of them are liquor cases, neither do they grow out of the use of intoxicating liquors. As a result of all this there is no consideration that could induce the people of this State to return to the old system.

If a law could be devised which would inhibit the shipping of liquors into dry territory and the solicitation of wholesale liquor dealers were barred from the mails entering dry territory the liquor question would be practically solved in this State.

* * * You can accomplish no greater good for your constituency than to secure the passage of your bill prohibiting the shipment of intoxicating liquors into dry territory; and if you could carry the measure a little further and bar all liquor advertisements from the mails entering dry territory you will have accomplished something for which the people of Kansas will never be able to repay you. I sincerely wish every success to your entire efforts along this line.

Cordially, yours,

D. A. BANTA,
Judge, Twentieth Judicial District of Kansas.

BOURBON COUNTY.

FORT SCOTT, KANS., January 3, 1917.

Mr. WILLIAM H. THOMPSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Answering your favor of December 30, have to say that prohibition in Kansas is a success in every possible way, and any person who says that it is not a great benefit to the State is either misinformed or willfully falsifying, and the same is true of any person who says that prohibition has injured the State in any possible way.

Yours, respectfully,

JAMES G. SHEPPARD,
County Attorney.

OFFICE OF SHERIFF OF BOURBON COUNTY,
Fort Scott, Kans., January 4, 1917.

Senator W. H. THOMPSON,
Washington, D. C.:

Your letter in regard to whether prohibition in Kansas is a failure, will say that I have been in the sheriff's office at Fort Scott six years and will say that every year liquor is fast going in Bourbon County, Kans. You never see a young man drunk in Bourbon County. It is some old fellow that got the habit during saloon days that is drunk. As soon as these old fellows die there is going to be a marked change in the number of drunkards. Since the saloons have closed in Nevada and Rich Hill, Mo., our sister State, we have but little trouble with bootlegging. Crime grows less every year in Bourbon County, Kans., on account of whisky being harder to get.

Yours, respectfully,

J. W. HARTMAN, Sheriff.

BROWN COUNTY.

HIAWATHA, KANS., January 9, 1917.

Hon. WILLIAM H. THOMPSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: In reply to your letter of recent date in regard to the prohibitory law, will say: The law prohibits absolutely here in Hiawatha, Kans. During the past year there have been 27 arrests for drunkenness; 26 of these were persons returning from across the line in Missouri or Nebraska. The only liquor they brought home with them was in their stomachs. These parties were promptly arrested and placed in jail. One arrest was for drunkenness or sickness from taking too much Hostetter's bitters. "Bootlegging" is unknown here in Hiawatha and has been for several years. In September a circus visited our city, and on that day over 20,000 people were in town. Not a single case of drunkenness was reported to the police, and we have not heard that a single drunken person was seen. The prosperity of our city is beyond anything ever known here. Thirty thousand dollars worth of city 4 per cent bonds sold last month for a premium and that to local purchasers.

The prohibitory law is enforced here and it prohibits.

Yours, truly,

GEO. C. MCKNIGHT, Mayor.

HIAWATHA, KANS., January 4, 1917.

Senator WILLIAM H. THOMPSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I want to say that prohibition in Kansas is a grand success, the prohibition law of the State of Kansas actually prohibits, and we absolutely have less drunkenness and crime than our sister States Nebraska and Missouri. I know whereof I speak, as I am in a position to see and learn. Kansas has been troubled some by having two wet boundaries—Nebraska and Missouri—but, thank the good people of Nebraska, they blowed up the wet element last election, which will make us three dry boundaries, with Missouri going dry slowly but surely. I am for nation-wide prohibition, and I am thankful that Kansas has as grand and good a Senator that has the backbone to fight the everlasting curse, liquor.

Yours, respectfully,

C. W. BIDDLE,
Sheriff of Brown County.

HIAWATHA, KANS., January 18, 1917.

Hon. W. H. THOMPSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: With reference to the prohibitory liquor law in Kansas, you can say for me as county attorney and having seven years of experience as a prosecuting officer that the prohibition laws of Kansas are not a failure, but do prohibit. That the moral and economical advantages that come to us from the wholesome effect of this law can not be overestimated. Kansas would no more think of giving up its prohibitory liquor law than it would its public school system or the right of the people to worship God according to the dictates of their own conscience.

Brown County, you know, is a border county, 40 miles from Missouri, and 19 miles from Nebraska, both wet States and the chief source of whatever trouble we have in enforcing the law. Nebraska is already dry and Missouri will come next, and when the liquor dealers and bootleggers are driven out of these States, there will be little or no trouble in enforcing the liquor law in Brown County.

I will be pleased to give you any information that you desire, and I can cite you to many specific instances of my own experience and observation which evidence the wholesome effect of the prohibitory liquor laws of Kansas. The United States Supreme Court has just recently given the prohibitory liquor laws a great boost, and for which Kansas is extremely thankful.

Yours, very truly,

W. E. ARCHER,
County Attorney.

HORTON, KANS., January 6, 1917.

Hon. WM. H. THOMPSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR FRIEND: Your letter of date, December 30, 1916, at hand and contents noted. In reply will say I am now serving my third term as mayor of the city of Horton and have been a resident of the city for about thirty years. And I want to say prohibition is not a failure in Kansas, but a grand success. As you know Horton has a population of about 4,500, and is a railroad shop town, and I can truthfully say it is seldom one sees a drunken man on the streets, and that is usually some one that comes in on a train from some point in Missouri. There is but very little crime committed in our city, and I don't think we average three arrests per month, and our city jail is empty most of the time. Horton is made up of happy homes, and instead of the laborer's money being spent for booze it is spent for the benefit of his family.

We, the people of Kansas, surely approve of your stand on this question. Wishing you success in your fight, and best wishes for yourself and family, I remain,

Yours truly,

J. F. BAILEY, Mayor.

BUTLER COUNTY.

CITY CLERK'S OFFICE,
El Dorado, Kans., January 4, 1917.

Senator WILLIAM H. THOMPSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Your letter of recent date relating to the efficacy of the prohibition law in suppressing lawlessness and crime in Kansas at hand and noted.

I feel that El Dorado and Butler County is in a position at the present time to most thoroughly test the efficiency both of the law and of the law-enforcement officers, in that by reason of the recent discovery of large oil deposits we have gathered within our county boundaries within the last year somewhere between 10,000 and 15,000 transient population, including oil-field workers, from all parts of the United States.

I feel that I am able to say with authority that were it not for the fact that we have in effect a thoroughly dependable liquor law, prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors in this State, it would be difficult, indeed, to maintain order. As it is, however, even under these apparently adverse conditions, the authorities are enabled to maintain the usual good order with comparative ease.

Hoping this brief statement of fact may be of use to you, I am

Very sincerely, yours,

G. W. STINSON,
Mayor El Dorado City, Butler County, Kans.

CHAUTAUQUA COUNTY.

SEDAN, KANS., January 5, 1916.

Senator WILLIAM H. THOMPSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The city of Sedan, Kans., has a bonded indebtedness of but $21,000. It is a third-class city that pays cash for its running expenses. It has no outstanding warrants. We have little drunkenness. If you will give us a law making it necessary for those that hold a Government license to sell intoxicating liquors to come out in the open, or better still, have the Government refuse to license them to sell it, we will make a State law making the point of delivery the point or place of sale, and then we will be able to enforce the law with little or no effort. This administration and the people of Sedan stand for the enforcement of the prohibitory law. The law prohibits and it is as thoroughly prohibitory of this offense as of other offenses. There is absolutely no sentiment in this community for the repeal of the law. We are here on the ground and we know, and the sentiment here stands squarely for the prohibitory law.

Respectfully, yours,

NORMAN L. HAY, Mayor.

CHEROKEE COUNTY.

JUDICIAL DEPARTMENT, STATE OF KANSAS,
Columbus, Kans., January 13, 1917.

Senator WILLIAM H. THOMPSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I received your letter with reference to the prohibitory liquor law some time since and perhaps ought to have answered sooner, but, owing to the hurry of business in court and some other matters, I have overlooked the same until now.

In writing to me you possibly overlooked the fact that I reside in the center of the one section of the State that has gained the undesirable distinction of being known as the "Bad Lands," when spoken of in connection with this law, and the truth is we have had some trouble in the enforcement of that law in this part of the State. We have a population a very large per cent of which is miners and also a very large per cent of whom are of foreign birth. We are also situated immediately adjacent to the city of Joplin, Mo., a large mining center, with large brewing and distilling interests, but in spite of all these disadvantages it has been demonstrated abundantly that the law can be enforced in this district. And even situated in this locality, my oldest son was almost of age before he ever saw a saloon, and that was in Joplin, Mo., and while, as I said above, there are some violations of law in this district, the comparison of this district with those just across the line, where they have open saloons, will convince any fair-minded person beyond any question that the moral effect of the law upon a community is greatly to its advantage. And this is further evidenced by the fact that when petty criminals in this community, and especially those who persist in the violation of this law, are crowded a little too hard by the officers, they invariably go across the line, where they can find open saloons, and no community, however low, can be benefited by the addition of that class of people.

I have been directly connected in one way or another with the enforcement of this law at different times for a period of six years, and I know whereof I speak. I am heartily in sympathy with any effort you can make for national prohibition, and you have my sincere wishes that you may succeed, as we are in a community whose peculiar situation will be most benefited by that law.

With very best wishes for your success, I remain,

Very respectfully,

J. N. DUNBAR,
Judge Eleventh Judicial District.

OFFICE OF THE CLERK,
Columbus, Kans., January 12, 1917.

Hon. WILLIAM H. THOMPSON,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Your letter of the 30th ultimo, relative to "Does prohibition prohibit?" in Kansas. As an executive officer of the State I will say: Yes; the fault lies not with the law, but with its enforcement. Nine-tenths of all arrests made here in Columbus are drunks caused by our close proximity to the Missouri line; were we 100 or 150 miles from Missouri instead of 25 miles our city prison would be of no use.

The law is meritorious and only needs officers who will enforce it without fear or favor, and when this is done the law will accomplish what its framers intended it should do.

We are pleased to note that you are taking the correct stand on this great question, * * * and you may be assured that your action meets with our hearty approval. You may feel free to use this letter in the spirit in which it is written.

With best wishes, I beg to be remembered as

Yours, very truly,

A. L. REMALEY, Mayor.

SCAMMON, KANS., January 9, 1917.

Mr. W. H. THOMPSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In answer to your inquiry about whether prohibition in Kansas is a failure or actually prohibits, I should say it prohibits. But being so close to the State of Missouri here in our town it has made it difficult to handle, but for the last four years we have got pretty good control over the booze. As you know, Scammon is a mining town and has a great many foreigners, and they most all like their booze. Now, then, I will give you facts and figures. Scammon has a population of 2,364, and the actual cases in police court that came from drunks for the last four years would be about one a month, and all other crime is gradually growing less. Every year I have a chance to know, for I have been police judge the most part of the last 25 years, and also justice of the peace, and the booze and all other crime is getting less every year. I say let the good work go on, and I say the prohibition law in Kansas is not a failure.

Yours, truly,

J. J. WOOTEN,
Police Judge of the City of Scammon.

Hon. WILLIAM H. THOMPSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: In reply to your letter of December 30, 1916, relative to prohibition in Kansas, beg to advise that the writer is 35 years old and is a native Kansan and does not ever remember of seeing an open saloon in this State. While it is true that so long as intoxicating liquors are manufactured and allowed to be shipped into this State, there will be more or less of same consumed, however, I am sure there is less temptation for younger men to acquire the habit and also less drunkenness and crime on this account, as nearly all of these crimes and habits are formed before a man acquires maturity. What I would like to see is nation-wide prohibition, but until that can be accomplished I would like to see laws enacted so that intoxicating liquor can not be shipped into a State which has prohibition laws of its own.

You may use this letter as you see fit, and you have my hearty wishes for your success in your fight on the liquor proposition.

Yours, very truly,

M. M. SMITH, Mayor.

Senator WM. H. THOMPSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: Replying to your letter in regard to the prohibition question, beg to say unqualifiedly that prohibition is a mighty good thing for Kansas.

It is a success in our city and in our State, a success not only that it prohibits the sale of intoxicating liquor, but that it makes our city and State better in every way and a much more desirable place in which to live. And it is a success financially.

Our city, with a population of 2,300 people, has an assessed valuation of $2,000,000. We have two splendid national banks in which there is on deposit about $825,000. We have a magnificent Carnegie Library building; one of the finest purification and filtration waterworks plants to be found anywhere; a $40,000 sewer system; a beautiful white way; our city is splendidly lighted; we have three elegant parks; splendid churches, well attended; a $40,000 courthouse; a $35,000 high-school building; two good grade school buildings; we have no city prison and our county jail is an old stone building that dates way back to the early days. We have so little use for jails that our people have not deemed it necessary to build a modern jail of any kind.

Of course the prohibition law, like other laws, is violated at times; but it is enforced to such an extent that it ranks among the best-enforced laws in the State. There are no saloons, joints, or dives of any kind where liquor is sold; and a drunken man is seldom seen, even drinking is rare, and this occurs on liquor shipped in from other States.

The rate of taxation in our city, including county, school, and State tax, is $2 per $100, but this rate, which may seem rather high, is from improvements, for we have one of the nicest improved cities going.

Nothing could induce or influence our people to return to the saloon or the sale of intoxicating liquor in any manner. We are more than satisfied, and would not think of changing.

Yours, very truly,

S. D. WEAVER, Mayor.

Hon. W. H. THOMPSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Your letter of January 2 at hand, and will say by looking over the police records now and during the time joints were run here—that was several years ago—I believe the arrests for intoxication have been reduced about 90 per cent; other crimes accordingly. I have noticed also that when a man gets to drinking he first gets to fighting, and then if he does not fight he will steal. There is not a case for some time that I have tried for being intoxicated but what the whisky was procured from a traveling bootlegger, or in some instances shipped by express to a fictitious name here. It is a burning shame that we can't have a law passed prohibiting the express companies from bringing the whisky into the State. Better to pass a law prohibiting the manufacture of all intoxicants. There are families living here that get along very well on the wages the father or husband earn, but let the father or husband get liquor, he gets drunk, put in jail, loses his job, then applies to the city for necessaries of life. These same families are good citizens, or would be if they could not get the liquor. Liquor, thieving, fighting, and prostitution goes hand in hand, and my observation is get rid of the liquor and the others are more easily controlled.

Yours, respectfully,

F. HARBUE, Police Judge,

Senator WILLIAM H. THOMPSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: To answer your request for my personal experience as to the effect of prohibition in Kansas would require a more lengthy report than a busy Senator would care to consider.

No one will contend that Kansas prohibition prevents all drunkenness or crime as a result of drunkenness. But that drunkenness and crimes resulting therefrom are greatly reduced by reason of prohibition is so patent a fact that I know of no fair-minded and sane Kansan who would declare otherwise. The beneficial effect of Kansas prohibition will be inestimably furthered when we are assisted by national prohibition.

THE NATIONAL BANK OF PITTSBURG,
Pittsburg, Kans., January 4, 1917.

Mr. WILLIAM H. THOMPSON,
Chairman, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Your letter of the 30th ultimo received. In regard to the prohibition question in Kansas would say that it is a success in every way, if it was not for the State of Missouri, and one of the best laws ever passed by the people. Unfortunately we are situated close to the Missouri line, which is about 4½ miles, and situated on the Kansas and Missouri line on the Missouri side there are three wholesale houses, which retail more than they wholesale, and all the drunks seen in our city are from Missouri. Our car line also connects with Joplin, Mo., which is another outlet for drunkenness, and you can see them get off from the cars in a drunken condition, also with packages.

All of our liquor traffic is done by foreigners, and all of our raids show that the liquor is handled by foreigners and in their private houses. Hardly ever do we get an American for selling liquor, and the wholesale houses being so close gives us a good deal of trouble with bootleggers; so on the whole it does not prohibit on account of the State of Missouri. All of our arrests that are made the defendant will tell the court that he got the liquor in Missouri; and our city would be in much better condition on the liquor question if it had not been for the State of Missouri. Our police records will bear all of this out. The arrests we make all liquor is destroyed, and in an hour they are over in Missouri and back with a new stock. They go in automobiles.

Yours, truly,

WM. LANYON, Jr., Mayor.

OFFICE OF CITY CLERK,
Pittsburg, Kans., January 5, 1917.

Mr. WILLIAM H. THOMPSON,
Chairman, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Replying to your letter of the 30th ultimo, in regard to prohibition in Kansas, will say I do not consider it a failure and am satisfied that the people of Pittsburg would not go back to local option under any consideration.

Of course, we have violations, but most any law is violated. And situated as we are, 4½ miles from the Missouri line and an hour's ride from Joplin, Mo., it makes it doubly difficult for us. The wholesale houses being so close, it gives us a great deal of trouble with bootleggers. In most all of our arrests the defendants say they got the liquor from Missouri.

But, notwithstanding all this, our city is in a much better condition than it was 12 years ago. Then we had in the neighborhood of 28 saloons running open in our town, which then had a population of about 12,000. When the order was given to close the saloons in Pittsburg it was rumored that Pittsburg would go dead and that business houses that were vacated by the saloons would remain empty, but, on the contrary, as fast as the buildings were vacated by the saloons they were immediately occupied by some legal business. And to-day our city has a population of 20,000, with no saloons and not an empty business building in town, and we have never had a lull or panic in business.

On July 4, 1916, we had the largest crowd that ever attended a celebration in Pittsburg. Several extra peace officers were employed. During the day two arrests were made for drunkenness and peace disturbing. On July 4, 1900, there was an ordinary-sized celebration crowd in Pittsburg, with 24 saloons running open. There were nine arrests made that day for drunkenness and peace disturbing, our population at that time being about 11,000.

Therefore I feel that I am voicing the sentiment of the people of Pittsburg and the State of Kansas when I say that prohibition is morally and economically advantageous to our people.

Assuring you that your fight on this question meets with our approval, and hoping this information may be of some benefit to you, I remain,

Yours, truly,

ROLL RAKESTRAW,
Chief of Police.

PITTSBURG, KANS., January 19, 1917.

Hon. WILLIAM H. THOMPSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I have been out of the city a great deal lately, and for this reason, as well as the fact that the mayor, Mr. Lanyon, probably gave you more information than I can, I have not answered your letter concerning the effect of prohibition in Kansas.

We are too near the Missouri State line to feel the full benefit of prohibition, being only 4 miles away; but in my two years' experience as police judge of this city of 20,000 I have not had a single drunk tell me that he became intoxicated upon liquor bought in Kansas. They invariably get their liquor across the State line, and on account of this condition we are deprived of the real benefit of prohibition.

According to the police court records, I find that some few months under prohibition we have had more arrests for intoxication than were made under licensed-saloon months, but this is due to the fact that arrests are made now upon very small evidence of intoxication, for the reason that with us a man slightly under the influence of liquor is very noticeable, while in the day of the saloon the men now arrested and fined as drunks would have been and were considered as sober and not violators of the ordinance prohibiting excessive users of intoxicants to be upon the streets.

If I can be of further service to you, please command me. With kind personal regards, I am,

Sincerely yours,

LEO. J. MCKENNA, Police Judge.

OFFICE OF CLERK OF THE DISTRICT COURT,
Girard, Kans., January 15, 1917.

Hon. W. H. THOMPSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Yours of some days ago inquiring as to the prohibitory liquor laws of Kansas was received, and in reply I desire to say that I shall endeavor to briefly answer your inquiry.

Is there any intoxicating liquor sold in Kansas? Any honest man is compelled to answer that question in the affirmative. The statute making it a criminal offense to barter and sell intoxicating liquors in Kansas is violated.

If the prohibitory liquor law is violated, does it follow that the law is a failure? The law against murder, rape, robbery, and arson and other criminal statutes are violated, but it would hardly be contended that such laws were failures and should be repealed by reason of the fact that they are violated. Probably the most that can be accomplished by any statute is to reduce crime to a minimum. It can not be entirely prevented by law

The law against the sale of intoxicating liquor is being fairly and reasonably well enforced in Kansas. The prohibitory law in Kansas, I am inclined to think, is quite as well enforced as other criminal statutes in the State. The jurors do not hesitate to convict in liquor cases if the evidence warrants. The jurors give liquor cases the same serious consideration they do any other offense. If the evidence satisfies them beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant is guilty, they convict; if it does not so satisfy them, they acquit, exactly the same as they would in a case of murder, robbery, rape, or arson.

Unquestionably the prohibitory law greatly restricts and reduces the sale of intoxicating liquor.

Very sincerely, yours, A. J. CURRAN, District Judge.

DEAR SIR: Yours of January 3 to hand. Drunkenness is getting less and less, and, in fact, it is almost a thing of the past; but the Government is at fault for licensing the sale of the stuff, and I am hoping that national prohibition is not far off. I am persuaded that for every dollar the Government gets in revenue for license it pays out $10 in money, saying nothing about the souls sent to hell every year. It does look like our lawmakers could see this awful drain on our country and remedy the evil. Prohibition does prohibit drinking as much as law prohibits murder or theft.

DISTRICT COURT CHAMBERS,
Oberlin, Kans., January 3, 1917.

Hon. WILLIAM H. THOMPSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I have been watching your fight in the Senate for prohibition and am much pleased with the stand you are taking. We who have lived in Kansas the greater part of our lives know that prohibition has helped the State. Those who say that there is more intoxicating liquor consumed in Kansas in proportion to the population than in license States either do not know what they are talking about or do not care what they say. I have lived in Kansas near the Nebraska border since the adoption of the prohibitory amendment in 1881, and there was a time when I thought that prohibition did not prohibit, but since Kansas officials have been trying to enforce the law it has prohibited and does prohibit. From the time Senator Harris made his campaign for the governorship on the issue of law enforcement the law has been fairly enforced in the State and a marked change took place dating from that time. We can truly say we have a dry State. A drunken man is seldom seen and crime is lessened and the standard of morality much higher, especially among our young men, than it was a few years ago. In fact drinking is unpopular and growing more so under the influence of prohibition.

I have not looked over the records, but it is evident that there is much less crime than formerly, and if there are many convictions it is because crime is not respectable in Kansas and the strict enforcement of law is demanded by our citizenship.

Hoping that you may win and assuring you that the people of your home country are with you, I remain,

Sincerely, your friend, W. S. LANGMADE,
Judge Seventeenth Judicial District.

Hon. WILLIAM H. THOMPSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In regard to my knowledge of prohibition in Kansas, it practically does prohibit the sale of liquor in Kansas. We have, of course, a little trouble with an occasional bootlegger and a little drunkenness. That, of course, is owing to the ease with which they can get liquor from Missouri.

In this town before prohibition law was enacted there was from one to three men killed every year on account of saloon fights or drunkenness, and a number of farmers were foreclosed every year who lost their homes on account of excessive drinking.

In the last 10 years there has not been a man killed in any fight which could be charged up to liquor. And there are no homes being foreclosed on account of liquor. Every year the few bootleggers are getting less. Last year in this town of 5,000 there were only two arrests for drunkenness.

We think we have the liquor business just about as near the prohibitory point as you could have it in a State where they can ship it in from other States.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Answering the inclosed letter, will say in the first place, please excuse me for not answering before this date as I have been confined in the house on account of a severe spell of pneumonia.

Will state that I have had five cases before me for drunkenness during the year 1916, all of which plead guilty and were given a small fine and assessed the costs.

In regard to the enforcement of the prohibitory law, will state that in this county it is enforced as well if not better than in many of the counties of the State.

And will further say that if it was not for the St. Joseph liquor houses and saloons we would see but very little drunkenness in this city.

Our city has a population of some 1,500, and we are in favor of prohibition, and the people of this community would never vote to do away with the prohibitory law.

When we had open saloons we had terms of court lasting from four to six weeks, now we have terms lasting from two to three days each term People are more prosperous and are building and owning their own homes and are well satisfied and are helping enforce the laws.

Yours, very truly,

J. M. KNIGHT, Police Judge.

LAWRENCE, KANS., January 12, 1917.

WILLIAM H. THOMPSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Your letter of the 3d in regard to the effect of the prohibitory law in Kansas received.

Lawrence is a city of 14,600 people. In addition thereto, they have over 3,000 students in the State university and 1,000 students in Haskell Institute. Our district court meets three time a year; the criminal business is generally cleaned up in two or three days. Our police court in the city of Lawrence meets every morning, and morning after morning there is no business before the court.

We are on an interurban line, 40 miles from Kansas City, with car service every hour, and 99 per cent of the cases that we have in police court wherein the defendant is charged with being drunk he obtained his liquor in Kansas City. This interurban line has been in operation not quite a year, and we have had a little more drunkenness to contend with in police court during this time than we had before, by virtue of the fact that it has placed us in closer touch with Kansas City, Mo.

The prohibitory law is not a failure in Kansas. It is a marked success, and I am speaking from experience that I have had as an officer—four years as city attorney of this city and six years as county attorney of this county.

Yours, very truly, THOS. HARLEY,
By. E. H.,
County Attorney.

Baldwin City, Kans., January 11, 1917.

Hon. W. H. THOMPSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Yours of the 2d instant asking for my experience and opinion as to whether or not prohibition prohibits is to hand and contents noted.

As to my opinion, I am free to state that it is that prohibition does prohibit and that we are in a much better condition than we would be without it.

I interviewed some of our citizens in regard to this matter and they unanimously expressed the opinion that the prohibitory law is as well enforced and is as seldom violated as any other law on the statute books of the State, and I surely think they are correct in that opinion.

Since I have been police judge, now nearly six years, there have been no arrests for violations of the prohibitory law, and while there have been suspicions that it has been violated, the officers have failed to find any proof of the same.

Some liquor has been shipped in from Kansas City, but we have no proof that any has been sold.

In the police court there has been 30 arrests for intoxication, 29 of which plead guilty to the offense.

Of this number nine were nonresidents, one was arrested nine times, two three times each, and six others one time each.

If any of this is of any use to you, use it.

Hoping you will win your fight, I am,

Respectfully, yours,

N. A. SKINNER, Police Judge.

ELLIS COUNTY.

CITY OF HAYS GOVERNMENT,
Hays, Kans., January 10, 1917.

Hon. WM. H. THOMPSON,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In reply to your letter of the 30th ultimo, relative to the prohibitory liquor law of Kansas, will say that I know of no law in our statutes which has a greater sanction by the people of this State than this law, and I do not suppose that anyone will contend that Kansas is a lawless place.

As you know, all law depends upon the sanction of the people in so far as its enforcement is concerned. There was a time in the early history of the prohibitory liquor law when it was not sanctioned by a good many people of this State, but those times are past.

I have lived in Hays and its vicinity for 32 years and have been and am now mayor for the last 4 years. During the last 4 years since I have been a law-enforcing officer of this State we have had no bootleggers here who remained in that business very long; in fact we usually convicted them on their first or second sale. In fact it is not the local man so much as the transient bootleggers from Missouri who sometimes drop in between trains with a suit case full of whisky and manage to make a few sales before they are apprehended by the officers; but they are quitting that practice.

Although not a total abstainer from the use of intoxicating liquor, I believe that the good government strives for the greatest good to the greatest number. I think that the prohibitory liquor law of Kansas has met this requirement for Kansans, and I for one would welcome legislation along those lines nationally.

The claim has often been made that people from foreign countries are adverse to prohibition. We have several citizens in Hays of this class and they aid us in enforcing this law at this place.

The population of the city of Hays is about 3,000. Out of this number of people there is not one drunkard; in fact we have no drunkards, paupers, or idlers, but our people are contented, happy, and prosperous. Nearly seven-eighths of them own their own homes and have money in the banks.

When this letter reaches you it becomes your property, and I have no objections to the use which you may make of it.

Any information which I may be able to furnish you in regard to law enforcement will be cheerfully furnished upon request.

H. W. CHITTENDEN, Mayor.

FINNEY COUNTY.

SHERIFF'S OFFICE,
Garden City, Kans., January 26, 1917.

Hon. WM. H. THOMPSON,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: Having lived in Kansas all my life, and for the last two years having been the sheriff of Finney County, Kans., and thus having been in a good position to observe the workings of the prohibition law, I will say that it has worked in Kansas and has done the State more good than any one law that I know of. It most certainly reduces crime, lessens drunkenness, and raises the morality of the State to a very high degree. The people, instead of spending money for liquor in its many forms, spend their money on their families and righteous living, and what they do not thus spend they put away in the savings bank, so that the direct result is that there is a very great number of small depositors who have money put away in the banks of this State as a direct outcome of the prohibition law. It no doubt reduces crime. This I can state from my experience as an officer of the law. The small per cent of crime that is committed in this State is the result in a large measure to the violation of the prohibition law. Of course the law is violated some. It would be impossible to pass a law that was not violated some. The law of murder, larceny, etc., is also violated yet no one would dare say that the law forbidding the crime of murder, larceny, etc., was not a good law. As long as human nature remains as it is, laws will always be violated, and if we are going to condemn a law for that reason alone we had just as well stop passing laws right now, for there never will be a criminal law passed that will not be violated, more or less. Take it as a whole, prohibition has been enforced at least 90 per cent in Kansas and has made Kansas 90 per cent more efficient.

I am in favor of national prohibition, and especially in favor of prohibiting the shipping of liquor from a wet State into a dry State. I can not understand why the Federal Government will license a bootlegger in a prohibition State and thus help him violate the law, but not only that but shield his name from the State authorities.

Sincerely, yours,

OLL BROWN, Sheriff.

OFFICE OF CITY CLERK,
Dodge City, Kans., January 6, 1917.

Hon. WILLIAM H. THOMPSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Yours of December 30 at hand, asking me what had been my observation relative to prohibition in Kansas, whether a failure or actually prohibits.

In answer to this will say it prohibits to the minimum in our city, and will in any city or community in the State of Kansas, providing the officers will enforce the law according to their obligations. As you well know, our city before prohibition was enforced had a very bad reputation for drunkenness and all other kinds of vices that go hand in hand with the liquor traffic. But to-day we have a city of 5,000 people, with a day and night marshal, and it is very little they have to do on account of liquor.

The writer had occasion in the early part of December to visit several States that do not have prohibition, and he saw more drunks, more depravity, and more beggars than he has seen in the State of Kansas in the two years past.

Hoping that this will be of benefit to you and will be of some help in furthering the prohibition fight in the Nation, I am,

Yours, truly,

W. T. HALE, Mayor.

Hon. WILLIAM H. THOMPSON,

DEAR SIR: In answer to your letter of the 30th, will say that I have been a peace officer for the past six years, and as I have made frequent trips into the wet territories, I find that on these occasions that there are more men arrested in the wet territory in one night than is in the dry territory in a week. I am of the opinion, and from my observation think, that this condition is wholly caused from the fact that liquor is so readily procured. I realize the fact that the ones that are saying that the prohibitory law does not prohibit, but I will say for my own belief and observation that it does prohibit to a great extent, and when in the intoxicated condition, I find that most of our crimes are committed; for one instance, the killing of my friend and brother officer at Rolla, Kans., last July; the party was under the influence of liquor; in fact, he was drunk; and in my time I could point to lots more of cases in the same way, but would only take up time, for we people here are so well satisfied with it we will vote almost to a man and woman for the national prohibition clause as soon as it comes up; but we do not want it to come so soon that it will be defeated, or before there are enough States that have ratified it, so we will not be able to carry it in all by the necessary majority; but I say I am ready, and I firmly believe that we will meet with a wave of prosperity that has never been known before in the history of our Nation, for old debts will be paid that will never be until that time. Do all you can. I am for you.

Senator W. H. THOMPSON,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: In response to yours of December 30, will say that my experience of four years as sheriff of Franklin County, Kans., is that prohibition not only lessens crime but has upbuilding influence. To be sure, we have among the lower class of both white and colored races a few of what are known in this State as "bootleggers," but they, as a rule, only come in contact with a few compared with the many who would perhaps use liquor if we had open saloons. To my mind open saloons in Kansas would be a crime equal to taking the lives of our younger generation.

Yours, very respectfully,

NICK JOHNSON, Sheriff.

DISTRICT COURT, FRANKLIN COUNTY, KANS.,
Ottawa, Kans., January 2, 1917.

Senator W. H. THOMPSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: Answering your recent favor touching the intoxicating-liquor problems of Kansas, I have to say that I have read with considerable interest the debates upon that subject in the Senate. * * * You can put this down as a settled fact: Prohibition is here to stay. It is as firmly fixed in the minds of our people as the abolition of human slavery, and is no longer a disputed question. It is a fixture in this State, because our people have become thoroughly convinced that it is a paying investment; that is, that sober men are to be trusted in all stations of life rather than drunken men, and the situation resolves itself down to that proposition.

We have drunkenness in Kansas—there is no question about that—but it is confined exclusively to the lowest degree of citizenship. There is no question that liquor is sold in Kansas, but it is sold by a few Mexicans, a low grade of colored people, and a still lower grade of whites. If anyone desires to buy a drink of whisky in Kansas he can do so, and, from my experience in the trial of lawsuits for nearly a third of a century, I feel that I am qualified to advise him how he can get the stuff. First, he will have to go into a dark alley, find a Mexican or a low grade of colored or white citizenship, and there intrust such an individual with his money and wait until this most responsible individual returns with the goods. Or he may be conducted by a citizen of like character * * * past the freight stations, through the railroad yards to the farthest corner of the railroad property, and if he will stand in the darkest corner his conductor will go into a box car or behind a pile of ties and secure for him a half pint of stuff that has been shipped in from Missouri, and by the payment of a dollar he may become the proud possessor of this half pint of Missouri enthusiasm. Or, if he does not desire to go so far out of his way, if he will secure the proper signs, signals, grips, and passwords, he may enter a livery barn from the rear door, pass in the rear of the horses and mules, go up a flight of stairs into the second story, and there wait until the bartender removes several bales of hay, he may then purchase the stuff. The place of business may be changed when he returns for the second installment, but he will be able to find it, no doubt. This is not overdrawn; this is the manner in which liquor is purchased in Kansas, as revealed by the testimony of many witnesses whom I have heard testify in the past 30 years.

I have seen crowds of from ten to twenty thousand people gather on the fair grounds in different localities in Kansas, remain there three or four days, and not an arrest for drunkenness occur. In the past 15 years I do not recall now of hearing a single reputable citizen testify in a whisky case outside of the officers. Both seller and buyer are confined to the lowest class of citizens. * * *

I trust that you and the other Senators who are making the fight for common decency will keep it up until you succeed.

Respectfully, yours,

C. A. SMART,
District Judge.

Hon. W. H. THOMPSON,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: In answer to your letter as to whether prohibition in Kansas is a failure or actually prohibits, thereby lessening drunkenness and crime, as I have observed as one of the law-enforcing citizens of the State, would say I do not know of any law in the State that prohibits any better than the prohibitory law; and as for lessening drunkenness, there are very few persons ever seen on the streets of Ottawa intoxicated—a city of 10,000—and most of them are persons that bought their liquor in Kansas City or of some bootlegger that got it in Kansas City. And quite a number of cases that are brought before me for intoxication are persons taken off the trains coming out of Kansas City; and for several years after the prohibitory law I was contracting, building railroads, grading, and had contracts in Kansas, Oklahoma, Colorado, and Missouri, and I never had one-fourth the trouble on pay day of men drinking in Kansas as I had in the States that had no prohibitory law, and the law is being better enforced every year. * * * I have lived in Kansas 47 years and know the difference before prohibition and after.

Yours, very truly,

R. S. PARKER, City Clerk.

GEARY COUNTY.

JUNCTION CITY, KANS., January 17, 1917.

Hon. W. H. THOMPSON,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Your letter of the 3d instant, one of which was addressed to each of the undersigned, has been duly received. It is, indeed, a pleasure for us to answer your letter in the spirit in which it was written.

For a number of years after the passage of the prohibitory law in Kansas this city was conducted under the old fine system, which was in effect a high-license system. About 10 years ago the citizens elected a law-and-order ticket. At that time it was almost the universal opinion among business men that the city could not exist under law enforcement, because it depended upon Fort Riley, to a large extent, and the soldiers there for its business; it being contended that the soldiers would spend all of their money in Kansas City and very little of it in our city, and thus many of the business houses would be forced to close.

Time has shown that this opinion was erroneous. There have been a number of businesses closed out, but they were of the class that were undesirable and that go with an open town, consequently have not been missed by our citizens.

Our population is not quite as large now as it was then because of the exodus of a number of undesirable citizens. This exodus, however, has been a great help in improving the moral conditions.

It has been the earnest endeavor of the officers at all times during the past 10 years to enforce all laws and especially the prohibitory liquor law. Naturally drunkenness has materially decreased, as has all other crimes.

We have made an examination of the records and find that our police and district court records show a decrease in crime and prosecution for offenses of at least 500 per cent. This may seem large, but an examination of the records will bear us out.

We might also add that arrests are made much more readily now for the same offenses than they were when the prohibitory law was not enforced.

We believe that conditions have improved economically as well as morally. Our rate of taxation is at least as low as it was in the old days, with many improvements and advantages. This, of course, has been brought about to some extent by changing from a government by mayor and council to the commission form of government.

Hoping that you will have success in this fight in the Senate, we remain,

Very respectfully, yours,

J. I. KERN, Police Judge
M. D. PEESO, City Marshal.
I. M. PLATT, City Attorney.

JUNCTION CITY, KANS., January 8, 1917.

Hon. WM. H. THOMPSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

As to the question whether prohibition in Kansas is a failure, I have to say that no statement can be more absurd or false. The influence of the saloon and its accompanying vices are gone and our young men no longer influenced by the glittering attractions to entice them into the web of damnation.

As you know, we have the large military reservation, Fort Riley, here, and only a few years ago this city had 15 wide-open saloons, and on pay day at the fort our city was filled with drunken people; as many as 50 could be seen staggering along our principal street at one time, but this condition has ceased to exist, I am glad to say. We closed up these saloons and now it is very seldom—yes, a rare occasion—that one sees a drunken man on our streets. Our business men state that their collections are much improved, and conditions are so much improved that our citizens who at the first feared that by closing the saloons we would hurt business now say that they would not want the old conditions with the saloon.

I was elected county attorney of this, Geary County, Kans., in 1910, and have served as such officer up to this date. When I first took up the work of said office we had two and three weeks each term of court to complete our court docket in our district court. Our court expenses to our taxpayers was $2 000 and more each term. Our criminal docket was large and our city had the name of a very wicked and immoral town, but to-day our court docket has been so reduced by the elimination of the saloon that we have three or four days for a term of court instead of weeks, and the costs per term has been reduced more than three-fourths. All say what a wonderful change.

Very respectfully,

WM. W. PEASE, County Attorney.

GOVE COUNTY.

GOVE, KANS., January 3, 1917.

Hon. WILLIAM H. THOMPSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

HONORED SIR: Replying to your letter of the 30th ultimo, making inquiries for my observations as to whether the prohibitory law has been a success or failure in Kansas.

During my term of office as county attorney of Gove County, Kans., my experience has been and my opinion formed from that observation are that the prohibitory law in this State and county is a decided success. Even the fellows, or a majority of them, that use the liquor would be opposed to the open saloon. Furthermore, I do not believe that you could get an opinion from any of the better class of people of this State that would indicate the contrary.

And while I realize there have been more or less violations of the prohibitory law which have not been punished, just the same as there have been of other laws on the statute books, yet taken as a whole I think the law is pretty well enforced.

Trusting the above may be of some use to you, and with kindest personal regards, I am,

Yours, very truly,

E. F. BECKNER,
County Attorney.

Hon. WILLIAM H. THOMPSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Replying to your favor of the 30th ultimo, beg to advise that my observation of the operation of the prohibitory law in Kansas leads me to believe that even though it has been in some instances indifferently enforced, it has done more to lessen drunkenness and crime than any other one thing. I might further add that I believe the prohibitory law, as written, is for practical purposes actually enforced, and that a Federal law which would reach interstate commerce, prohibiting the shipment of liquor from a wet State into a dry State or through a dry State, would enable the peace officers of a dry State to enforce to the letter their prohibitory laws, and would result in such a lessening of drunkenness and crime and the consumption of intoxicating liquors as to seriously affect the manufacturers thereof.

Yours, very truly,

H. W. STUBBS,
County Attorney Grant County.

GREENWOOD COUNTY.

CITY CLERK'S OFFICE,
Eureka, Kans., January 9, 1917.

Hon. WILLIAM H. THOMPSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Your favor of the 30th concerning the effect of prohibition in Kansas received. I think I can answer your question about as intelligently by repeating to you a conversation I had with a young lady who is a bookkeeper and cashier in our store. I asked her the question if she often saw a drunken man in Eureka. She said she never had seen one, and she has been raised right here.

I was here before we had prohibition in Kansas, and anyone that has had the experience I have had wouldn't argue for a minute that prohibition didn't prohibit.

Yours, truly,

M. A. MILLER, Mayor.

SYRACUSE, KANS., January 15, 1917.

Hon. WILLIAM H. THOMPSON,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Your communication of the 30th ultimo, addressed to the county attorney at Johnson, received. I wish to congratulate you for the interest manifested in prohibition. It is very gratifying to me to know that the United States Supreme Court has made it possible to prohibit common carriers to place wet goods in dry territories. Upon reading the decision the morning after it was announced, I immediately wrote a letter to Mr. R. E. Bray, our county representative, to use his influence in securing an amendment to our present prohibition law, making the same conform to the Webb-Kenyon law of West Virginia. This makes it possible, as I see it, for Kansas to go dry since Colorado, Oklahoma, and Nebraska are also prohibition States and necessarily will follow our example in amending our present law. The fact that we have been unable to exclude shipments into Kansas has made it difficult along the border, as well as in the large cities of the interior of our State, to exclude intoxicants. I trust our representatives in Congress will all join with you in bringing about national prohibition by 1920, and that the Kansas Legislature will enact a proper bill to exclude liquor shipments from our beloved State.

With best wishes for you and yours, I remain,

Most respectfully,

CHAS. W. BURTON,
County Attorney.

SYRACUSE, KANS., January 4, 1916.

Hon. WM. H. THOMPSON,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have yours of the 30th ultimo relative to the liquor situation in Kansas.

I noticed that Senator Reed, of Missouri, was quoted as saying that there was more drunkenness in Kansas than in Missouri. Possibly I am not very familiar with the situation in Missouri, but so far as Kansas is concerned, there is not a great amount of drunkenness, and the drunkenness that exists is not the fault of the prohibitory law. If the Federal Government would enact a law preventing the shipping of liquor into prohibition territory, it is my judgment that drunkenness in Kansas would be very rare.

Another thing, prohibition is largely a matter of education. The boys and girls now growing up in Kansas are being raised under the influence of the prohibitory law. Most of them have never seen a saloon, and were it not for the fact that some of the elder residents of this State were addicted to the liquor habit, they probably would never have seen a case of drunkenness. It is true that there is some bootlegging in Kansas and in my judicial district, but there is not nearly the liquor sold nor consumed in this district that there would be if we had open saloons.

I spent over 20 years of my life in a State that has local option, and have been in Kansas 18 years, the last 12 years of which time the prohibitory law has been enforced. I think conditions in Kansas are much preferable under the prohibitory law than in States which have local option. I am confident that our people would never consent to a change. The drunkenness that exists in Kansas should not be charged to the prohibitory law, but should be charged to the liquor interests, which ship liquor from wet territory into Kansas. When we are protected against the liquor traffic from the outside, we will then be able to control the situation, and a case of drunkenness in Kansas will be very, very rare, indeed. With kind regards and best wishes, I am,

Very truly, yours,

GEORGE J. DOWNER,
Judge Thirty-second District.

HARVEY COUNTY.

NEWTON, KANS., January 8, 1917.

Hon. W. H. THOMPSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your favor of December 30 would say there is absolutely no question in the minds of our city commissioners or our citizens as to the success of prohibition in Kansas and in our city. Our officers are greatly handicapped by private shipments of liquor into the State, this being the most serious obstacle to full enforcement of the law. Circulation of advertisements of mail-order liquor concerns is also very detrimental to the cause.

In our opinion prohibition of liquor shipments into dry territory and exclusion of liquor advertisements from the mails are two of the most important factors in making possible a strict enforcement of the prohibitory law.

Yours, very truly,

A. J. DUFF, Mayor.

NEWTON, KANS., January 3, 1917.

Hon. WILLIAM H. THOMPSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Your favor of December 30, 1916, received relative to the question of prohibition in Kansas, and you ask for my experience, observation, and views, as one of the law-enforcing officers of the State. It has been my duty to enforce the prohibitory liquor law in Harvey County for the last two years, and I feel qualified to speak from that experience. The city of Newton is in Harvey County, and it must be remembered that that city is peculiarly located in this, that it is on the main line of the Santa Fe, east and west, and is one of its large division points on the main line, as well as on the line extending south through Oklahoma and Texas. There are more than 40 passenger trains in and out of Newton every day, and all stop here. In addition to that, we have interurban service from the city of Hutchinson and the city of Wichita every hour and twenty minutes. This makes it more difficult to enforce the prohibitory liquor law here than in many other counties of the State.

The prohibitory liquor law in Kansas is not a failure; the prohibitory liquor law in Kansas actually prohibits; as a result of our prohibitory liquor law there is less drunkenness, less crime, and less immorality than in many States and places other than the State of Kansas with which I am familiar and which are not blessed with a similar law. There is no question but that this is the result of our prohibitory law.

One thing which makes our liquor law harder to enforce than it otherwise would be is due to the fact that the common carriers, the shippers of liquor, or the officers of the United States Government do not obey and enforce the Federal law, which requires that the contents and amount of liquor shall be written plainly on the outside of the package. I wish to call your attention to a single incident, to make myself plain. Last summer there were two consignments of liquor came to the express office here, and on the outside of each it was stated that the package contained 3 gallons of liquor, and I ascertained that the liquor was bottled in 2-ounce bottles. Frequently it is stated on the outside of the package that it contains 1 gallon or 2 gallons, when it is bottled in pints or half pints. Your experience as a lawyer and on the bench and your knowledge of our liquor law will tell you that in Kansas there is a vast difference between 2 gallons and 32 half pints of liquor. As I have said before, if this law was strictly adhered to our troubles would be lessened.

In Harvey County during the past month of December, 1916, and with a strict enforcement of the liquor law, I have caused the arrest of only two people for drunkenness; and in the city of Newton, with a population of approximately 10,000, there has been only three arrested for drunkenness.

I believe that 9 out of every 10 crimes which I have had to deal with were due, either directly or indirectly, to liquor, and most of the "rot gut" came from Missouri. I can think of only one case of immorality at this time which was not the result of liquor.

If I can give you any more data or can aid you in any other manner in your fight for national prohibition, advise me, and I assure you that I will do all that I can.

With kindest personal regards and best wishes of the season, I beg to remain,

Very respectfully,

L. C. KELLEY,
County Attorney.

HALSTEAD, KANS., January 4, 1917.

Hon. WILLIAM H. THOMPSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Your fight to uphold prohibition in Kansas has my hearty approval. I am serving my fourth term as mayor of Halstead. We have no paupers in our city. One mother receives a mother's pension, whose husband sends all the money he can get to Missouri for booze. We have a clean town, a happy people. Our "jail" is used for a sleeping room for tramps who come from a whisky State.
